Mr. ESTEVEZ. The version that is out, yes.

Senator KING. Changing the subject slightly, what is your assessment of our logistical readiness for the drawdown in Afghanistan? It is not going to be easy to get all that materiel out of there. Where do we stand on that front?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. It is a fantastic challenge for the logistics system. It is absolutely executable. It is going to be much more difficult than the drawdown from Iraq. Afghanistan, just from a geography standpoint, is a landlocked country. It does not have the infrastructure that Iraq had. Nevertheless, our logistics system is up to the task and we will be able to execute the drawdown and remove our equipment from Afghanistan, as well as our people, of course.

Senator KING. It certainly is going to be a challenge because there is no access by sea.

Mr. Vollrath, I had a colloquy with now Secretary Hagel. When I meet with veterans in Maine, particularly the recent people who have left the Service, one of the biggest problems they find is the lack of information. It is a complicated system with the Veterans Affairs (VA) and Defense Departments and all the different programs and what is available, what they can access, how they do it. You folks have an extensive network of recruiters who bring people in. I would like you to consider and suggest a similar reciprocal program to help people when they leave. Out-placement services is, in effect, what I am suggesting. That was the number one problem that the veterans brought to me when I was discussing this issue with them last summer.

Do you have any thoughts about this?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes, I do, Senator. First, let me say thank you to Congress for a law that was passed called the Vow to Hire Heroes Act. That law stipulated that the Department of Defense would set up a very robust transition assistance program with the help of the Department of Labor and the Department of Veterans Affairs. That transition assistance program, as defined in law, has been put in place. Let me describe the depth of that.

First, the Department of Defense will set up 100 percent of every servicemember leaving Active Duty with a plan ahead.

Second, as part of that out-processing or that transition process, that servicemember will receive up to 4 days of transition assistance from the Department of Labor so that they understand how to create a resume, they know how to interview, and the Department of Labor will then give what is now termed a warm hand-off to that servicemember to the community to which they say they are going so that they have the name of a person in the Department of Labor establishment in that locale that they, in effect, can report to get the help.

The third part is the Veterans Administration. The VA has up to 2 days with each of the persons separating to inform them as to what their benefits are that can be provided by the Veterans Administration in their totality, and probably most important, sign them up before they leave for those benefits and, like with the Department of Labor, create the warm hand-off for that servicemember with a name in the community for the Veterans Administration to which the servicemember intends to go.

In addition to that, we are instituting a three-pronged voluntary session that each servicemember may avail themselves of, if they wish. One is to help them apply for school fully, if they want to go to college or to some trade school. We will help them with the application and everything they need to get on board.

Second, if they want to go to a trade school and get that type of training, then the Veterans Administration, before they leave, will also give them that capability and provide them with a place to go and get that training that they desire.

The third has to do with the Small Business Administration (SBA). The SBA has stepped up to the plate and they also are providing to any servicemember that is departing a 4-day course on how to be an entrepreneur to start a small business. That is key, we believe and so does the SBA, because as you all know, most of the jobs are created by small business in America.

So not only are we helping them transition, we are trying to provide them the full measure of transition back into the community. So your suggestion, Senator, I take fully and will definitely run with it.

Senator KING. It sounds like all the thinking is there. I just hope that the execution matches the vision. Thank you very much.

I want to talk about rising personnel costs, but we will do that on questions on the record. My time has expired.

Thank you, gentlemen, for your answers.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator King.

Just on that last question of Senator King, is there a simple brochure which lays out each of those five points?

Mr. VOLLRATH. I do not have a simple brochure that does that, but I have an information paper that does that.

Chairman LEVIN. Can you put together a brochure which you could get to all the Members of Congress and then hopefully to all the servicemembers who are leaving which describes what efforts are being made to help them transition so that at one place every one of our servicemembers who is leaving can see this is what the Department of Defense is doing, this is what you can expect? Because I think that what Senator King has raised is something which is really very much on all of our minds. I think he has really targeted something which we hear an awful lot about.

Earlier today, Mr. Vollrath, I talked to you about what the VA program is in one community college in my home State which actually, apparently in a unique way, has a program which veterans come to from around the country now that will help give them credit for the work that they have done, the skills that they picked up in the military and gaining early certification from States for that particular skill whether they are going to become a nurse or a medical assistant or a truck driver with skills, whatever it is, whatever the skills they gained in the military, that they do not have to duplicate them and go through a 2-year program or a 1-year program when a 3-month program is all they need in order to qualify and to smooth the way through the certification being done in advance for them through the State agencies which have to certify those skills before they can operate.

So that point which Senator King has gone through with you is really a very significant part of what all of us I hope and know are about. When you are confirmed or even before—but that should come pretty quickly—work on that very simple one-pager that could go on a website and can be printed out and handed to those of us who still read.

Mr. VOLLRATH. Will do, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. The printed word I should say.

Do any of my colleagues have any additional questions?

Senator KING. My only comment, Mr. Chairman, based upon what you just said and I alluded to it—in my experience, execution is as important as vision. This is really how it is executed on the street with these guys, men and women, as they leave. That is critically important because this is what we are hearing at home. Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you all. We thank you, our nominees. We look forward to your speedy confirmation and we thank you and your families and friends who are here for your service and their support of you in that endeavor. Congratulations.

We will stand adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 11:17 a.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Hon. Alan F. Estevez by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. I do not see the need for modifications to any of the Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions at this time. The Goldwater-Nichols Act has cultivated jointness within the Department of Defense (DOD) and has outlined appropriate responsibility to senior leaders within the acquisition and logistics community.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. N/A.

DUTIES

Question. Section 133a of title 10, U.S.C., describes the role of the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Technology (DUSD(AT)).

Assuming you are confirmed, what duties do you expect that the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(AT&L) will prescribe for you?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect the USD(AT&L) will assign me duties supporting the roles and missions assigned to him by the Secretary of Defense.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. I have over 30 years of experience working in defense establishments. For the last 6 years, I have operated at the most senior levels within the Office of the USD(AT&L), the last 2 as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness (ASD(L&MR)). Prior to that, I was the Principal Deputy to that position for 5 years. For the last year, with the Principal Deputy AT&L position vacant, I have assisted the USD(AT&L) in managing the full gamut of AT&L issues and responsibilities to include not only acquisition, technology, and logistics matters, but also industrial base issues, installation and military construction issues, and operational energy issues. I have a proven track record as a skilled manager who is able to execute programs to completion and manage change. I have managed complex programs across the defense enterprise, and have worked issues at senior levels across the Federal Government, with Congress, and with industry. I have led the defense logistics enterprise and directed support to our forces in the field as we surged and subsequently drew down in two wars. Simultaneously, I led efforts to lower the costs of logistics. I have played a key role in driving our rapid acquisition support in both Iraq and Afghanistan and ensured the delivery and sustainment of critical capabilities, such as the Mine Resistant Ambush Protected (MRAP) vehicles. I have provided direct oversight to the Defense Logistics Agency (DLA), a $50 combat support agency, as it has supported our deployed forces, our organic industrial depots, and the American people in disaster relief operations, to include Super Storm Sandy. I have led the DOD efforts to ensure life cycle costs are considered early in major acquisition programs. In short, I have proven my skills in overcoming bureaucratic hurdles to provide needed capabilities to our warfighters at best value for our taxpayers.

Question. Do you believe that there are any additional steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform these duties?

Answer. I believe that my expertise qualifies me to perform the duties of the Principal Deputy Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (PDUSD(AT&L)), and that no further steps are needed.

Question. Do you believe that any significant changes should be made in the structure and decisionmaking procedures of DOD with respect to acquisition matters?

Answer. No. I believe that the structure and decisionmaking procedures of the DOD with respect to acquisition matters are sound and efficient, and I do not advise making any changes.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. If confirmed, you will be responsible for assisting the Under Secretary in the management of an acquisition system pursuant to which DOD spends roughly $400 billion each year.

What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. I have over 30 years of experience operating in the defense establishment, including 10 years as a Senior Executive. Over the last 6 years, I have worked at the most senior levels within the Office of the Secretary of Defense. For the last 4 years, I have been responsible for leading the defense logistics enterprise, providing superb support to our warfighters engaged in combat operations while simultaneously lowering the cost of logistics operations. I have assisted the past three USD(AT&L)s in executing key programs, including enhancing our acquisition life cycle management capabilities and oversight, strengthening our nuclear parts management and oversight, executing operational energy support to provide battlefield flexibility, and driving the rapid acquisition process to provide and sustain capabilities, such as MRAP vehicles to support our deployed forces. I have played a key role in driving efficiencies in our budget, and in properly managing the Department's budget execution, to include supporting our efforts to achieve auditability. I am a proven leader who has demonstrated the skills to manage complex programs and lead change when necessary.

Question. What background or experience, if any, do you have in the acquisition of major weapon systems?

Answer. I have been a senior leader in the Office of the USD(AT&L) for the last 6 years, and I have been an advisor on the Defense Acquisition Board during that time. I have had input to every major defense weapon system acquisition program over that time period. I have been the leader in our efforts to strengthen the Department's policies to ensure sustainability and life cycle costs are considered in defense programs, and I am responsible for the ensuring life cycle sustainment projections are discussed as part of the acquisition process. I initiated the requirement to make the development of a Life Cycle Sustainment Plan part of a Program Manager's responsibilities, and I worked with Congress to designate a Product Support Manager as key program management leader. I have also been a key leader in the Department's rapid acquisition efforts in support of our warfighters. I played a key role in the acquisition, fielding, and sustainment of the MRAP Family of Vehicle program, and led efforts to ensure that the vehicles could be sustained in the field. I also helped to drive the requirements for the rapid acquisition and fielding of the lighter MRAP All-Terrain Vehicle (MATV) and the MRAP wrecker. I have a proven track record of strong, common sense management and the ability to manage and oversee change. These skills will be necessary to manage an acquisition system in an era of declining resources.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. In carrying out your duties, what would be your relationship with:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I will support the Secretary of Defense's priorities in acquisition, technology, and logistics.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I would support the Deputy Secretary's priorities and direction in matters of acquisition, technology, and logistics.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.

Answer. If confirmed, I will serve as the principal advisor to USD(AT&L). In this role, I will support USD(AT&L) in his priorities and duties and provide counsel, when needed.

Question. The other Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) to coordinate actions with the other Under Secretaries to best serve the priorities of the Secretary of Defense.

Question. The Deputy Chief Management Officer of DOD.

Answer. If confirmed, I will assist USD(AT&L) in support of the Deputy Chief Management Officer in the improvement of business operations of DOD.

Question. The DOD General Counsel.

Answer. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) in working with the General Counsel to ensure AT&L actions are legally and ethically within regulations and appropriate statutes.

Question. The Director of Operational Test and Evaluation.

Answer. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) in his work with the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation to ensure appropriate oversight for major defense acquisition programs to assure that acquisitions systems are effective and suitable for combat.

Question. The Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) and the Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation (CAPE) to support CAPE's efforts in providing the Department with independent cost analysis and resource assessments for defense acquisition programs.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Acquisition.

Answer. If confirmed, I will assist the USD(AT&L) and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Acquisition in providing oversight of Defense acquisition systems and programs while taking into consideration life cycle management costs.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering to ensure DOD develops and incorporates latest technology and innovative capabilities while aiming to reduce cost and risk.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness.

Answer. I currently serve as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness (ASD(L&MR)). If confirmed, I will work with the incoming ASD(L&MR) and USD(AT&L) to provide oversight to DOD logistics programs operations.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs.

Answer. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) in his work with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs to ensure support to the warfighter on the battlefield through energy planning and innovation while mitigating risks and costs.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Nuclear and Chemical and Biological Defense Programs.

Answer. If confirmed, I will assist USD(AT&L) in his work with the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Nuclear and Chemical and Biological Defense Programs to protect the United States from nuclear, chemical, and biological threats.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict.

Answer. If confirmed, I will assist USD(AT&L) and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict in their work to provide rapid capabilities to support special operations, counter-narcotics, and stability operations.

Question. The Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Installations and Environment.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L) and the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Installations and Environment to provide installation services that are cost-effective to support the warfighter.

Question. The Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Developmental Testing.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Developmental Testing to ensure that independent developmental testing assessments are used in informing acquisition decisions.

Question. The Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for System Engineering.

Answer. If confirmed, I will assist USD(AT&L) in his work with the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Systems Engineering to ensure effective systems engineering throughout the life cycle of Major Defense Acquisitions Programs, and to identify early and address systems engineering gaps and deficiencies.

Question. The Director of Program Assessment and Root Cause Analysis.

Answer. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) in directing the Director of Program Assessment and Root Cause Analysis to ensure comprehensive performance assessments are conducted on all Major Defense Acquisition Programs and that cost and performance issues are identified and resolved as early in the acquisition Milestone timeline as possible.

Question. The Acquisition Executives in the Military Departments.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) and the Service Acquisition Executives to ensure effective oversight and transparency of acquisition programs. Additionally, I will support USD(AT&L) and Service Acquisition Executives to share best practices and incorporate these strategies throughout acquisition programs in the Department and other Service branches.

Question. The Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) in his support of the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff as an advisor to the Joint Requirements Oversight Council and a member of the Defense Acquisition Board. USD(AT&L) and I will support the Vice Chairman by ensuring that the requirements for acquisitions programs meet the services' missions and are cost-effective.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges that will confront the USD(ATL)?

Answer. The principle challenges I may face as the PDUSD(AT&L) will be providing needed capabilities to defend the country and maintain the best military in the world, as outlined in our Defense Strategy, in a time of declining resources. In the near term, the Nation is still at war, we face the challenge of sustaining and drawing down our forces in Afghanistan, an operation which will be significantly more difficult than our drawdown in Iraq. We also must be able to sustain our readiness across the globe and avoid the pitfalls of a hollow force. We must manage our acquisition programs and our spending to ensure we get the best capability needed at the right cost for the American taxpayer. As military spending declines, we must ensure that our industrial base remains strong and vibrant, and capable of producing the needed innovations to build future military capability. While ensuring we develop the capabilities for our future challenges, we must also incorporate and not forget our hard learned lessons from our 12 years at war, including our ability to rapidly meet warfighter needs and to manage contractors on the battlefield. Finally, we must ensure we have a workforce, both military and civilian, that is trained and motivated to address these challenges. These challenges are exacerbated by the current budget uncertainty and the specter of sequestration.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will support the USD(AT&L) to address these challenges.

We will continue to provide our warfighters the capabilities they need today to be successful on the battlefield in Afghanistan, while also providing the policies and supporting the processes needed to successfully drawdown.

We will continue to strengthen our management of the acquisition system under our Better Buying Power (BBP) initiative. We will work to control and reduce costs and provide affordable programs to meet our warfighters needs. We will continue to work with industry to provide appropriate incentives—and appropriate revenue—to drive higher productivity and stability, and we will work to identify, and protect, as necessary, our most fragile industry skills and capabilities. We will continue to drive changes in our doctrine and policy to incorporate our lessons related to rapid acquisition and contingency contract management. We will work to strengthen our workforce through training and development, and by rewarding good performance while holding people accountable for poor performance.

ACQUISITION ORGANIZATION

Question. Do you believe that the office of the USD(AT&L) is appropriately structured and staffed to execute its management and oversight responsibilities?

Answer. Yes, I believe the office of the USD(AT&L) is appropriately structured to execute its management and oversight of responsibilities and will ensure that it remains so in the future. I believe we will make some adjustments as we restructure the Deputy Under Secretary positions as required by law.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes in the relationship between the USD(AT&L) and senior acquisition officials in the Military Departments?

Answer. No.

Question. Do you see the need for any additional processes or mechanisms to ensure coordination between the budget, acquisition, and requirements systems of DOD and ensure that appropriate trade-offs are made between cost, schedule, and performance requirements early in the acquisition process?

Answer. I do not currently see the need for any additional processes or mechanisms to ensure coordination between the budget, acquisition, and requirements systems of the Department. The Joint Requirements Oversight Council and the Defense Acquisition Board have helped to ensure this coordination. If confirmed, I will continue to support USD(AT&L)'s priority of using affordability caps to ensure appropriate trade-offs between cost, schedule, and performance requirements are made early in the acquisition process.

Question. What do you believe should be the appropriate role of the Service Chiefs in the requirements, acquisition, and resource-allocation process?

Answer. The Service Chiefs should and do play an integral part of the requirements, acquisition, and resource-allocation process. The Service Chiefs requirements and resource decisions inform the professional acquisition workforce's acquisition decisions and are essential to ensuring that these acquisitions programs are successful from production to fielding and disposal. The Service Chiefs' leadership in the budget and requirements process ensures that the acquisition programs meet the needs of the Services, and are budgeted with the life cycle of the program in mind. I believe it is essential that our acquisition workforce work with the Service Chiefs to continue to make well-informed decisions.

Question. What do you see as the potential advantages and disadvantages to giving the Service Chiefs authority and responsibility for the management and execution of acquisition programs?

Answer. It is essential that our acquisitions workforce work in tandem with the Service Chiefs. We must recognize the fact that the Service Chiefs are often not acquisition professionals. Their thoughts and guidance are critical in the acquisitions process. However, the management and execution of programs should be done by acquisition professionals who have the necessary training, professional experience, and qualifications.

Question. What do you believe should be the appropriate role of the combatant commanders in the requirements, acquisition, and resource-allocation processes?

Answer. Combatant commanders must identify requirements and capability needs, and they must play a key role in the resource-allocation processes. If confirmed, I will reinforce USD(AT&L)'s goal of working with the combatant commanders in support of their acquisition needs to support wartime operations and evolving threats. The advice and input of the combatant commanders is needed to make sure that acquisitions programs meet their needs in strategic operations.

Question. What improvements, if any, do you believe are needed in the lines of authority and accountability for the procurement of major weapon systems?

Answer. I do not believe any improvements are needed in the lines of authority and accountability for the procurement of major weapons systems. The current process flowing from the Defense Acquisition Executive to the Secretaries of Military Departments to the Service Acquisition Executives and Program Executive Officers to Program Managers is successful so long as trained, competent leaders hold those positions. While I see no need for a current change to this structure, if confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L) to review the process to see if changes are needed in the future.

Question. What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to empower program managers to execute major defense acquisition programs and hold them accountable for how well their programs perform?

Answer. Empowering program managers to effectively and efficiently execute major defense acquisition programs is a priority for USD(AT&L) and, if confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) in this goal. Section 853 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2007 and its subsequent modifications in section 814 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 required the Department to enhance the role of Program Managers in developing and implementing acquisition programs. The Department has developed a strategy to better educate and train program managers to ensure leadership and program management accountability. This strategy includes formal acquisition training, program reviews, and Milestone Decision Authority forums led by program managers. Program managers should be fully knowledgeable of their programmatic, contractual, and financial details of their programs, and should be able to measure performance against plans and adjust accordingly. BBP 2.0, laid out by USD(AT&L), re-emphasizes the responsibilities of program managers. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) to continue to empower program managers while holding them accountable.

MAJOR WEAPON SYSTEM ACQUISITION

Question. Do you believe that the current investment budget for major systems is affordable given decreasing defense budgets, the historic cost growth trends for major systems, and the continuing costs of ongoing contingency operations?

Answer. There is great uncertainty about future budgets at the present time. While I expect the costs of current contingency operations to decrease in the coming years, the specter of sequestration drive significant additional uncertainty. Without sequestration, the current investment portfolio is affordable. However, if the overall budget decreases more dramatically, it is unlikely the Department could afford the current portfolio of major systems and still maintain balanced risk in other parts of the budget.

Question. If confirmed, how do you plan to address this issue?

Answer. If confirmed, I would work with USD(AT&L) and others to ensure that the Department adheres to a sustainable and affordable investment strategy.

Question. Roughly half of DOD's major defense acquisition programs have exceeded the so-called "Nunn-McCurdy" cost growth standards established in section 2433 of title 10, United States Code, to identify seriously troubled programs. Section 206 of the Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 (WSARA) tightened the standards for addressing such programs.

What steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to address the out-of-control cost growth on DOD's major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L), as part of our BBP efforts, to make affordability and cost control a dominant part of our acquisition culture. I will integrate affordability and cost-consciousness into our decision processes, and enforce affordability caps for both production and sustainment. I will work to appropriately incentivize our industrial base partners though our contracts to promote cost control. I will also work to ensure the Department's requirements, acquisition, and budgeting processes ensure investment decisions are informed by sound affordability constraints. For those programs that do experience unacceptable cost growth, I would work closely with USD(AT&L) and others within the Department to examine all available options, including restructure or termination. Lastly, if confirmed, I would focus on ensuring future programs are started with a sound affordability and technical grounding to reduce the likelihood of future growth in costs.

Question. What steps if any do you believe that the Department should consider taking in the case of major defense acquisition programs that exceed the critical cost growth thresholds established in the Nunn-McCurdy provision?

Answer. I believe the basic requirements of the Nunn-McCurdy provision are sensible in that they require a thorough review of the root causes of the issues, as well as a careful examination of the management of the program, costs and options going forward, and a reassessment of the criticality of the particular program to meeting validated requirements and national security needs. I also believe the Department should continue to undertake similar kinds of reviews well before required to do so by Nunn-McCurdy, and use available authorities to make appropriate adjustments.

Question. Do you believe that the office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics, as currently structured, has the organization and resources necessary to effectively oversee the management of these major defense acquisition programs? If not, how would you address this problem?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes to the Nunn-McCurdy provision, as revised by section 206?

Answer. No. As I previously stated, I believe the basic tenets of the Nunn-McCurdy provisions are logical. Consistent with other efforts to streamline reviews in the Acquisition process, if confirmed, I would work with USD(AT&L) to tailor the reviews to meet the requirements of individual circumstances.

Question. What principles will guide your thinking on whether to recommend terminating a program that has experienced critical cost growth under Nunn-McCurdy?

Answer. If confirmed, I would be guided by the principles outlined in the Nunn-McCurdy statute.

OPERATING AND SUPPORT COSTS

Question. The Department estimates that operating and support (O&S) costs account for up to 70 percent of the acquisition costs of major weapon systems. Section 832 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 requires the Department to take a series of steps to improve its processes for estimating, managing, and reducing such costs.

What is the current status of the Department's efforts to implement the requirements of section 832?

Answer. The provisions of section 832 pertain to authorities vested in both the USD(AT&L) and the Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation Office (CAPE). The two organizations have collaborated on implementing policy that addresses the requirements outlined in section 832 through a major revision of Department of Defense Instruction (DODI) 5000.02, Operation of the Defense Acquisition System, which includes incorporating requirements from sections 805, 815, and 837 of the NDAA. Additionally, the CAPE and AT&L have restructured the Defense Acquisition Guidebook to further emphasize operations and sustainment (O&S) cost management among the acquisition workforce.

Question. What steps remain to be taken to implement section 832, and what is the Department's schedule for taking these steps?

Answer. AT&L will publish section 832 implementation guidance in the DODI 5000.02, Operation of the Defense Acquisition System, in calendar year 2013. In addition, we will supplement the section 832 guidance with an operating and support cost management guidebook to complement the Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation Office Operations and Sustainment (O&S) cost estimating guidebook. This management guidebook will further emphasize the importance of considering O&S cost during system design trades early in a program's life, and assist programs in developing Life Cycle Sustainment Plans that include measures to control O&S cost.

We are updating our guidance on Independent Logistics Assessments to ensure results are unbiased, and that programs use the assessments to improve reliability, availability, maintainability and reduce cost. Further, AT&L will monitor program efforts to manage and control O&S costs during Defense Acquisition Executive Summary reviews. I expect the Department to issue this amplifying guidance later this year.

Question. What steps, if any, are needed to ensure that the requirements and acquisition communities fully and effectively collaborate to understand and control the O&S costs prior to and early in product development, when it is possible to have the most significant impact on those costs?

Answer. The AT&L BBP initiative established an affordability cap requirement for both acquisition costs and Operations and Sustainment (O&S) costs. In so doing, we treat the O&S affordability cap in the same manner as we do a Key Performance Parameter—it will not be traded away against other system requirements. Accordingly, we are seeing positive results in Service-implemented configuration steering boards that facilitate active management of requirements between the acquisition and warfighter communities. With the proper requirements defined, AT&L evaluates a program's capability to meet availability and reliability requirements through milestone reviews and developmental and operational testing. The end result is an improved ability to optimize readiness and costs over a programs lifecycle.

The Product Support Manager (PSM) is a critical facilitator of collaboration between the acquisition and requirements communities. Since the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2010, section 805 established the requirement for PSMs, the Services have designated PSMs for Acquisition Category (ACAT) I and II programs. We also established the PSM as a key leadership position and revised the Life Cycle Logistics training curriculum at Defense Acquisition University to better equip PSMs for success. USD(AT&L) also provided detailed guidance in September 2011 for Program Managers and PSMs on development of the Life Cycle Sustainment Plans (LCSP). The LCSP is the program's primary tool for product support planning and is required for all acquisition milestones. The LCSP must provide the program's plan to satisfy the Joint Capabilities Integration and Development System mandated sustainment requirements, including the O&S cost key system attribute.

Question. What additional steps, if any, do you believe the Department needs to take to bring O&S costs under control?

Answer. We must execute and enforce key steps in the BBP initiative—sustainability, affordability, and cost constraints. We must use "should cost" management to drive costs down, including for sustainment contracts. We must ensure proper alignment of incentives between the government and its contractors. We are integrating policy, guidance, workforce training, and improved oversight of programs to reduce and control Operations and Sustainment (O&S) costs. This integrated approach provides better sustainment planning for those programs in the developmental phases of the acquisition process, a necessary first step to achieve quantifiable savings for programs in the operating and support phases of the life cycle. Our success will be the reduction of actual O&S costs realized in coming years.

SYSTEMS ENGINEERING

Question. One of the premises for WSARA was that the best way to improve acquisition outcomes is to place acquisition programs on a sounder footing from the outset by addressing program shortcomings in the early phases of the acquisition process.

Do you believe that DOD has the systems engineering and developmental testing organizations, resources, and capabilities needed to ensure that there is a sound basis for key requirements, acquisition, and budget decisions on major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes. The Department has put emphasis on building the systems engineering and developmental testing capabilities required for acquisition. The numbers of system engineers and developmental testing personnel has increased. There is a potential challenge with workforce demographics as senior workforce personnel near retirement and a number of relatively junior people gain more experience and proficiency. If confirmed, I will strive to identify ways to address this problem.

Question. What is your assessment of the Department's implementation to date of section 102 of WSARA, regarding systems engineering?

Answer. In response to section 102, the Department established the Office of the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Systems Engineering, and has staffed this office with highly qualified professionals. There has also been additional guidance and oversight provided to the systems engineering capabilities in the Military Services. If confirmed, I will continue to support the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Systems Engineering in his oversight of this area.

Question. What additional steps will you take, if confirmed, to implement this provision?

Answer. I will work with the Service Acquisition Executives to implement systems engineering policy and guidance to strengthen implementation of section 102. We need to continue to address the competency, capacity, and authority of the systems engineering workforce as critical components of the acquisition system

OPEN ARCHITECTURE PROGRAMS

Question. Certain programs within DOD have made considerable investments over the past several years in an effort to transition development of combat systems to an open business model, commonly referred to as Open Architecture (OA). OA systems are characterized by modular design, public access to design specifications, software reuse, common interface standards, and seamless interoperability between system hardware and software applications. By exercising the government's rights to the software developed with government funds, rejecting proprietary and closed solutions, the government may be able to bring to bear the critical elements of competition and innovation to achieve improved system performance and affordability of major systems both during the initial acquisition and during the sustainment phase.

To what extent do you believe that DOD implementation of an open architecture strategy can lead to more efficient and effective development, production and sustainment programs for major weapon system acquisition?

Answer. I believe the Department must strongly promote competition throughout the acquisition lifecycle to obtain the best value for the warfighter at the lowest cost to the taxpayer. To support a competitive environment, the Department has been aggressively pursuing open systems architecture (OSA) as a means of opening our acquisition efforts to greater competition, as well as more effectively managing intellectual property to rapidly bring greater innovation, from a wider array of sources, to the hands of our warfighter.

I support the Department focus on open systems architectures and believe we must do a better job of creating options with approaches like this to promote competition throughout the product lifecycle. Promoting OSA business and technical best practices is one aspect of BBP 2.0, and the Department is developing tools and guidance to ensure that OSA practices are effectively applied.

Question. Are you aware of any legislative or regulatory impediments to more broadly applying such a strategy?

Answer. I am not aware of any legislative or regulatory impediments that inhibit implementing the DOD OSA strategy. The Department is working on implementing the legislative authority given us in the last NDAA for rights to data associated with segregation and reintegration information. I believe this is a positive change that will be especially helpful in crafting competitive open business models.

TECHNOLOGICAL MATURITY

Question. Section 2366b of title 10, U.S.C., requires the Milestone Decision Authority for a major defense acquisition program to certify that critical technologies have reached an appropriate level of maturity before Milestone B approval.

What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to make sure that DOD complies with the requirements of section 2366b?

Answer. If confirmed, I would support USD(AT&L) in his role as chair of the Defense Acquisition Board (DAB) and Milestone Decision Authority (MDA) for Major Defense Acquisition Programs in fulfilling this requirement.

Question. What steps if any will you take to ensure that the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Developmental Test and Evaluation are adequately staffed and resourced to support decisions makers in complying with the requirements of section 2366b?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continuously monitor the staffing levels for the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Developmental Test and Evaluation to ensure they can comply with their requirements, to include those tasks to certify critical technologies for major defense acquisition programs as written in title 10, U.S.C., section 2366b. To date, I am not aware that these offices have been unable to meet their statutory requirements, but I will be vigilant to ensure they will be able to continue meeting this requirement.

CONCURRENCY

Question. Some of the Department's largest and most troubled acquisition programs appear to have suffered significantly from excessive concurrency—the effort to produce a weapon system, even as it is still being designed.

What impact do you believe that such excessive concurrency has on our efforts to produce major weapon systems on schedule and on budget?

Answer. While some degree of concurrency may be appropriate, I believe that when the proper balance is exceeded the result can increase costs and lead to schedule delays. Any decision to concurrently enter into production while still in the design phase must take into account the risk in the development phase, the urgency of the need, and the impact on cost and schedule as a result of concurrent development. If confirmed, I will strive to ensure a careful balance is established between the risk of concurrency and the urgency for the need for programs that use it.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to address this issue?

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to ensure that concurrency in any planned major weapon system is thoroughly assessed from a risk and benefit perspective before recommending the program for initiation, and then re-evaluate the risks and benefits for each major program decision. I expect cost and schedule estimates to clearly identify the impact of any level of concurrent development and production. I will also ensure that the risks are carefully tracked over the life of the development effort.

JOINT STRIKE FIGHTER

Question. Secretary Kendall has been quoted as saying that it was "acquisition malpractice" to place the Joint Strike Fighter into production years before the first flight test.

Do you share this view?

Answer. Yes, I share Under Secretary Kendall's view. Specifically, the decision to begin production of the F–35 prior to flight test was a departure from accepted and proven principles. As Under Secretary Kendall has clarified, it is important to note that this judgment does not extend to the F–35 program as a whole or any specific person. The Department remains committed to the F–35 program and the program, if appropriately managed, the program will provide the Department to acquire a critical capability at an acceptable cost.

Question. What steps if any do you believe that we can take now to address any problems or deficiencies that may have developed as a result of excessive concurrency on the Joint Strike Fighter program?

Answer. I believe that the Department has already taken a number of steps that will minimize the risks of concurrency. The decision to maintain production at a fixed rate in fiscal years 2013 and 2014 will allow time to validate and stabilize the design through the flight test program. A ramp up in production is not planned until the need for further design changes are reduced. The Low Rate Initial Production Lot 5 contract has been structured to ensure the appropriate amount of cost risk is shared between the contractor and the Government. If confirmed, I will ensure that future production decisions are based on adequate understanding of the concurrency, costs, and design stability.

Question. What additional steps if any do you believe we should take to avoid similar problems in future acquisition programs?

Answer. I believe we need to pursue acquisition strategies based on the sound principles of program management and system engineering. If confirmed, I will ensure that the acquisition and engineering professional leadership in the Department reviews major programs early and regularly to preclude planning that is overly optimistic in assumptions. I believe that a program based on sound acquisition and engineering strategies will have the best chance to succeed and execute within planned cost and schedule.

FIXED PRICE-TYPE CONTRACTS

Question. Section 811 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires the use of fixed-price contracts for the production of major weapon systems, with limited exceptions. Similarly, section 818 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2007 establishes a preference for the use of fixed-price contracts for the development of major weapon systems.

What is your understanding of the advantages and disadvantages of using fixed-price contracts for the development and procurement of major weapon systems?

Answer. The decision to use a fixed price or cost plus contract for development and/or procurement of a major weapons system should be based on an understanding of the requirement, the technical risk, supplier experience and strength, and the market for the product. Fixed price contracts limit the Government's exposure to financial risk, but introduce other risks.

Development fixed-price contracts make sense where we have firm requirements with technical trades complete, where design is established and required technologies are mature (low risk), where potential bidders have actual experience with the type of product desired and where they have the capacity to absorb some level of financial loss if problems arise. In this instance it is appropriate to place the financial burden on industry. The disadvantage is if the development effort experiences problems, there can be serious financial impact for the contractor. Further, because of the fixed price nature of the arrangement, it is much more difficult for the Government to provide technical guidance without having to renegotiate the contract.

For procurement I'm much more comfortable with fixed price contracts provided there has been sufficient development and testing to have firm requirements, a proven design, established manufacturing processes and qualified suppliers. Use of incentive contracts in early production especially makes sense.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it is appropriate for the Department to use a cost-type contract for the development or production of a major weapon system?

Answer. Since most major weapon system development programs deal with maturing designs and significant integration problems, the factors I listed in the above question are not present and a fixed price development contract imposes too much risk on industry. A cost plus contract, on the other hand, reduces the financial risk and helps facilitate a more open working relationship with industry to achieve the desired outcome for the warfighter.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes in the law governing the use of fixed-price contracts for the development and production of major weapon systems?

Answer. No. The Federal Acquisition Regulation and the DOD Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement already provide adequate flexibilities.

TECHNOLOGY TRANSITION

Question. The Department continues to struggle with the transition of new technologies into existing programs of record and major weapons systems and platforms. Further, the Department also has struggled with moving technologies from DOD programs or other sources rapidly into the hands of operational users.

What impediments to technology transition do you see within the Department?

Answer. Over the past 2 years, as part of Deputy Secretary of Defense's Warfighter Senior Integration group, I have seen improvements in transitioning technology to the hands of the operator. However, there are still impediments, such as the lead time and rigidity of the budget process, the formality and inflexibility associated with Programs of Record, the difficulties in altering military requirements, and the hurdles small businesses and non-defense companies have in doing business with the Government.

Question. What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to enhance the effectiveness of technology transition efforts?

Answer. There are already a number of activities underway in the Department to enhance the effectiveness of technology transition. The rapid acquisition programs that the Department has initiated to support ongoing operations have been very successful at acquiring new technologies and fielding them quickly.

The Department needs to institutionalize the rapid acquisition process so that future urgent needs can also be met effectively, and efforts are underway for expanding the rapid acquisition of Joint Urgent Operational Needs (JUONs) from primarily off the shelf technology to those that require some limited development time and may not be directly associated with ongoing operations.

Under the BBP initiatives, the Department has taken steps to improve the use of open systems and open architectures as a means of permitting new technologies to be inserted into existing programs. These are just examples of the types of steps the Department needs to take to improve technology transition.

If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L) and Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering to drive additional opportunities to enhance technology transition.

Question. What role do you believe Technology Readiness Levels and Manufacturing Readiness Levels should play in the Department's efforts to enhance effective technology transition and reduce cost and risk in acquisition programs?

Answer. Technology and Manufacturing Readiness Levels (TRLs and MRLs) are aids to understand how the maturity of technologies or the lack of maturity can affect an acquisition programs risk. I believe they are valuable knowledge-based benchmarks against which to assess program risk, but I also believe that TRLs and MRLs alone are not conclusive about whether or not a program should proceed to development and production. Each decision requires an understanding of the actual risk associated with a technology, and the steps that could be taken to mitigate that risk. If confirmed, I will continue to use TRLs and MRLs, but I will also seek to improve how we handle risk assessments early in programs.

Question. Section 1073 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 established a competitive, merit-based rapid innovation fund to accelerate the fielding of technologies developed pursuant to SBIR projects, technologies developed by the defense laboratories, and other innovative technologies.

What is your view of the rapid innovation fund established by section 1073?

Answer. This program emphasizes rapid, responsive acquisition with preference to small, innovative businesses solving defense problems using a fully merit-based, competitive proposal process. In September 2011, the Department issued the initial solicitations for Rapid Innovation Fund (RIF) proposals, receiving over 3,500 responses, which lead to awards of 177 contracts by the end of September 2012. Given that the performance period for the majority of these contracts spans 18–24 months, my view is that it is too early to determine the RIF's overall impact. Our implementation processes were successful in obtaining proposals, primarily from small businesses. However, contract awards should not be the sole criteria for success. I believe it will take more time to objectively assess the effectiveness of RIF in achieving its goals.

Question. In your view, has the Department been successful in ensuring that awards under this program are made on a merit basis and benefit the Department?

Answer. Yes, the Department successfully established a merit-based Rapid Innovation Fund (RIF) program. The Department employed Broad Agency Announcements in 2011 and 2012 for a competitive, two-step source selection process. This facilitated submission of white papers, with a "go/no go" evaluation, followed by request for full proposals to the highest rated "go" proposals. All vendors received a notification. With regard to program benefit, it will be at least 12–24 months before the Department can effectively evaluate the outcome and benefits of RIF. However, owing to the in-depth involvement by acquisition program staff in evaluation of RIF proposals, I expect substantial benefits to be demonstrated.

UNREALISTIC COST, SCHEDULE, AND PERFORMANCE EXPECTATIONS

Question. Many acquisition experts attribute the failure of DOD acquisition programs to a cultural bias that routinely produces overly optimistic cost and schedule estimates and unrealistic performance expectations. Section 201 of WSARA seeks to address this problem by promoting early consideration of trade-offs among cost, schedule, and performance objectives in major defense acquisition programs.

Do you believe that early communication between the acquisition, budget and requirements communities in DOD can help ensure more realistic cost, schedule, and performance expectations?

Yes, early communication between these three communities is essential at all levels

Question. If so, what steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to ensure such communication?

Answer. If confirmed, I would reinforce existing efforts in the area of early communication between the communities. I will work with the component acquisition executives to stress the importance of their participation in similar early discussions for all acquisitions in their organizations. I will also stress the need to forge closer collaboration and understanding between those articulating military needs and those charged with fulfilling those needs. After early consideration of cost and capability trade-offs, I will strive to sustain stable programs through mechanisms such as Configuration Control Boards, and other forums where requirement, acquisition, and financial communities can interact usefully to achieve affordable and realistic outcomes. I will also foster training that inculcates these approaches into the culture of our workforce.

Question. DOD has increasingly turned to incremental acquisition and spiral development approaches in an effort to make cost, schedule and performance expectations more realistic and achievable.

Do you believe that incremental acquisition and spiral development can help improve the performance of the Department's major acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes, but I recognize this is not a panacea, and how these approaches are applied to a particular situation requires careful deliberation. The strategy can be effective when faced with technology that is rapidly changing or we are faced with an evolving threat. It can also allow the fielding of a capability to the force that is "good enough" in the short-term, while continuing to advance a new technology to upgrade the system to provide the warfighter with a technical advantage long-term.

Question. What risks do you see in the Department's use of incremental acquisition and spiral development?

Answer. Applied appropriately, in the right circumstances, these approaches should not add additional risk. Technical risk can be minimized with a design that allows for incremental addition of capability, but this must be inherent in the program plans from the outset so that upgrades to the final configuration are as seamless as possible, or rolled into the product as changes in the production sequence. These approaches require careful consideration of technical rights, open or commercial standards, and interface requirements. If requirements are not clearly defined early in the effort, schedules are not realistic and resources are not provided in the required amount and with the proper phasing, the acquisition will take longer, cost more, and deliver less, regardless of the program's execution method.

Question. In your view, has the Department's approach to incremental acquisition and spiral development been successful? Why or why not?

Answer. I believe that the Department's approach to incremental acquisition and spiral development has had varied results. As with any approach, there are examples of both effective and ineffective employment of this type of acquisition process in the Department's history. It has been more challenging than expected in certain cases to "pre-plan" future spirals of capability. Employed carefully, in the right circumstances, these approaches can be successful and if confirmed, I would work to achieve that.

FUNDING AND REQUIREMENTS STABILITY

Question. The poor performance of major defense acquisition programs has also been attributed to instability in funding and requirements. In the past, DOD has attempted to provide greater funding stability through the use of multi-year contracts. Section 814 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 requires the use of Configuration Steering Boards to exercise control over any changes to requirements that would increase program costs.

Do you support the use of Configuration Steering Boards to increase requirements stability on major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes. Activities such as Configuration Steering Boards provide a leadership forum to review proposed changes to programs in terms of requirements, technology, or system configuration with the intent to preclude adverse program impacts on cost or schedule. If confirmed, I will continue to emphasize the positive aspects of Configuration Steering Boards and other similar forums.

Question. What other steps if any would you recommend taking to increase the funding and requirements stability of major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with senior leaders in DOD to strive to maintain funding and requirement stability to the maximum extent possible. The acquisition, requirements, and resource communities must work together to ensure programs have realistic requirements and funding profiles at inception, and must continue to work effectively together as programs execute throughout the lifecycle.

MULTI-YEAR CONTRACTS

Question. The statement of managers accompanying section 811 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008 addresses the requirements for buying major defense systems under multi-year contracts as follows: "The conferees agree that 'substantial savings' under section 2306b(a)(1) of title 10, U.S.C., means savings that exceed 10 percent of the total costs of carrying out the program through annual contracts, except that multi-year contracts for major systems providing savings estimated at less than 10 percent should only be considered if the Department presents an exceptionally strong case that the proposal meets the other requirements of section 2306b(a), as amended. The conferees agree with a Government Accountability Office (GAO) finding that any major system that is at the end of its production line is unlikely to meet these standards and therefore would be a poor candidate for a multi-year procurement contract."

If confirmed, under what circumstances, if any, do you anticipate that you would support a multi-year contract with expected savings of less than 10 percent?

Answer. Though each situation is different, I believe that multi-year contracts can provide substantial cost savings and should be considered as an option to best serve the warfighter and taxpayer. Key considerations would be the total savings that could be achieved and the firmness of the procurement plan. While 10 percent or more is the goal, it should not be an absolute standard; a lesser percent on a large procurement still yields significant dollar savings for the Department. If the Department is confident that the procurement is needed during the time period, then every opportunity for potential savings and increasing buying power will be critical in balancing the Department's budget as budgets decline.

Question. If confirmed, under what circumstances, if any, would you support a multi-year contract for a major system at the end of its production line?

Answer. I would have to review the merits of the particular situation since these are complex circumstances without simple answers, and there may be times it may be appropriate. In general, I would look for the total savings potential and stability in the planned procurement.

Question. What are your views on multi-year procurements? Under what circumstances do you believe they should be used?

Answer. I believe multi-year procurements are beneficial if they provide significant savings to the taxpayer, and there is a firm commitment to the planned procurement to provide stability to the industrial base. The circumstances and risks of each case need to be weighed carefully on the individual merits, but the magnitude of the savings and the expected stability of the program are among primary considerations.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, should DOD ever break a multi-year procurement?

Answer. I would expect such a circumstance to be very unusual, but in the rare situation when it occurs, it could be an outcome of a decision to not to fund a program due to unanticipated budget cuts forcing the Department to reprioritize, an inability of the contractor to perform so another supplier must be arranged for, or an unanticipated threat that makes the program unneeded. If confirmed, I would continue to support the Federal laws and defense contracting regulations concerning multi-year procurement.

CONTINUING COMPETITION AND ORGANIZATIONAL CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

Question. Section 202 of WSARA requires DOD to take steps to promote continuing competition (or the option of such competition) throughout the life of major defense acquisition programs.

What is your view on the utility of continuing competition as a tool to achieve long-term innovation and cost savings on major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Competition is the Department's most effective tool to reduce prices, and DOD should use direct competitive acquisition strategies whenever possible. Competition allows the Department to leverage innovation, science and technology, design, and drive efficiency through a program's lifecycle, providing a stronger return on investment. The Department should attempt to use this paradigm as much as possible in its programs and contracting strategies. Using the BBP initiatives, we have stressed the need for a competitive environment to the greatest extent possible in all our programs, realizing the classical head to head competition situation is not always viable. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) to continue to stress creating a competitive environment as one of the most effective ways the Department has of controlling cost.

Question. Do you believe that such continuing competition is a viable option on major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes, creating competition at both the prime and sub-contract level is among one of the most powerful tools available to the Department to drive productivity and control cost. To ensure that competition is emphasized during each phase of the acquisition process, the Department has issued policy requiring our Program Managers to present a competition strategy at each program milestone. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) and Component Acquisition Executives to ensure this policy is effectively executed.

Question. In your view, has the consolidation of the defense industrial base gone too far and undermined competition for defense contracts?

Answer. The consolidation of the defense industrial base has left us with a limited number of prime contractors. Further consolidation at the prime contractor level is probably not in the best interest of the taxpayer or the Department. If confirmed, I will review any proposed business deal objectively on its merits and provide my input to the USD(AT&L). I expect to see increased activity in mergers and acquisitions in the lower tiers of the industrial base, and even consolidations to further streamline capabilities and respond in a market-driven manner to the reduced budgets anticipated over the coming decade. The USD(AT&L) and I will examine these transactions carefully on a case-by-case basis to preserve competition and facilitate the most efficient and effective industrial base possible.

Question. If so, what steps if any can and should DOD take to address this issue?

Answer. The Department's policy is to allow market forces to shape the market except in those cases that eliminate competition and are not ultimately in the best interest of the Department and taxpayer. The Department discourages mergers and acquisitions among defense materiel suppliers that are anti-competitive or injurious to national security. The Department is not, however, an antitrust regulator and the ability for the other regulatory agencies to intervene must meet statutory criteria. In cases of concern, I would ensure the Department provides information and support needed to the antitrust regulators for their merger reviews. I would also seek to encourage new entrants or exploration of alternatives in cases where consolidation has resulted in a loss of competition.

Question. Section 203 of WSARA requires the use of competitive prototypes for major defense acquisition programs unless the cost of producing such prototypes would exceed the lifecycle benefits of improved performance and increased technological and design maturity that prototypes would achieve.

Do you support the use of competitive prototypes for major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes. Competitive prototyping can be an effective mechanism for maturing technology, refining performance requirements, and improving our understanding of how those requirements can drive systems acquisition costs. They should be used primarily as a means of reducing future risk in the Engineering and Manufacturing Development (EMD) and production phase. There are cases however when the cost in time and money associated with competitive prototypes outweighs the potential benefits

Question. Under what circumstances do you believe the use of competitive prototypes is likely to be beneficial?

Answer. Competitive prototyping is risk reduction; however, this comes with a tradeoff of cost and schedule. Like all other risk reduction techniques, competitive prototyping has to be considered on a case-by-case basis and it has to reduce the risk of entering Engineering and Manufacturing Development (EMD). The level of risk depends on the maturity of candidate technologies, and more importantly, the risk associated with integrating those technologies into a viable product. When planned or proposed technology has implementation risk, particularly in an integrated product, and has not been demonstrated adequately, competitive prototyping during the technology development phase can be a key element of a comprehensive technical risk management process. Overall, competitive prototyping can provide benefits beyond risk reduction to include sustaining competition further into the design process, reducing total program cost, and lead to better products for our warfighters.

Question. Under what circumstances do you believe the cost of such prototypes is likely to outweigh the potential benefits?

Answer. In cases where the material solution is based on mature technologies and demonstrated designs with little integration risk, the additional costs, and schedule of competitive prototyping may not offset the potential reduction of risk and overall system lifecycle costs. Prototypes requiring very high investments with the prospect of very limited production runs are also not likely to be cost effective. For example, competitive prototyping of ships and satellites is frequently cost-prohibitive, both in a Technology Demonstration phase and in Engineering and Manufacturing Development phase. When a low risk approach is taken such as using a modified non-developmental item the benefits of competitive prototyping may not justify the cost.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE WEAPON SYSTEMS ACQUISITION REFORM ACT OF 2009

Question. Several new major weapons programs have been started since the WSARA was enacted. Examples include the Ohio-class Submarine Replacement Program, the KC–46 Aerial Refueling Tanker Replacement Program, the VXX Presidential Helicopter Replacement Program, and the Ground Combat Vehicle Program.

In your view, how effectively have such "new start" major defense acquisition programs abided by the tenets, and implemented the requirements, of the WSARA, particularly those that address "starting programs off right" by requiring that early investment decisions be informed by realistic cost estimates, sound systems engineering knowledge, and reliable technological risk assessments?

Answer. I believe the Department has abided by the tenets and effectively implemented the requirements of WSARA in each of its "new start" programs begun since WSARA's enactment. The certifications required by WSARA provide a means to enforce each program's implementation. Each of the new start programs cited above received careful attention to develop well understood and technically achievable requirements with a sharp focus on affordability. I strongly believe that the keys to successful program execution are sound and realistic planning at program initiation, which are fundamental principles embodied in WSARA.

Question. Where do you think there might be room for improvement?

Answer. I believe WSARA provides adequate guidance and authority without the need for changes at this time. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) and ensure the "new start" programs implement WSARA and BBP initiatives to maximize the program's probability of successfully delivering affordable, technically sound capability to the warfighter and the taxpayer. Fundamentally, the BBP initiatives that Deputy Secretary Carter and Under Secretary Kendall started are based on the premise that the Department can learn from experience and continuously improve. If confirmed, I will work to identify and implement continuous improvements to the acquisition system.

THE BETTER BUYING POWER INITIATIVE

Question. DOD's Better Buying Power initiative provides acquisition professionals with important guidance on how to achieve greater efficiency, enhanced productivity, and affordability in how the Department procures goods and services.

If confirmed, what steps if any will you take to follow-through on this guidance and ensure that it is implemented as intended?

Answer. I will work closely with USD(AT&L) on a daily basis as we continue to pursue the efficiency, productivity, and affordability initiatives started in 2010 under BBP. The BBP initiatives are not static, they are under continuous review and are being modified, added to, and matured as the Department learns more from its experience with the initiatives. If confirmed, I will follow-through on implementation of the initiatives and carefully consider additional steps consistent with the principles and objectives of the initiatives.

Question. What steps do you believe the Department should take to strengthen and improve the implementation of the BBP initiative?

Answer. The Department is fully dedicated to the successful implementation of BBP. Under Secretary Kendall recently introduced BBP 2.0 as part of the Department's commitment to continuous process improvement in the defense acquisition system. Many of the initiatives encompassed in BBP 2.0 are continuations from earlier BBP initiatives begun in 2010, because their implementation is long-term and ongoing. If confirmed, I will work closely with USD(AT&L), the Component Acquisition Executives, and others in the Department to monitor and drive the implementation of these initiatives, as well as identify additional ways to improve implementation. I will ensure we update appropriate policies and regulations, issue additional guidance, update training, and institute data collection mechanisms to objectively assess outcomes.

URGENT AND EMERGING NEEDS

Question. Section 804 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 required the Department to establish procedures to ensure that rapid acquisition processes are not misused for the acquisition of systems and capabilities that are not urgent and would be more appropriately acquired in accordance with normal acquisition procedures.

Do you agree that rapid acquisition procedures are not generally suited to the acquisition of complex systems that require substantial development effort, are based on technologies that are unproven, and are too risky to be acquired under fixed price contracts?

Answer. I agree that rapid acquisition procedures are not generally intended for programs of the complexity normal for a standard developmental acquisition program. The Department reserves rapid acquisition procedures for urgent requirements where a capability must be delivered as soon as possible, but generally within 24 months. These programs, by their nature, are not sustained development programs. They generally have limited cost risk as compared to traditional major development efforts, and if a nondevelopmental solution exists, it makes sense to acquire that solution in order to meet warfighter needs as soon as possible. However, for many Joint Urgent Operational Needs (JUONs) and Joint Emergent Operational Needs (JEONs), some modification, integration, or development of existing products is required to satisfy the requirement. Not all of these programs are suitable for fixed price contracts because they often utilize small, non-traditional suppliers who are not capable of absorbing the cost risks.

These issues are considered when the requirement is initially validated, and the acquisition community continues to review them as the program progresses to ensure that we meet warfighter requirements in as timely way wherever possible. There may also be exceptional cases where a technological leap by an adversary may call for taking unusual risks not normally typified under rapid acquisition procedures. If confirmed, I will review the Department's use of rapid acquisition procedures to ensure that they are being properly applied.

Question. DOD recently established a new category of requirement, known as Joint Emergent Operational Needs (JEON). Like JUONs, JEONs may be acquired through rapid fielding processes. Unlike JUONs, however, JEONs are not limited to capabilities that can be fielded within 2 years, do not require extensive development, are based on proven technologies, and can be appropriately acquired through fixed price contracts. The committee report on the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 directs the Department to develop additional protections to ensure that the JEON process is not abused.

Would you agree that it would be inappropriate to use the JEON process to initiate significant acquisition programs without conducting cost-schedule-performance trade-offs, developing reasonable cost, schedule, and performance expectations, providing strong systems engineering, and ensuring the use of appropriately mature technologies?

Answer. In general, I agree that a JEON is not intended as a mechanism to initiate a Major Defense Acquisition Program. There may be exceptions in which a rapid development initiated as a JEON (or even a Joint Urgent Operational Need (JUON)) could lead to significant acquisition programs. For example, route clearance vehicles acquired in response to a JUON provided the first V-shaped hulled vehicles to Iraq and Afghanistan. Their success in theater led to the initiation of additional JUONs that resulted in a significant acquisition program—the MRAP class of vehicle.

I understand that it is important to evaluate cost, schedule and performance trade-offs for JEON solutions because doing so is critical to responding to these requirements in a way that is consistent with their urgency. Systems engineering, cost and performance tradeoffs, and addressing technical maturity for JEONs, within the time available, is critical to ensuring we deliver sufficient capability when it is needed. The Department tailors its acquisition processes to ensure we address these important considerations while meeting the warfighter's immediate need. If confirmed, I will review the Department's handling of JEONs to ensure the appropriate procedures are in place and are being followed.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the Department develops additional guidance for JEONs, in accordance with the direction of the committee report on the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013?

Answer. Yes.

CONTRACTING FOR SERVICES

Question. By most estimates, the Department now spends more for the purchase of services than it does for products (including major weapon systems). After a decade of rapid growth, section 808 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 placed a cap on DOD spending for contract services for fiscal years 2012 and 2013. Section 955 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires a 5 percent reduction in spending for contract services over the next 5 years.

Do you believe that DOD can do more to reduce spending on contract services?

Answer. Yes, that is why I strongly support USD(AT&L) and Department leadership in continuing to make this a priority as indicated in USD(AT&L)'s November 13, 2012, memorandum entitled, "Better Buying Power (BBP) 2.0: Continuing the Pursuit for Greater Efficiency and Productivity in Defense Spending". Through the initiatives that began under the original BBP in 2010, BBP 2.0 will focus on initiatives to improve our stewardship over service contracts, while ensuring the Department only acquires what it truly needs as economically as possible.

Question. Do you believe that the current balance between government employees (military and civilian) and contractor employees is in the best interests of DOD?

Answer. I believe the Department must routinely assess its Total Force mix to ensure an appropriate alignment of workload to military, civilian, and contract support. This alignment is driven by many variables, it takes time to rebalance, and is likely to change based on mission, operating environment, workload, and costs. I think we must ensure that we have a properly sized and highly capable government workforce that guards against an erosion of critical, organic skills and an overreliance on contracted services, particularly in such areas as acquisition program management, information technology, and financial management. However, the Department must also recognize the contributions and value of the private sector as a vital source of expertise, innovation, and support to the Department's Total Force. If confirmed, I will continue to support the administration's and Department's focus on ensuring our utilization of contracted support is appropriate given the nature of the mission, risks, and work required.

Question. What steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to control the Department's spending on contract services and ensure that the Department complies with the requirements of section 808 and section 955?

Answer. USD(AT&L) is continuing to make the acquisition of services a priority as part of his broader BBP initiatives. Through the initiatives that began under the original BBP in 2010, there will be a focus on initiatives to improve our stewardship over service contracts. If confirmed, I will support every effort to continue the Department's effort to comply with the requirements of sections 808 and 955. The Deputy Secretary of Defense has issued guidance to the Department on how to comply with the limitation on funds for contracted services imposed by section 808. Subsequently, a class deviation to the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement (DFARS) implementing that guidance has been issued on July 31, 2012.

Question. Would you recommend the use of fixed price contracts as the preferred contracting method for services? If not, why not?

Answer. I would recommend that for service requirements that can be expressed in performance-based terms, with a defined output, the Department use fixed-priced contracts as the preferred method. However, contract type must be tailored to each particular requirement in order to influence desired results with the contracted service provided. For example, where contracted support is level of effort in nature, with no defined output, a cost plus fixed fee arrangement may likely be an appropriate approach. If confirmed I will support efforts to continue to address the determination of appropriate contract type as a key element of consideration in the review and approval process of acquisition strategies for service requirements.

Question. Under what circumstances do you believe that fixed price contracts should or should not be used for the purchases of services?

Answer. I would recommend fixed price contracts be used for work that can be expressed in performance-based terms that has a defined output.

Question. Section 812 of the NDAA for 2007 required DOD to develop a management structure for the procurement of contract services. Sections 807 and 808 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008 (subsequently codified in section 2330a of title 10, U.S.C.) require DOD to develop inventories and conduct management reviews of contracts for services.

Do you believe the Department is providing appropriate stewardship over service contracts?

Answer. Yes I do, but recognize there is room for further improvement in the Department's stewardship. If confirmed, I would strongly support USD(AT&L) and Department leadership in continuing to make this a priority in the BBP initiatives, which focus on initiatives to improve our stewardship over service contracts.

Question. Do you believe that the Department has appropriate management structures in place to oversee the expenditure of more than $150 billion a year for contract services?

Answer. Yes, though they can continue to be improved and expanded upon. The Military Departments, DLA, and the Missile Defense Agency, which have the largest portion share of the Department's expenditures on the acquisition of services, have identified a Senior Service Manager who is responsible for overseeing all acquisition of services. These Senior Service Managers are responsible for identifying and implementing more effective methods to procure required services and meeting on a regular basis to share lessons learned and best practices. Each of these Senior Service Managers has developed its own organizational structure and mechanisms to provide the appropriate oversight, management structure and review process for the acquisition of services. In addition, all acquisitions for services which exceed $1 billion are reviewed and approved by the Director, Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy and his staff to ensure that the strategy incorporates tenets the Department has established as requirements for the effective acquisition of services.

Question. Do you support the use of management reviews, or peer reviews, of major service contracts to identify "best practices" and develop lessons learned?

Answer. Yes, I believe that the Peer Review process that the Department has employed on the acquisition of services implemented for service contracts, and other major acquisitions, has been extremely beneficial. For acquisitions of services valued at $1 billion or more, a Peer Review team, comprised primarily of senior leaders and attorneys from outside the military department or defense agency whose procurement is the subject of the review, meet with acquisition teams to critically assess whether the acquisition process for services was well understood by both government and industry individuals. Similarly, military departments and defense agencies have developed and are executing plans to accomplish Peer Reviews within their respective organizations for acquisitions valued at less than $1 billion. The Peer Review process helps the Department to influence consistency of approach, ensure the quality of contracting, and drive cross-sharing of ideas such as best practices and lessons learned.

Question. If confirmed, will you fully comply with the requirement of section 2330a, to develop an inventory of services performed by contractors comparable to the inventories of services performed by Federal employees that are already prepared pursuant to the Federal Acquisition Inventory Reform (FAIR) Act?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Section 863 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 requires DOD to establish a process for identifying, assessing, reviewing, and validating requirements for the acquisition of contract services.

What is the status of the Department's efforts to implement the requirements of section 863?

Answer. On March 4, 2012, the Deputy Secretary of Defense sent a memorandum to the Secretaries of the Military Departments and the Directors of the Defense Agencies directing they submit their respective processes and initial implementation plans to fulfill the requirements of section 863. The components have now submitted their plans through the Director of Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy.

Question. What steps remain to be taken, and what schedule has the Department established for taking these steps?

Answer. The BBP initiatives recently announced by USD(AT&L) includes as a new initiative to expand the use of requirements review boards and tripwires. This initiative recognizes that a more robust process is required to identify, assess, review, and validate requirements for contracted services. Implementation details are expected in the coming weeks. If confirmed, I will support vigorous implementation.

Question. What additional steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to improve the Department's management of its contracts for services?

Answer. Consistent with statutory requirements for management oversight and control processes and the requirements in the original BBP memorandum of September 14, 2010, the components have put in place a framework to manage the acquisition of services. The components have each established a senior manager for services acquisitions. If confirmed, I would continue to support the Director of Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy in developing, for the Under Secretary's approval, a new Department of Defense Instruction (DODI) to govern the acquisition of services to replace and expand upon existing guidance in DODI 5000.02, Enclosure 9. Further, I would support rigorous oversight of these policies, once put in place.

CONTRACTOR PERFORMANCE OF CRITICAL GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS

Question. Over the last decade, the Department has become progressively more reliant upon contractors to perform functions that were once performed exclusively by government employees. As a result, contractors now play an integral role in areas as diverse as the management and oversight of weapons programs, the development of personnel policies, and the collection and analysis of intelligence. In many cases, contractor employees work in the same offices, serve on the same projects and task forces, and perform many of the same functions as DOD employees. Section 1706 of title 10, U.S.C., as added by section 824 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, requires that key positions on major defense acquisition programs be filled by full-time government employees.

In your view, has DOD become too reliant on contractors to support the basic functions of the Department?

Answer. I recognize that the private sector is, and will continue to be, a vital source of expertise, innovation, and support. DOD, which relies on an all-volunteer military force, cannot operate without the support of contractors. We must also maintain a properly sized, and highly capable, government workforce that guards against an erosion of critical, organic skills and an overreliance on contracted services. If confirmed, I will continue to support the administration's and Department's focus on ensuring our utilization of contracted support is appropriate given the nature of the mission, risks, and work required.

Question. Do you believe that the current extensive use of personal services contracts is in the best interest of the Department of Defense?

Answer. Generally, I do believe that personal service contracts, established in accordance with the applicable statues, are in the best interest of the Department. I recognize that certain requirements, such as limited use of medical care providers, may be appropriately fulfilled using personal service contracts. However, I also recognize that service contracts that have been categorized as nonpersonal contracts may inappropriately evolve into personal service arrangements in practice. If confirmed, I will work to address this risk and enforce the limits on use of personal service contracts.

Question. What is your view of the appropriate applicability of personal conflict of interest standards and other ethics requirements to contractor employees who perform functions similar to those performed by Government employees?

Answer. When it is appropriate for contractors to perform work that is similar to work performed by government employees, my view is that those contractor employees should be held to similar ethical and conflict of interest standards as the government employees they support. In particular, they should not be allowed to misuse the information which may be available to them as a result of their performance under a DOD contract.

WARTIME CONTRACTING

Question. The number of U.S. contractor employees in Afghanistan now substantially exceeds the number of U.S. military deployed in that country.

Do you believe that the Department of Defense has become too dependent on contractor support for military operations?

Answer. At this time, I do not believe the Department is too dependent on contractors in support of military operations. The Total Force is comprised of U.S. military forces, DOD civilians, and our DOD contractor partners. We live in a constrained resource environment and future operations will continue to use this Total Force. Military force structure is fixed by law, and we concentrate military manpower on combat capabilities and selected tasks that are inherently governmental. In addition, deployable DOD civilians also handle inherently governmental tasks. Military planners typically assign the remaining tasks to other elements of the total force, many of which are appropriate for contractor support. Contractors are force multipliers, performing non-inherently governmental functions, and allowing limited military resources to focus on what they are trained to do. Going forward, our management of contractors in support of military operations requires constant attention and review to continue to identify management improvements.

Question. What risks do you see in the Department's reliance on such contractor support? What steps do you believe the Department should take to mitigate such risk?

Answer. The risks associated with a heavy reliance on contractor support include possible loss of selected services for future contingencies in changed operational environments, the migration of inherently governmental functions to contractors, the erosion of the Department's critical core knowledge and capability, and the risk of losing contingency contract management expertise and structure that has been established over the last several years. I will ensure we conduct risk assessments associated with reliance on contract support in a variety of contingency operations to ensure the risks are addressed and mitigated. The Department must properly incorporate enduring polices, training, and doctrine to alleviate these risks. If confirmed, I will support the additional steps to integrate contractor support estimates into existing planning processes and procedures, and in force planning scenario development and joint force assessments.

Question. Do you believe the Department is appropriately organized and staffed to effectively manage contractors on the battlefield?

Answer. Yes, though each situation will be different, and this was not always the case. We are constantly improving our processes and procedures based on feedback from commanders in the field, congressional support, and suggestions from our service providers. The Department is aggressively operational contract support constructs to better manage contractors on the battlefield. This approach incorporates Requirement Definitions, as prescribed by Congress; Risk Management; and Operational Contingency Management practices that include consideration of contingency contractors and operational support capabilities in mission planning and execution.

Question. Section 848 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011, section 820 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, and section 845 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 establish planning requirements for contractor logistics support.

What is the status of the Department's efforts to implement the requirements of sections 848, 820, and 845?

Answer. As required by section 820, contractors have been recognized as part of the Total Force, in addition to military and DOD civilians, in the appropriate strategic documents including the Quadrennial Defense Review and relevant policy and planning documents. Additionally, section 820 risk assessments on the use of contractors are being conducted, and contractors are being integrated into force mix evaluations and operational planning, including the biennial risk assessments by the Chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff. Over the past 6 years the Department has made far reaching improvements in the management and oversight of contractors to include contractor officer representative training, instruction in our senior service colleges, and in the General Officer/Flag Officer Capstone training. Strategically, the Operational Contracting Support Functional Capabilities Integration Board (FCIB) governance structure oversees continuing efforts to meet requirements outlined in section 845, as well as, requirements in previous legislation, the findings of the Commission on Wartime Contracting, and the Gansler Commission.

Question. What additional steps do you believe the Department needs to take to improve its planning processes for the use of contractors in contingency operations?

Answer. As required by law, we continue to refine contractor support requirements definition, the contingency program management organization, and related processes to ensure all needs are captured to avoid unnecessary duplication of capabilities, and to ensure we are synchronized with our agency partners. The recent transition in Iraq and the pending transition in Afghanistan have provided us numerous lessons learned in these areas.

With regards to operational contracting support, the Joint Staff is finalizing their important update to Joint Publication 4–10, Operational Contract Support. Planners at each of the combatant commands have developed annexes for contracted support in key OPLANS and CONPLANS, and we are continuing to improve the plans for integrated contracted support at the service component level. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor their initiatives closely.

Question. Sections 841 and 842 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 gives the Department new tools to ensure that it does not enter contracts with any person or entity who is actively supporting hostile forces in Afghanistan.

What is the status of the Department's efforts to implement the requirements of sections 841 and 842?

Answer. The Department implemented sections 841 and 842 in the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement (DFARS) via the Class Deviation #2012–O0005 on January 26, 2012. The deviation adds two new clauses to the DFARS—252.225–7993, Prohibition on Contracting with the Enemy in the U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) Theater of Operations; and 252.225–7994, Additional Access to Contractor and Subcontractor Records in the U.S. Central Command Theater of Operations.

This class deviation allows the Heads of Contracting Activity (HCA) to exercise the authorities provided in the deviation, upon receipt of the enemy notification letter from the CENTCOM Commander, to restrict, terminate, or void contracts with persons or entities that support an insurgency or otherwise actively oppose U.S. or coalitions forces in Afghanistan. This deviation also grants contracting officers an additional access to any contractor's records, including subcontractors, regardless of contract value, to ensure Department's contracts are not subject to extortion or corruption. The CENTCOM Commander has issued four section 841 notifications to date, resulting in the termination of three subcontracts.

Question. What additional steps do you believe the Department needs to take to avoid contracting with the enemy in Afghanistan?

Answer. I believe sections 841 and 842 provide the Department sufficient statutory authorities to avoid contracting with the enemy in Afghanistan.

Question. Does the Department need additional tools for this purpose?

Answer. I believe the tools provided through sections 841 and 842 are sufficient to enable us to succeed in this area.

PRIVATE SECURITY CONTRACTORS

Question. Do you believe the Department of Defense and other Federal agencies should reduce their reliance on contractors to perform security functions that may reasonably be expected to require the use of deadly force in highly hazardous public areas in an area of combat operations?

Answer. I believe the use of private security contractors must be carefully considered against the risk of becoming involved in combat operations. I also believe it may be appropriate to use private security contractors for specific security functions in contingency operations when they are limited by specific rules of engagement. However, the Department of Defense must provide proper guidance and supervision when using private security contractors and must ensure they do not engage in combat operations.

Question. What steps if any would you take, if confirmed, to ensure that any private security contractors who may continue to operate in an area of combat operations act in a responsible manner, consistent with U.S. defense and foreign policy objectives?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department of Defense has policies that effectively guide the operations of private security contractors when they are used, and that we provide proper oversight. We must also ensure all contractors, to include private security contractors, are legally accountable for their actions, and that private security contractors that operate in an area of combat and contingency operations act responsibly.

Question. Section 846 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 requires the Department of Defense to undertake risk assessments and risk mitigation whenever it relies on contractors to perform critical functions in support of overseas contingency operations.

What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Department fully implements the requirements of section 846?

Answer. I believe that contract support is an essential part of the total force and will remain so in the future. In many cases contractors are absolutely vital. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Department of Defense policy and operational guidance addresses this requirement, and that proper risk assessments are conducted.

U.S. SPECIAL OPERATIONS COMMAND ACQUISITION AUTHORITIES

Question. U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) is unique within the DOD as the only unified command with acquisition authorities and funding. Further, the Commander of SOCOM is the only uniformed commander with a subordinate senior acquisition executive.

Would you recommend any changes to SOCOM's current acquisition authorities?

Answer. I would not recommend any changes at this time. If confirmed, I will support continued dialogue between SOCOM and USD(AT&L) to improve acquisition efficiency and effectiveness.

Question. What role do you believe SOCOM's development and acquisition activities should play in broader Service and Department of Defense efforts?

Answer. I believe the Department should always seek the broadest benefit and application of its development and acquisition activities. The best way for the Department to take advantage of potential synergies and identify best practices is through close coordination between SOCOM's activities and the broader Department acquisition system. This coordination would also help to eliminate duplication and control costs.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure that special operations capabilities and requirements are integrated into overall Department of Defense research, development and acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support the "SOCOM Acquisition Summit" that meets in person every 6 months to coordinate, collaborate, and integrate SOCOM's activities with the rest of the Department. This initiative, instituted by Deputy Secretary Carter and Under Secretary Kendall, has proven very beneficial to both SOCOM and the Department. I see the summit as important to ensure SOCOM's acquisition needs are understood and integrated with other Department efforts.

PASS-THROUGH CONTRACTS

Question. Section 852 of the John Warner NDAA for Fiscal Year 2007 requires the Department of Defense to promulgate regulations prohibiting excessive "pass-through" charges on DOD contracts. Section 802 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 adds the requirement for contracting officers to consider the availability of alternative contract vehicles before entering into pass-through contracts in the first place.

In your view, how extensive is the use of pass-through contracts in the Department of Defense and how important is it for the Department to reduce the use of such contracts?

Answer. To the extent that pass-through costs exist, I believe it is important to reduce these costs because of the complexity of the weapon systems being procured by the Department. Prime contractors generally need to subcontract a portion of the effort in order to provide the most effective overall response to the requirement. However, I do not believe that there are necessarily extensive pass through costs associated with these subcontracting efforts. In response to the requirements of section 852 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2007, the Federal Acquisition Regulations (FAR) were modified to require prime contractors to identify their intention to subcontract more than 70 percent of the total cost of work to be performed, and to provide a description of the added value being provided by the prime as related to the work to be performed by the proposed subcontractors.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to the requirements of section 852 and section 802 regarding pass-through contracts?

Answer. Per statute, the Secretary of Defense, Secretary of State (State), and the Administrator of U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) have 180 days from enactment to implement section 802 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 to issue guidance and implement regulations. A Federal Acquisition Regulation case, 2013–012, was established for this purpose. Until this guidance is developed via the regulatory rule making process, it is difficult to comment on changes required by either section.

Question. What additional steps, if any, do you believe the Department should take to address the problem of excessive pass-through charges?

Answer. At this time, I believe we should wait for the Departments of Defense, State, and USAID to develop the guidance and regulations required by section 802 to determine if any additional steps need to be taken.

INTERAGENCY CONTRACTING

Question. What is your assessment of the risks and benefits associated with DOD's continued extensive use of interagency contracts?

Answer. When used properly, interagency contracts can reduce procurement lead time, reduce administrative costs, and support strategic sourcing objectives. I believe DOD, in collaboration with numerous non-DOD agencies, the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, and Congress, have implemented processes and procedures that minimize the potential for inappropriate usage. I note on February 14, 2013, the GAO removed the Management of Interagency Contracting from their "2013 High Risk List". I believe this action reflects these efforts and acknowledges that the risk of inappropriate usage under interagency contracts has been significantly reduced.

Question. Do you believe additional authority or measures are needed to hold DOD or other agency personnel accountable for their use of inter-agency contracts?

Answer. No. I have not seen any information that current policies, statute or regulations are not adequate. DOD policy encourages the use of an interagency solution when it's the best procurement approach and is a good business decision for the Department. Recent changes to the Federal Acquisition Regulations have bolstered the documentation requirements when conducting an interagency acquisition.

Question. Do you believe contractors have any responsibility for assuring that the work requested by DOD personnel is within the scope of their contract?

Answer. Yes, I believe contractors should review any order they receive to ensure the supplies or services ordered by the Government are within the scope of the contract that the requirement is being placed under. However, the contracting officer has primary responsibility for ensuring the work is within the scope of the particular contract. If a contractor has any concern that the work ordered is not appropriate under the contract then they should contact the agency contracting officer who placed the order and request clarification.

Question. Do you believe that DOD's continued heavy reliance on outside agencies to award and manage contracts on its behalf is a sign that the Department has failed to adequately staff its own acquisition system?

Answer. No, on the contrary, Congress has provided authority for numerous agencies to provide acquisition support to others. These potential solutions provide DOD requirements, organizations, and contracting officers additional flexibility and opportunity, not previously available, to best meet warfighter and mission needs. The use of interagency solutions enhances the Department's efforts to run as efficiently and effectively as possible and is consistent with our BBP initiatives.

ACQUISITION OF INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY

Question. Most of the Department's Major Automated Information System (MAIS) acquisitions are substantially over budget and behind schedule. In particular, the Department has run into unanticipated difficulties with virtually every new business system it has tried to field in the last 10 years. Section 804 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2010 required the Department of Defense to establish a new acquisition process for information technology.

Do you believe that unique problems in the acquisition of business systems require different acquisition strategies or approaches?

Answer. Yes, some business systems require acquisition approaches different from those normally used by the Department to acquire weapons systems. Business systems acquisition approaches should be tailored to the product being acquired. Information technology developed by the software industry for the commercial sector is aligned to best practices for personnel management, finance and accounting, contract management, and the supply chain. In order to be adopted for use by DOD, emphasis needs to be placed on re-engineering Department business processes to align with best practices. The Department has already begun to adapt to the unique challenges of business information system acquisition through the implementation of the Business Capability Lifecycle (BCL), which emphasizes well defined increments of capability that are developed, tested, and often fielded in increments structured around 1–2 year software builds. In addition, this approach will also be incorporated in the revised DOD Instruction 5000.02. If confirmed, I will assess this further and continue to promote practices that support better acquisition decisions of business systems.

Question. What steps if any do you believe the Department of Defense should take to address these problems?

Answer. The Department has issued guidance requiring the use of the Business Capability Lifecycle (BCL) for the acquisition process for business systems, which is an important step for improving the acquisition process for business systems. Over the past year this approach has been mandated for all new start business systems that are above the statutory Major Automated Information System (MAIS) threshold. In addition, this approach will also be incorporated in the revised DOD Instruction 5000.02. If confirmed, I will continue to support USD(AT&L) in his efforts to improve performance in this area and will continue to monitor the effectiveness of this approach to acquiring business systems to determine if further changes are needed.

Question. What steps has the Department taken to implement the requirements of section 804? What steps remain to be taken?

Answer. The Department continues to make progress implementing several of the key approaches outlined in section 804, specifically in the areas of Acquisition, Requirements, Testing and Certification, and Human Capital. We have implemented a framework for implementing a more flexible and streamlined process for the acquisition of business information systems to include the Business Capabilities Lifecycle. The Department's testing community has been working in collaboration with USD(AT&L) to incorporate an integrated testing, evaluation, and certification approach to reduce redundancies and improve the efficiency and effectiveness of testing on the Department's information systems. The Joint Staff continues to work efforts to include more streamlined requirements management and approval process for acquisition of information systems. A comprehensive review of Information Technology (IT) acquisition competencies is also currently being conducted by the Department's Chief Information Officer. This review will update the IT acquisition competencies to better define DOD critical skill sets. If confirmed, I will continue to assess these actions to ensure continued progress in these areas.

Question. If confirmed, how would you work with the Chief Information Officer of the Department of Defense to take these steps?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the DOD CIO, and I will ensure the OUSD(AT&L) staff and the DOD CIO staff work collaboratively to identify and take steps needed to improve the acquisition of IT based capabilities. Program Managers responsible for procuring IT have traditionally been charged with acquiring the infrastructure they need to support their assigned procurement. This is an essential area for the Department to achieve consistently better outcomes given the continuing rapid evolution of technology.

Question. Section 806 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 gives the Department of Defense new tools to address supply chain risk in the acquisition of information technology.

What is the status of the Department's efforts to implement the requirements of section 806?

Answer. The authorities provided by section 806 have the potential to significantly reduce risks associated with those who may have intentions to damage our systems and capabilities through the supply chain. We are working to exercise these authorities effectively. The Department has submitted a draft DFARS rule (2012–D050) in order to make use of the section 806 authority to the Defense Acquisition Regulation (DAR) Council. We anticipate the DFARS rule will next go to OMB with a request for an interim rule. In the meantime, we have been conducting table top exercises with the Services and Agencies to understand what implementation would look like, and documenting supporting tools and guidance.

Question. What additional steps do you believe the Department needs to take to address supply chain risk?

Answer. We must continue to incrementally refine and extend implementation of our Trusted Systems and Networks and Program Protection Planning strategies. The Department has developed a foundation for addressing supply chain risk in acquisition, and codified this in DODI 5000.02 program protection planning practice, as well as the DODI 5200.44 Trusted Systems and Networks policy, co-signed in November 2012 by USD(AT&L) and CIO. The Department will continue to implement these policies. No additional authorities are needed at this time to address supply chain risk management.

Question. Section 818 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 establishes new requirements for DOD and its contractors to detect and avoid the use of counterfeit electronic parts.

What steps has the Department taken to implement the requirements of section 818?

Answer. In March 2012, AT&L published overarching Counterfeit Prevention Guidance employing a risk-based approach to the detection, prevention, reporting, and disposal of counterfeit parts in accordance with NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 section 818. Additionally, we have drafted a Department-wide Counterfeit Prevention Policy based on the legislation and the March 2012 overarching guidance memorandum.

The Department has developed training and education programs which are available to DOD personnel and other Federal employees. The Department is also currently conducting a study into hardware (HW) and software (SW) assurance testing which will result in a state-of-the-art report on HW/SW testing tools/techniques by the end of 2013.

Question. What steps remain to be taken, and what schedule has the Department established for taking these steps?

Answer. We are nearing completion on a department-wide Counterfeit Prevention Policy based on the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012 section 818 legislation and the AT&L March 2012 overarching guidance memorandum with an estimated issue date in the second quarter of fiscal year 2013. We have also drafted three proposed rules currently making their way through the review and approval process: (1) DFARS case (2012–D055) "Detection and Avoidance of Counterfeit Electronic Parts", (2) a drafted FAR case (2013–002) "Expanded Reporting of Non-conforming Items", and (3) a proposed FAR case (2012–032), "Higher level Contract Quality Requirements." We expect publication of the three proposed rules for public comment in calendar year 2013. Meanwhile, we are modernizing the GIDEP system to improve functionality, data throughput, customer support functions, and the ability to accommodate international requirements.

Question. What additional steps do you believe the Department needs to take to address the problem of counterfeit electronic parts?

Answer. We will need to continue to collaborate with industry, law enforcement, Federal agencies, and OMB to develop strategies and acceptable global awareness standards to minimize the introduction of counterfeit parts in the DOD supply chain. The Department also needs to explore expanding the use of technology in combating this threat through detection and prevention of their items entering our supply chain. We continue to evaluate different identification technologies and quality control techniques, including enhancements in our test and inspection regime to better assure parts authenticity, and provide early identification of non-conforming materiel. We will continue to participate in industry-sponsored working groups, such as those hosted by the Aerospace Industry Association, the trade association for many of our prime suppliers, and the Society of Automotive Engineers, as we strive for "improved" commercially acceptable global sourcing standards.

Question. Some have argued that the current test and evaluation process does not appropriately address the unique circumstances applicable to the acquisition of information technology systems.

What steps if any do you believe the Department should take to improve the test and evaluation process for information technology systems, including their vulnerabilities in the face of a growing cybersecurity threat environment?

Answer. Information systems technologies exist throughout virtually every system the Department operates and produces. While information technology systems are currently tested as part of the acquisition process, the Department should explore the effectiveness of more efficient and tailored test strategies for each of these types of systems. For example, consideration should be given to earlier interoperability and cyber security testing to support the software development process. The Department should also seek to improve capabilities and approaches that promote a more continuous test approach that integrates developmental test, operational test, as well as certification and accreditation activities. If confirmed, I will work to improve our ability to test information technology systems.

CYBERSPACE-RELATED PROCUREMENT POLICY

Question. DOD's new strategic guidance highlights the increasing importance of cyber operations with respect to both defensive and offensive capabilities. As a result, this is one of the few areas in which the Department is proposing to increase its investments.

What acquisition challenges do you foresee that are unique to the procurement of cyber-related capabilities?

Answer. I foresee many dynamic challenges in this area. The Department recently instituted a new process for cyber acquisition to recognize and address these issues, and more effectively acquire capabilities for offensive and defensive cyberspace operations.

To keep pace with the threat and changing technologies, cyber related products must often go through the acquisition lifecycle of development, testing, and fielding on very short timelines. The challenge to acquiring cyber capabilities at the pace needed will be managing the risk while streamlining the acquisition process; accommodating the rapid pace of information technology changes; and maintaining a rapid pace while prudently evaluating operational performance prior to fielding. This requires timely collaboration across a very broad spectrum of stakeholders, including industry partners, to ensure appropriate results are achieved. If confirmed, I will work closely with USD(AT&L) to implement and refine the approaches to address these challenges.

Question. What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to address these unique challenges?

Answer. Section 933 of the Ike Skelton NDAA for Fiscal Year 2011 directed the Department to provide a strategy for the rapid acquisition of tools, applications, and other capabilities for cyber warfare. In response, the Department created a Cyber Investment Management Board (CIMB) and prescribed processes to meet urgent acquisition needs for cyber capabilities.

If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L) to help actively oversee the Department's cyber acquisition investments in cooperation with appropriate personnel across the Department. I will also work with other Federal agencies and with industry to address the challenge of acquiring cyber offense and defense capabilities, especially in the Defense Industrial Base as highlighted in the recent Executive Order on Critical Infrastructure and Presidential Policy Directive (PPD) 21—Critical Infrastructure Security and Resilience.

ACQUISITION WORKFORCE

Question. Section 852 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2008 established an Acquisition Workforce Development Fund to help the Department of Defense address shortcomings in its acquisition workforce. The fund was restructured and extended by section 803 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013.

Do you believe that the Acquisition Workforce Development Fund is still needed to ensure that DOD has the right number of employees with the right skills to run its acquisition programs in the most cost effective manner for the taxpayers?

Answer. Yes. The fund has enabled DOD to strengthen the workforce in many critical functions and is needed for continuous improvement of workforce skills and qualifications. The quality of the workforce and their efforts are vital to acquisition outcomes that support the warfighter while managing of taxpayer resources.

Question. If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure that the money made available through the Acquisition Workforce Fund is spent in a manner that best meets the needs of the Department of Defense and its acquisition workforce?

Answer. If confirmed, I will support USD(AT&L) as he works with senior acquisition leaders and the leadership of the Military Departments to wisely use the fund to implement strategic guidance and priorities, which include providing the right balance across various acquisition professional career fields, and improving the professionalism and qualifications of the workforce.

THE DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

Question. What is your view of the current state of the U.S. defense industry?

Answer. I believe the Department relies on a broad technical and industrial base that is far more global, commercial, and financially complex than ever before. For the past decade the defense industrial base has enjoyed a period of increasing budgets that is now at an end. In addition, financial uncertainty has caused firms to delay investment decisions and seek other markets. While I think our industrial base is currently strong, I am concerned about the impact that further defense budget cuts would have on the ability of the base to provide the broad range of products and services that the Department and our Nation need. If confirmed, the continuing health of the industrial base will be a high priority for me.

Question. Do you support further consolidation of the U.S. defense industry?

Answer. I believe that the expansion and consolidation of industries and companies at all tiers is the hallmark of a robust free market economy as it responds to the market forces. I expect, and encourage the free market to act when faced with changing demand signals. However, I also believe the Government must be watchful for consolidations that eliminate competition or cause market distortions. The Department's leadership, including Deputy Secretary Carter and Under Secretary Kendall, have indicated that further consolidation at the top tier would not be viewed favorably, though it is reasonable to expect continued mergers and acquisition in the lower tiers in response to anticipated reduced budgets. I believe that each individual case of consolidation, acquisition, or merger dealing with our defense firms must be examined carefully for what is best for the warfighter and the taxpayer, particularly with regard to its impact on competition.

Question. What is your position on foreign investment in the U.S. defense sector?

Answer. Foreign investment in our industrial base has generally benefitted the United States, including DOD, by providing needed capital and increasing access to leading-edge technologies. However, I believe foreign investment, particularly in the defense sector, can expose critical national defense-related technologies to risks, including the possible loss of intellectual property that gives our warfighters the technological edge they rely upon. Congress has put provisions in place to address critical national security concerns of this nature, including the Committee on Foreign Interests in the United States (CFIUS) led by the Department of the Treasury. If confirmed, I will continue DOD's commitment to its oversight function and to ensuring that national security concerns are addressed in transactions that involve foreign investments in the United States.

Question. What steps if any do you believe the Department of Defense should take to ensure the continued health of the U.S. defense industry?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure the sources of manufacturing and services that DOD relies on are capable of meeting our warfighters' requirements. I will ensure the Department proactively monitors the industrial base to identify risks that need to be addressed on a case-by-case basis. When necessary and as resources permit, the Department should be prepared to act to ensure that certain key industrial capabilities are sustained, although we must recognize this will not be possible in every case.

I believe the Department must simultaneously be receptive to industry's concerns and address their issues as effectively as possible, consistent with the Department's priorities and the resources available. I will also continue to make myself assessable to industry, as I always have, working closely and communicating to ensure that, as DOD makes changes necessary to adapt to a new set of strategic and budgetary challenges, it does not inadvertently jeopardize critical elements of the industrial base.

Question. What is your understanding of the status of the Department's ongoing Sector-by-Sector, Tier-by-Tier (S2T2) analysis of the defense industrial base?

Answer. In 2012 the Department tested the S2T2 analytical process with the Army M–1 Abrams program. It was a labor-intensive collaboration between OSD and the Army to identify the most critical and fragile capabilities in the industrial base, and develop a cost effective option for preserving the ability to support the current generation and next generation of ground vehicles. I note that this is a process, rather than a single analysis, and the Department has plans, which I would support if confirmed, to expand this process to more broadly support the other services and perform an assessment of multiple sectors and programs.

Question. Has the Department taken any concrete steps to enhance the health and status of a particular sector or tier based upon this analysis?

Answer. The test case for S2T2 analysis is the M–1 Abrams program. The primary goal of the assessment was to preserve the tank industrial base by developing an affordable acquisition profile that would maintain needed industrial capabilities. Potential Foreign Military Sales were factored in as a way to make-up for at least some lost work. Bridge buys or other forms of investment were also factored in for critical and fragile second to fourth tier suppliers to determine the fiscal year 2014 funding profile required to address risks in 2015. Where practical, targeted investments using existing authorities and other programs are being considered to improve and preserve critical manufacturing capabilities.

Question. Under what circumstances if any do you believe the Department should use Defense Production Act Title III authorities to address defense industrial base needs?

Answer. I believe that the Department should only use title III authorities when it meets the two determinations consistent with section 303 of that law that: taking such action is essential to the national defense; and without such action, U.S. industry cannot reasonably be expected to provide the capability for the needed industrial resource, material, or critical technology item in a timely manner. These decisions must be informed by a thorough industrial base analysis, consultations with the Defense Production Act Committee (DPAC), as well as the advice of other agencies in determining industrial base priorities for DPA title III investments.

Question. What is your view of current or anticipated consolidation efforts by major defense contractors?

Answer. As I stated in my previous response, I do not foresee a time in the near future where further consolidation of this part of the base would be in the best interest of the warfighter or the taxpayer. I believe that we should preserve as much competition as possible and avoid market distortions not in the best long-term interests of the Government.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question. What, in your view, is the role and value of science and technology programs in meeting the Department's transformation goals and in confronting irregular, catastrophic, traditional and disruptive threats?

Answer. Science and Technology (S&T) programs of the Department have always been critical to meeting new and emerging threats, and I anticipate this will continue. S&T helps the Department meet transformation goals; and continues to address emerging threats such as anti-access/area denial challenges. With a focused, high quality, aggressive science and technology program that is responsive to the full range of capabilities required by our Armed Forces, we will be able to preserve the future and maintain technological superiority over our adversaries.

Question. If confirmed, what direction will you provide regarding funding targets and priorities for the Department's long-term research efforts?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L), the ASD(R&E) and the department's leadership to provide direction for funding targets for long-range research, balanced against other priorities. The Department and the administration have placed a strong emphasis on sustaining S&T spending. Secretary Panetta and the USD(AT&L) have repeatedly indicated that technological superiority underpins the Department's recently released Military Strategy Guidance; I share that view. If confirmed I will continue that emphasis and, subject to the Secretary's approval, use available mechanisms for establishing funding targets.

Question. What specific metrics would you use, if confirmed, to assess whether the Department is making adequate investments in its basic research programs?

Answer. Establishing viable metrics to assess investments in basic research has proved to be difficult, in part because the time scale from basic research funding to output and fielded system can be long. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L) and the ASD(R&E) to assess investments made by the military services and agencies in basic research and ensure effective management of this portfolio. Specific metrics should include publications, patents, and technology transitions to our acquisition programs. However, these are incomplete, and if confirmed, we will continue to seek basic research metrics.

Question. Do you feel that there is sufficient coordination between and among the science and technology programs of the military services and defense agencies?

Answer. I believe that the Department is improving in this area, with additional room for improvement. The Department has recently reintroduced the process whereby all S&T portfolios with significant multi-agency investment must deliver an integrated roadmap for review by the Department's S&T Executives. As a pilot, the Department has established seven Priority Steering Councils, consisting of scientists and engineers from the services and agencies, whose job it is to develop cross-cutting roadmaps for the Department's recently designated S&T Priorities. The councils are complemented by Communities of Interest (COIs) populated by scientist and engineers from the services and agencies for the purpose of integrating the Department's S&T program in specific technology areas. COIs are permanent in nature. There are also short-term Technology Focus Teams (TFTs) that perform in-depth analysis of specific technology issues and report their findings to the S&T EXCOM. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L) and the ASD(R&E) to continue improvements in coordination among these areas.

Question. Are you satisfied that the Department has a well articulated and actionable science and technology strategic plan?

Answer. There is a well-coordinated technology strategic investment strategy, but I believe there is room for improvement in strategies that cover specific topical areas. The Department has well-articulated and actionable strategic plans for basic research, and for Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics (STEM) education. I believe it would be valuable to document an overarching Departmental Science and Technology strategic plan. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L) and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering to develop such a plan.

Question. Do you see a need for changes in areas such as hiring authority, personnel systems, financial disclosure and ethics requirements, to ensure that the Department can recruit and retain the highest quality scientific and technical workforce possible?

Answer. I have not seen specific evidence of problems attributable to these areas. I believe, as does USD(AT&L), that the Department needs to continue to strengthen its workforce in the science and engineering fields. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(AT&L), the ASD(R&E), and other Department leadership to assess this situation and determine whether any corrective action is needed.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering (ASD(R&E)) has been designated as the Chief Technology Officer of the Department of Defense.

In your view, what is the appropriate role of the Chief Technology Officer of the Department of Defense?

Answer. As outlined in the Department of Defense Directive 5134.3, I believe the appropriate role of the Chief Technology Officer (CTO) is to provide technical leadership, guidance, and oversight for the Department's Research and Engineering activities, to include the early identification of critical technology opportunities that could lead to affordable new capabilities. Finally, the CTO should evaluate the adequacy of the Department's overall Research & Engineering investment and program content.

Question. What authority should the ASD(R&E) have over the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA)?

Answer. DARPA is a Defense Agency under the direction, authority and control of the USD(AT&L) through the ASD(R&E). The DARPA director directly reports to the ASD(R&E), and consequently DARPA should operate in accordance with high-level direction from ASD(R&E). I would not recommend any changes in these roles or authorities.

Question. What authority should the ASD(R&E) have over other Service and Agency science and technology efforts?

Answer. I believe the existing authorities outlined in DOD Directive 5134.3 are appropriate. The ASD(R&E) is to recommend approval, modification, or disapproval of programs and projects of the Military Departments and Defense Agencies to eliminate unpromising or unnecessarily duplicative programs, and is also designated to recommend the initiation or support of promising projects or programs for the science and technology program. Finally, the ASD(R&E) is responsible for recommending budget adjustments to the USD(AT&L) and the Secretary of Defense.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes in organizational structure, workforce, or availability of resources to improve the effectiveness of the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering?

Answer. No. If confirmed, I will continuously monitor the alignment and balance of all acquisition, technology, and logistics offices to improve their effectiveness and ability to meet the mission

DEFENSE LABORATORIES

Question. What is your view on the quality and relevance of the DOD laboratories as compared to the DOE national laboratories, Federal laboratories, academic laboratories, and other peer institutions?

Answer. My view is that the DOD laboratories are in general staffed with dedicated competent scientists and engineers performing important missions for the Department. A key issue going forward is how to operate these Laboratories as an enterprise to meet the needs of the Department even more effectively. The ASD(R&E) is working with the Office of Science and Technology Policy, the Services, and other Departmental stakeholders on an analysis to address Federal laboratory capacity. If confirmed, I will support the USD(AT&L) in his assessments of this area.

Question. What metrics will you use, if confirmed, to evaluate the effectiveness, competitiveness, and scientific vitality of the DOD laboratories?

Answer. If confirmed, I will primarily rely on an evaluation based on success in developing and transitioning new technologies to warfighters, the quality of their technical workforce, and the results of external reviews of their effectiveness and innovation. I would also be open to new approaches for objectively assessing the performance of the laboratories.

Question. What steps if any will you take, if confirmed, to increase the mission effectiveness and productivity of the DOD laboratories?

Answer. The USD(AT&L) has initiated the process to assess the productivity of DOD's acquisition institutions, including laboratories. If confirmed, I will support that process with the ASD(R&E) to review options and opportunities to increase the mission effectiveness of DOD laboratories.

Question. In your view, have the DOD laboratories struck an appropriate balance between investments in near-term technology programs that are tied to current battlefield needs and investments in longer term, higher risk, and revolutionary capability development?

Answer. Yes. The realities of a nation at war have forced our laboratories to develop near-term programs. However, the labs have maintained long-term efforts as well. As the Department draws down from current combat operations, I would expect a modest shift back to medium and long-term efforts. The Services currently align approximately one-third of their basic science budgets to in-house programs. A recent review of the labs' basic science program was conducted by the Defense Science Board (DSB) and their report concluded that the in-house basic research program was technically strong and healthy. In general, I think the Department has a reasonable balance; however, if confirmed, with the USD(AT&L), I will continue to assess this balance to determine if adjustments are needed.

Question. Do you believe that this balance is likely to change with the completion of our withdrawal from Iraq and our ongoing drawdown in Afghanistan?

Answer. I expect the balance between near-term and longer-term research will not change dramatically as a result of these events, but will move slightly away from near-term efforts. In addition, the portfolio of research topics will likely shift to support the Department's recently released strategic guidance, particularly toward any emerging threats, such as anti-access/area denial. If confirmed, I will continue to assess the balance with the ASD(R&E).

Question. Section 219 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 authorizes the directors of a defense laboratory to use up to 3 percent of the total funds available to the laboratory to fund innovative research, technology transition activities, and workforce development.

What is your understanding of the extent to which the Department has implemented section 219?

Answer. I understand each of the Services has implemented section 219 programs in a unique fashion that aligns with their unique Service business models. Though the statute gives authority to lab directors to utilize up to 3 percent of all available funds for this program, the actual amount to date has been in the 1 to 2 percent range. The Department submits a section 219 status report annually to Congress to detail the related investment, the latest of which was delivered on June 4, 2012.

Question. Do you believe that the funding flexibility provided by section 219 has been appropriately utilized by the Department?

Answer. Yes. Each lab director has balanced section 219 investments with other programs and procurements, and used the flexibility of section 219 to support their business model. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor the use of this flexibility by lab directors.

Question. Do you believe that it would be feasible or appropriate for the Department to use the authority of section 219 to adjust the balance between investments in near-term technology programs and longer-term, higher-payoff investments?

Answer. I believe these adjustments are already being done under section 219, so I recommend no changes at this time.

DARPA

Question. In your view, has DARPA struck an appropriate balance between investments in near-term technology programs that are tied to current battlefield needs and investments in longer term, higher risk, and revolutionary capability development?

Answer. Yes. DARPA's mission of creating and preventing technological surprise does require a focus on high-impact opportunities for the future. At the same time, DARPA has contributed to near-term needs, and in the process learned valuable lessons that inform its longer-term efforts.

Question. What are the major issues related to DARPA investments, management and workforce, and research outcomes that you will seek to address?

Answer. DARPA continues to be a key center for DOD innovation. If confirmed, I will continue to help it remain a preeminent source of creative and technically superior capabilities.

Question. Do you feel that DARPA is adequately transitioning its programs to the Services and Defense Agencies? If not, how will you address that challenge?

Answer. This is always a challenge for high-impact efforts that challenge the status quo. DARPA continues to build strong relationships with the Services to ease the way for transition. If confirmed, I will place a high priority on technology transition.

Question. Do you believe that there has been an appropriate level of interaction between DARPA and its intelligence community analog, IARPA, given the overlap in many research areas?

Answer. I have not looked into how DARPA interacts with IARPA, but if confirmed, I will look into this interaction and take action if appropriate.

TEST AND EVALUATION

Question. The Department has, on occasion, been criticized for failing to adequately test its major weapon systems before these systems are put into production.

What are your views about the degree of independence needed by the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation (DOT&E) in ensuring the success of the Department's acquisition programs?

Answer. I believe the DOT&E must be an independent entity to ensure the Department's weapon systems are realistically and adequately tested in their intended operational environment. If confirmed, I will work with the DOT&E on testing and evaluation issues as a partner in the acquisition process, and continue to welcome his insights on program performance and other issues. DOT&E's independence is of value in the acquisition process.

Question. What are your views about the role of the Director of Developmental Test and Evaluation (DT&E) in ensuring the success of the Department's acquisition programs?

Answer. I believe the role of the DASD(DT&E) is beneficial to the Department's acquisition process, and if confirmed I will rely on the DASD(DT&E) for advice on the demonstrated maturity of designs to enter initial production and on the adequacy of planned test programs.

Question. Are you concerned with the level of test and evaluation conducted by the contractors who are developing the systems to be tested?

Answer. I have no evidence that this is a major area of concern. The test strategy for an acquisition program is based on a variety of factors, and each program requires a different mix of government and contractor testing. However, to ensure the Department's systems are adequately tested, I believe there needs to be government leadership of DT&E.

Question. Do you believe that the operational and developmental testing organizations in DOD and the military services are adequate to ensure an appropriate level of testing, and testing oversight, on major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes. I also believe the Department can improve its performance in this area by defining test requirements earlier in a program and putting more emphasis on early developmental test and evaluation activities to reduce the likelihood of late discovery of design or production issues. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the DASD(DT&E) and DOT&E to ensure the Department conducts effective and efficient developmental and operational testing.

DEPOT ISSUES

Question. A decade of overseas contingency operations has increased maintenance requirements and expenditures. These requirements and expenditures are expected to remain high for several years after the conclusion of operations in Afghanistan before they begin to decrease.

What do you believe the Department has learned from this experience, and how will these lessons learned affect, if at all, the future of DOD maintenance and logistics?

Answer. Since overcoming initial issues early in Afghanistan and Iraq, the Department has provided superb logistics support to our deployed forces. There are a number of lessons learned, some of which have already been incorporated into our policies, processes, and doctrine. Others are still being documented. We created and have institutionalized Combatant Command Deployment and Distribution Operations Centers to facilitate the deployment of forces and delivery of sustainment supplies. The Department has increased maintenance capability to support equipment left in theater and optimally structured reset of equipment retrograded with unit redeployments. This tailoring has enabled both maximum readiness of materiel in theater to support warfighting operations, but also of that CONUS to support force generation and training. An example of this optimization can be clearly seen in the operations of the Army Field Support Brigades, as well as in the tailored reset work packages that address not only the high OPTEMPO and harsh theater environments, but also the restoration and protection of useful life of our equipment. We have also been able to efficiently and effectively augment unit maintenance with contractor maintenance support. Finally, we have incorporated Operation Contract Support to manage contractors in our policy and doctrine.

Question. For how many years after the end of combat operations do you believe the Department will need to continue to pay for increased maintenance to reset and reconstitute the force?

Answer. Our estimates indicate it will take 2 to 3 years to complete reset and reconstitution post-combat operations in Afghanistan. This time depends on the velocity of our retrograde process, the availability of funding, and the capabilities that will be needed in the force structure to meet the Defense Strategy within the budget constraints.

Question. What factors do you believe should govern the Department's strategy to manage workload as maintenance requirements begin to decrease?

Answer. We must maintain a ready and controlled source of government-owned and -operated depot maintenance capability by leveraging the principals of Core and 50/50 statutes. We must also sustain the critical capabilities of the private sector. To do this, we must leverage the partnership between the public and private sectors, and wisely improve our efficiency of maintenance operations in both the public and private sectors to continually reduce cost and increase our buying power. This holistic approach will ensure strong national capabilities.

LOGISTICS AND READINESS

Question. If confirmed, what steps if any would you take to ensure that life cycle maintenance requirements and sustainment support are considered in the acquisition process for new DOD systems?

Answer. The Department has made great strides in this area over the past 2 years. We have heightened the focus on sustainment by elevating the importance of sustainment planning in milestone reviews to a comparable level of oversight within acquisition and engineering plans. Since issuing guidance on requisite content for sound sustainment plans, we have completed and approved the Life Cycle Sustainment Plans (LCSPs) for nine Major Defense Acquisition Programs. If confirmed, I will support the Department's efforts, working closely with the Service acquisition and materiel stakeholders, to develop solid maintenance requirements and effective LCSPs that meet system readiness objective and deliver affordable product support.

The NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 requires the Department of Defense to conduct life-cycle cost analysis for new capabilities including the fully burdened cost of fuel during the analysis and evaluation of alternatives in the acquisition program design trades.

Question. Do you believe that the fully burdened cost of fuel is an appropriate factor for the Department to consider in the evaluation of acquisition alternatives?

Answer. Yes. The Fully Burdened Cost of Energy is a useful component of the total life cycle cost estimating process, which helps the Department understand the full, long-term expenses the Department is signing up to when it commits to a new system. Being scenario based, the Fully Burdened Cost of Energy provides an operational cost perspective which helps decisionmakers differentiate between the fuel and logistics demands of competing system concepts.

AFGHANISTAN DISTRIBUTION CHALLENGES

Question. Last year, an agreement was reached with the Pakistani Government to reopen the ground lines of communication (GLOC), allowing military supply convoys to resume logistical support to U.S. forces inside Afghanistan. However, since the GLOC were closed for several months, the DOD incurred much higher logistical costs having to rely entirely upon the Northern Distribution Network (NDN) and aerial resupply.

Are you satisfied with the current rate of logistical resupply flow through the GLOC?

Answer. Since the Pakistan Ground Line of Communication (PAKGLOC) reopened, there have been challenges working through transit authority procedures required to increase the flow of cargo movements. Currently, the Department is conducting multiple proofs of principle (PoPs) to test these new procedures. Initial results are promising. We anticipate new cargo movements in the Spring 2013 with larger volumes of retrograde cargo moving through Pakistan in the summer timeframe.

Question. Does the Department have appropriate plans in place to provide for the retrograde of equipment from Afghanistan as we prepare for the withdrawal of our forces?

Answer. The Department relies on multiple transportation routes for its retrograde operations, including a combination of ground, air, sea, and rail. We have a resilient transportation system that provides more than one way to support the theater. Additionally, the Department has plans for the disposition of U.S. equipment and supplies to enable retrograde movements. All military equipment needed for future military force needs, except equipment that may still be needed by U.S. Forces in Afghanistan, will be returned to the United States, repaired, and distributed back to the force. Equipment that will not be needed to meet future military needs, which is mostly non-military base operating equipment, will be donated to the Afghan Government, transferred to other coalition or regional partners, or destroyed in Afghanistan, depending on the nature of the equipment and legislated authorities.

Question. To what extent is the DOD anticipating throughput challenges in Pakistan that would limit the DOD's ability to remove equipment from Afghanistan?

Answer. The Department is currently conducting multiple PoPs to test the new procedures for movements through Pakistan. Initial results are good, and we expect these tests to be successful. We anticipate new cargo movements in Spring 2013 with larger volumes of retrograde through Pakistan in the Summer timeframe. This will enable two-way flow to support both resupply and retrograde operations. The Department's transportation plans for retrograde operations include the use of multiple routes under varying assumptions, including scenarios with and without the use of the PAKGLOC.

Question. To what extent has DOD developed alternatives to the Pakistan GLOC to be able to remove equipment from Afghanistan?

Answer. The Department has developed multiple transportation routes to augment the ability to retrograde from Afghanistan. One is the use of the NDN, which is a series of routes through Europe, Russia, and Central Asia. Another transportation option is to use a combination of airlift and sealift (multi-modal) movement out of Afghanistan. These alternatives can and will be used for retrograde operations. However, sole reliance on these methods is not ideal for significant volumes of retrograde due to cost, limited airfield capability in Afghanistan, and the time it will take.

Question. What challenges remain in developing these alternatives?

Answer. These transportation alternatives are in place today. We anticipate more extensive use of all transportation routes as we complete the proofs of principle and work with host nations on customs and transit procedures. Afghanistan poses additional challenges based on its location, making retrograde operations inherently more difficult than Iraq. The movement of personnel is not an issue.

Question. In a 2011 report to Congress, GAO found that although U.S. Transportation Command has established some processes for oversight, it does not have full oversight of the distribution of supplies and equipment to the warfighter in Afghanistan. GAO highlighted several issues to include: a lack of adequate radio-frequency identification information to track all cargo movements; no common operating picture for distribution data and integrated transportation systems; complex customs clearance processes in Afghanistan and Pakistan that delay shipments; limited information on incidents of pilferage and damage of cargo; and ineffective tracking and management of cargo containers.

To what extent, if any, has DOD improved its visibility over equipment and supplies in Afghanistan?

Answer. Our warfighters and other managers have visibility of equipment and materiel from a number of sources, and lack of visibility has not been identified as a significant problem by our warfighters. With that said, Department policy requires all DOD cargo transiting Afghanistan to use Radio Frequency Identification tags. This technology enables the visibility of cargo during transit and storage. Enhanced in-transit visibility through the use of satellite-enabled technology is also available for high priority movements. Additionally, we require contracted carriers to provide automated updates to DOD systems at key points throughout the movement process. Furthermore, in January 2013, CENTCOM published a directive to DOD shippers with instructions for improving cargo security and the tracking and reporting of shipments transiting Pakistan.

Question. To what extent has DOD developed a common operating picture to improve its processes for tracking equipment and supplies in Afghanistan?

Answer. CENTCOM has developed and implemented an automated Logistics Common Operating Picture, which includes information on the amount of supplies on-hand and personnel and cargo movements supporting CENTCOM.

NONSTANDARD EQUIPMENT

Question. DOD has acquired millions of dollars in tactical nonstandard equipment (NSE) to address evolving threats in Afghanistan (and previously in Iraq).

If confirmed, what would be your plan of action to deal with the NSE accumulated by the Services over the last several years?

Answer. Our forces have greatly benefited from the access to rapid acquisition of newly emerging technologies and capabilities for Iraq and Afghanistan. If confirmed, I will work with the Services as they consider future force structure and requirements, and for items that are to be retained, that the Services have effective plans to sustain this mission-essential NSE.

Question. What is your assessment of the amount of NSE that has been transferred by the Services into programs of record to date?

Answer. I do not have data on which NSE has transferred to become programs of record. The Services continue to carefully evaluate their force equipment requirements. Some examples of technologies we are keeping and putting into our formations are the Counter Rocket Artillery Mortars system that was so effective against the indirect fire threat in OIF and OEF, as well as selected MRAP vehicles. If confirmed, I will monitor Service actions to transition NSE to programs of record.

Question. To what extent, if any, has DOD identified and planned for future maintenance and sustainment costs for any NSE that will have to be funded in future budgets?

Answer. For enduring capabilities, it is important that we budget for sustainment. My understanding is that the Services have begun the process of determining their maintenance and sustainment costs for NSE identified as necessary to meet future force enduring requirements. If confirmed I will support and provide oversight to the Services actions to monitor and sustain NSE selected for enduring requirements.

CORROSION PREVENTION AND CONTROL

Question. GAO estimates that corrosion damage to equipment and weapons systems costs the DOD approximately $22 billion per year. The Office of Corrosion Prevention and Control has been in existence for almost 2 years now, and a corrosion prevention and control plan (CPCP) is now required for all category one acquisitions.

Do you believe that a CPCP should be considered during the analysis of alternatives process or the RFP process?

Answer. I consider corrosion an important factor in system life cycle cost and performance which should be considered during the analysis of alternatives (AoA). I support the existing direction to the Military Departments to objectively evaluate corrosion as part of program design and development activities, and to weigh the trade-offs through an open and transparent AoA. Similarly, the RFP process should also clearly articulate to industry specifically what our needs are for addressing corrosion prevention and control. Without clearly articulated requirements in the proposal process, we risk additional costs in acquisition or sustainment.

Question. What is your assessment of existing alternatives for hexavalent chromium?

Answer. I am not currently familiar with the use of or alternatives to hexavalent chromium. If confirmed, I will assess the alternatives for this material.

OPERATIONAL ENERGY

Question. The NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 created the position of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs

If confirmed, how would you work with office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs to advance the objectives of that office?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with ASD(OEPP) to ensure defense energy investments increase military capabilities, provide mission success, and lower total costs. I also will assist ASD(OEPP) and USD(AT&L) in implementing any necessary changes in the defense acquisition system to support these objectives.

Question. What role do you expect to play, if confirmed, in developing strategies to reduce the logistical footprint of deployed units operating in hostile environments?

Answer. The safety and effectiveness of our forces will always be my highest priority. If confirmed, I will work with USD(AT&L), the ASD(L&MR), the Joint Staff, and the Military Services to ensure we optimize our sustainment, maintenance, and materiel reliability to reduce the logistical footprint of deployed forces. I will support policies that promote technologies and strategies to reduce the logistics footprint, and continue to emphasize logistics implications as a key factor in the decision processes for new weapon systems.

Question. What role do you expect to play, if confirmed, in developing and pursuing alternative energy sources for the Department of Defense?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to exercise oversight of the Department's efforts to develop and pursue energy innovations that advance military missions and capabilities, or innovations that lower our base operating costs.

Question. What is your assessment of DOD's current ability to track fuel consumption after point of sale at forward-deployed locations?

Answer. The Department's ability to track fuel consumption after point of sale at forward-deployed locations has improved and continues to improve. The Department is collecting quarterly estimates of operational energy consumption with increasing granularity, and improving its ability to better manage energy in the deployed environment. While there are still challenges in tracking fuel consumption by contingency base camps and ground vehicles, I am confident the Department will continue to increase its ability to measure—and, thus manage—consumption of operational energy at forward-deployed locations.

Question. Many of the energy efficiency initiatives that are currently being developed are designed for use in high heat desert terrains.

To what extent, if any, is DOD planning and developing energy saving equipment and technologies to support the warfighter in other environments that may have differing climates?

Answer. The Departments energy priorities are derived from current and projected operational needs, so that our forces can operate effectively in every region of the world, in every environment, and against every threat. If confirmed, I will ensure that the energy-saving equipment and technology we are fielding is flexible and adaptable across a range of contingencies, and is designed to improve our warfighting capability by lightening the load for our expeditionary forces, reducing the vulnerability of logistics support lines, and optimizing the performance of our systems and operating bases.

Question. Last July, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs published a policy that any alternative drop-in replacement fuel procured for DOD-wide use and distribution within the Class III (Bulk) supply chain must compete with petroleum products and any awards will be based on the ability to meet requirements at the best value to the government, including cost.

What is your view of this policy?

Answer. I support this policy. It is prudent for the Department to engage in tests and demonstrations that confirm defense equipment can operate on a range of fuels; however, as the Department allocates its limited resources to ensure it delivers necessary warfighting capability, it should only buy large volumes of these fuels when they are cost-competitive with petroleum products.

Question. What is your assessment of section 526 of the Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007? What impact, if any, has this provision had on the operations and activities of the Department of Defense?

Answer. Section 526 has not restricted the Department from purchasing whatever fuel it has needed to support military operations. It is my understanding that section 526 applies only to contracts that are for the express purpose of buying alternative or synthetic fuel. As long as mission capability is not restricted, it is helpful to have this guidance that new fuels should not be any more polluting than fuels produced from conventional petroleum sources.

Question. If confirmed, what priorities would you establish for Defense investments in energy technologies?

Answer. If confirmed, my priority will be to focus on energy technologies, as well as tactics, techniques, and procedures, that improve the capabilities and effectiveness of our military forces, reduce our costs, or help meet the needs of our installations. This means energy innovations and policies that improve the performance of our systems, expeditionary outposts, and even portable equipment carried by our personnel.

ENVIRONMENTAL SECURITY

Question. If confirmed, you will be responsible for assisting the Under Secretary in the oversight of environmental security issues for the Department of Defense.

What do you see as the most significant challenges facing the Department in the area of environmental security?

Answer. The greatest challenge will be maintaining and improving the Department's level of environmental performance given the extremely challenging budget environment—to include the threat of sequestration to impose across the board cuts despite legal requirements; the execution difficulties posed by Continuing Resolutions; and the overall tightening of the budget. If confirmed, I will continue to look for ways to meet these challenges to protect human health and the environment across our enterprise.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans if any do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue the aggressive oversight of environmental programs, with the goal of minimizing management costs and making our organizational structure and performance contracts as efficient and effective as possible. I will also continue to emphasize strategic R&D investments in technologies to lower the costs associated with environmental cleanup and compliance.

Question. While the Military Departments have made considerable progress addressing environmental contamination at military installations, there remains a substantial amount of work to be done, including the remediation of discarded munitions and Unexploded Ordnance (UXO), at current and former DOD sites. The military departments have managed to maintain reasonably level funding for these cleanup programs over the past several years; however, many of these clean-ups will take years to complete and, in the current budget environment, the restoration accounts will come under pressure.

What steps, if any, do you believe are needed to ensure that the DOD remediation programs receive adequate funding and make meaningful progress, particularly in the detection and clearance of discarded munitions and UXO?

Answer. I believe that continuing the Department's existing remediation programs is important, and, if confirmed, I will work to balance resources so as not to extend cleanup timelines and jeopardize our ability to meet cleanup goals. I also support continued R&D investments in programs that can reduce the cost and timelines for cleanup. The Department is validating new technology for detection and clearance of unexploded ordinance that may dramatically accelerate cleanup of these sites and will lower the overall liability of the Department.

Question. How might the Strategic Environmental Research and Development Program (SERDP) help with the overall progress of the Defense Environmental Restoration program, particularly in view of the current fiscal environment?

Answer. SERDP and its companion program, the Environmental Security Technology Certification Program (ESTCP), have and should continue to reduce the cost and improve the efficacy of the Department's cleanups under the Defense Environmental Restoration Program.

Question. Technologies that can significantly reduce the costs of Unexploded Ordnance (UXO) cleanup that were developed by SERDP are now being demonstrated under ESTCP at actual UXO contaminated sites across the country. We expect the new cleanup technologies to become the standard approach at UXO contaminated sites within a few years, reducing the costs significantly. SERDP and ESTCP have already saved DOD billions of dollars by developing and transitioning technologies for contaminated ground water and sediment sites.

Answer. SERDP and ESTCP are now turning toward more challenging and complex sites that constitute the remaining liability under the Defense Environmental Restoration Program. If confirmed I will continue to support these programs and work to ensure that they are adequately funded and effectively executed.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Principal Deputy USD(ATL)?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

WASTEFUL SPENDING

1. Senator NELSON. Mr. Estevez, we are often so focused on the next budget to be passed that we consider the termination of a program as savings. According to a report from Forbes magazine, the Army has wasted $32 billion on weapons projects since 1995 and both the Navy and Air Force cancelled their share of programs to save money. What lessons have we learned from cancelling these contracts?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. We have learned over the years that cancelling developmental programs is a mixed proposition.

When a program becomes less valuable due to changing threats or significant technical problems, such cancellations may be exactly the right thing to do—we avoid spending even more money on unaffordable or nonperforming programs. In such cases, we need to make cancellation decisions as early as possible.

The most important lessons we have learned from major program cancellations are to ensure a program is affordable from the start and to understand and track the key framing assumptions for each program. Blind optimism about long-range affordability does not serve us well; we must analyze long-range cost estimates relative to reasonable budgetary expectations early during requirements generation to make each program affordable. We must also understand the risks to cost and schedule inherent in framing assumptions and act early upon any changes to avoid incurring large sunk costs on programs. We must control requirements creep through methods such as configuration control boards.

Not all sunk costs are squandered when we cancel a program, however. Technology and manufacturing knowledge from such programs can be applied to some extent in other systems and programs.

The Department is managing our acquisition processes for improved efficiencies through our Better Buying Power initiative.

2. Senator NELSON. Mr. Estevez, how can we improve our acquisitions and procurement processes in the future to avoid this wasteful spending?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics has initiated several processes to improve acquisitions and procurement in our ongoing Better Buying Power initiative efforts. Below are some key elements:

First, we need to avoid starting or continuing programs that cannot be produced and supported within our future long-range budgets. Our process for affordability analysis must involve the requirements and resource communities to scope requirements early, set lifecycle cost constraints on programs, and enforce those constraints through cost-control measures and possible early tradeoffs of requirements.

Second, if we consider starting an effort with the intent of developing technology or designing capabilities, we must carefully select those efforts and weigh the costs and benefits of new technologies as we learn more as the program progresses. Then we must decide whether to halt an effort that initially appeared promising, or for which we may not need production in quantity in the short-term. In doing so, our program reviews and gates must be meaningful, deliberate, and more effective.

Third, we need to understand and monitor the key assumptions that frame each developmental program. Developing systems that push the state-of-the-art involves risks, uncertainty, and informed assumptions on technologies and operational paradigms. We must overtly consider these framing assumptions at program initiation, then establish and monitor indicators as assumptions prove to be true or not. Then we can intervene early to solve the problem or cancel the program before sinking significant resources into an unviable or immature capability.

Fourth, we must continue to increase the cost consciousness of the acquisition workforce. It is critical that we target affordability, control cost growth, and incentivize productivity and innovation while ensuring the best support to the warfighter. Our efforts must span across all acquisition and sustainment activities. In order to be successful, we need to instill a culture of cost consciousness through sound business acumen, establishing clear expectations, and recognizing/rewarding the right behavior.

F–35 ACQUISITION

3. Senator NELSON. Mr. Estevez, the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2013 called for the purchase of 29 F–35 Joint Strike Fighter aircraft. Sequestration will slow the acquisition of these aircraft by three to four each year. How will sequestration affect the per unit cost of the future purchase of an F–35?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The F–35 program was established on the concept of economies of scale for production costs. Any reduction in the procurement quantity of F–35s in a given year, either from our international partners or from a U.S. Service, will result in an increase in the cost of each remaining jet. The Department is assessing the impact that sequestration will have on the fiscal year 2013 budget; however, if sequestration is continued over the next 10 years, the impact on the F–35 program will be significant. In one scenario the Department of Defense (DOD) is considering, sequestration could result in a reduction of seven to nine U.S. aircraft from the fiscal year 2013 Low Rate Initial Production Lot 7 buy across all three Services producing a corresponding increase in the cost per jet in Lots 7–11 of approximately 2.3 percent.

4. Senator NELSON. Mr. Estevez, what is the effect on our allies and their desire to purchase F–35s?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The F–35 program was established on the concept of economies of scale for purchases. Many of our allies and partners are facing financial challenges similar to what we are encountering. While there continues to be strong support from the Services in these countries, at the political level we are seeing increased scrutiny and pressures. Any change in the per unit cost of the F–35 in a given year may cause our partners to reassess their purchases in that year and potentially delay their procurement.

JOINT SURVEILLANCE TARGET ATTACK RADAR SYSTEM

5. Senator NELSON. Mr. Estevez, the Joint Surveillance Target Attack Radar System (JSTARS) aircraft have proven themselves in all recent conflicts, including Libya. The decision has been made to terminate the reengining program and the Air Force has indicated a need to upgrade the avionics sensors, as well as other systems to keep the aircraft viable. In light of the current budget environment and the need to recapitalize the fighter, bomber, and tanker fleet concurrently, do you believe it makes sense to modernize the JSTARS platform?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, it makes sense to modernize but such modernization must be prioritized along with other critical programs. Due to severe fiscal limitations, DOD is rationalizing how best to allocate its continued investment in the E–8C JSTARS modernization. The JSTARS program currently includes funds to operate and maintain the system through the Future Years Defense Program. In this austere budget environment, the limited JSTARS funding available was prioritized to address diminishing manufacturing sources in order to keep the aircraft mission capable. Any future JSTARS modernization or recapitalization will leverage ongoing technology development from other Defense programs and will be weighed against other DOD priorities.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

CONTRACTING AND ACQUISITION

6. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Estevez, I have already reached out to DOD to ask how officials plan to implement the major components of my wartime contracting reform legislation, which was signed into law as part of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013. Many of those provisions will fall within the responsibility of the Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (AT&L) secretariat to carry out, including those that pertain to current contingency in Afghanistan. Will you commit to identifying whether AT&L has sufficient personnel to address the reforms required in these provisions?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, if confirmed, I will commit to identifying whether AT&L has sufficient personnel to address the reforms required in these provisions.

7. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Estevez, are you committed to ensuring that the reforms are integrated into planning and training so that they will not be ignored in future contingencies? If so, what steps do you commit to taking?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, I remain fully committed, in partnership with appropriate DOD organizations, to include the Joint Staff, and the combatant commands, to integrate planning and training reforms to ensure improved contingency contracting performance and management during future contingencies.

Specifically, I will, if confirmed, continue ongoing efforts and initiate new efforts to institutionalize process tools (e.g., 3 in 1; Contingency Acquisition Support Module, and other business and planning tools used across the combatant commands) and doctrine that facilitate and strengthen both Contingency Contracting and Operational Contract Support (OCS). The Department has established the OCS Functional Capabilities Integration Board to actively monitor all ongoing and planned OCS related initiatives across the Department. The Board meets quarterly, or more often, as required, to conduct independent assessments and analyses of OCS capabilities (to include supporting doctrine, organization, training, materiel, leadership and education, personnel, and facilities of the armed forces). Additionally, the Department is in the process of revising pertinent guidance to address any weakness in our training with several new and revised OCS courses in the development phase.

8. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Estevez, in a constrained fiscal environment, it is more important than ever to ensure that there is a sufficient number of trained acquisition and other management personnel capable of overseeing, not just executing, contracts by DOD to ensure that U.S. taxpayers' dollars are being spent wisely. How will you ensure that the quality and current level of oversight of contracts is maintained despite austere budgets?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I agree contract oversight is a key element of ensuring taxpayer dollars are spent wisely. The largest portion of DOD contract oversight rests with the Defense Contract Management Agency (DCMA) and the Department has taken steps, aided by the Defense Acquisition Workforce Development Fund (DAWDF), to grow and strengthen the DCMA workforce. Since 2008, DCMA has increased its acquisition workforce by over 15 percent, and projects continued growth in the foreseeable future. Additionally, DCMA has bolstered its training programs and partnered with the Defense Acquisition University to establish the College of Contract Management to provide critical courseware that is both relevant and rigorous. If confirmed, I will work with the rest of the Department leadership to sustain these gains.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

EFFICIENCIES

9. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, for years DOD has embarked on several efficiency campaigns. Both Secretaries Gates and Panetta have included efficiency initiatives as part of the President's budget submission. Do you believe DOD has adequate tools to track efficiencies?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, DOD has the tools to track efficiencies. As you stated, Secretaries Gates and Panetta have included efficiency initiatives as part of the President's annual budget submission, and required the Department to track the status of the initiatives. The Department continues its process of tracking the status of each efficiency initiative to determine if the projected savings are on track, while at the same time assessing the associated program and milestone risks. For those efficiency initiatives under the purview of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics, our efficiencies remain valid and at the projected levels.

10. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, how successful has DOD been in realizing the efficiencies already assumed in previous budget requests?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. DOD has been very successful implementing and realizing efficiencies assumed in recent budgets. There is a robust process of tracking the status of each efficiency initiative to determine if the projected savings are on track and whether there are associated program and milestone risks. For those efficiency initiatives under the purview of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics, our efficiencies remain valid and at the projected levels. These initiatives enabled the Department either to reduce funding requirements or apply them to other high-priority requirements.

11. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, what lessons have you learned in the assumptions used in taking efficiencies?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I have learned that no matter how many times you have looked for efficiencies in the past, there is always a way to improve the level of efficiency of your overall portfolio. However, in identifying efficiencies, it is paramount that the affected functional communities and oversight organizations be involved, and that any barriers to implementing or executing efficiencies be identified and addressed.

DEPOT IMPACT FROM DECREASED BUDGETS

12. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, you mentioned in your answers to the advance policy questions that "We must maintain a ready and controlled source of Government-owned and -operated depot maintenance capability by leveraging the principles of core and 50/50 statutes." The prospect of a $42 billion cut from the defense budget this year from sequestration and the pressure of underfunded readiness accounts due to the Continuing Resolution will have a devastating effect on depot and shipyard maintenance activities for the rest of the year. In your opinion, in this unprecedented fiscal environment, what can be done to preserve our defense depot capabilities?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. While leveraging the principles of core and 50/50 statues will help us preserve the depot and shipyard critical capabilities, the magnitude of the reductions and shortfalls are forcing trade-offs between priority requirements across the Department. Negative impacts on depot workloads are unavoidable given the need to sustain operations in Afghanistan and meet our global commitments.

13. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, how will you maintain the critical skills of our depot and shipyard employees?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. DOD is required by title 10, U.S.C., section 2464, to maintain a core logistics capability. However, the reductions associated with sequestration have the potential to erode critical skills and capabilities over the long-term. If confirmed, I will ensure we attempt to protect critical skills by workloading the most critical capabilities.

14. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, if confirmed, what will you do to maintain an efficient and consistent workload through military depots if defense budget sequestration is allowed to occur?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Unfortunately, due to operating under a Continuing Resolution for half of the fiscal year, implementation of sequestration and higher than anticipated Overseas Contingency Operations costs, the Services are reducing and cancelling third and fourth quarter depot inductions. Given the concentrated effect of this fiscal situation, the Services do not have sufficient funding to maintain current, consistent, nor efficient depot workload. In this environment, DOD and the Services will smooth workload adjustments by slowing throughput of existing funded work and pacing the remaining funded inductions while attempting to satisfy readiness requirements.

15. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, please describe how you plan to leverage the principles of core and 50/50 statutes during this budget crisis.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Adherence to core and 50/50 statutes will help us preserve the depot and shipyard critical capabilities. Within that framework, DOD will allocate resources and execute schedules to minimize negative impacts to our depot capability and protect critical maintenance functions. This should enable the Department to protect critical capabilities in both the public and private sectors.

DEPOT WORKLOAD

16. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, the Military Services and the National Guard all operate military depots with a certain degree of capacity and workload duplication. The Logistics Management Institute pointed out in a February 2011 report that "at the strategic level, enhanced, integrated governance is required to best manage the day-to-day workload across all organic depot-level capabilities." Do you agree with this statement?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, cross-Service strategic governance is provided through DOD regulations and instructions and executive committees and boards, such as the Maintenance Executive Steering Committee, the Joint Group on Depot Maintenance, and the Joint Logistics Board. The Department continually improves its strategic governance by enhancing the effectiveness and efficiency of these executive bodies. In addition, the Department is in the final stages of issuing a revised Depot Source of Repair instruction that will enhance strategic assignment and establishment of depot capability.

17. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, in your opinion, what needs to be done within DOD to minimize workload duplication at a time when workload will be decreasing?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. While we have improved cross-Service collaboration and have had some success in workload reallocation to improve efficiency, DOD is limited in addressing capacity duplication with respect to existing capability. To mitigate unnecessary assignment of future workload, the Department is in the final stages of issuing a revised Depot Source of Repair instruction to enhance strategic assignment and establishment of depot capability by requiring single-departmental and single-Service sources of repair.

18. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, are we at the point that the Services should look to consolidating similar workloads, such as aircraft engines, into one facility?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, we are. Our current fiscal situation demands that we look at all opportunities to enhance efficiency and reduce our cost of operations. While we have improved cross-service collaboration and have had some success in workload reallocation to improve efficiency, DOD is limited in addressing capacity duplication with respect to existing capability. However, the Department is implementing a Depot Source of Repair instruction to prevent unnecessary assignment of future workload.

19. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, to what extent should the Military Services be allowed to manage their depot activities taking into consideration their unique mission requirements?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The Services should manage their depot workload to meet their mission requirements; however, DOD's draft Depot Source of Repair instruction will ensure consideration of existing depot capability prior to establishing duplicate capability. Additionally, the Department's joint governance bodies, such as the Maintenance Executive Steering Committee, the Joint Group on Depot Maintenance, and the Joint Logistics Board enable collaboration and strategic decisionmaking.

20. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, do you believe the methodology for the determination of core depot requirements needs to be strengthened? If so, how?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, DOD is currently reviewing DOD Instruction 4151.20, "Depot Maintenance Core Capabilities Determination Process," and will assess current methodology with the objective of strengthening the requirements determination process. Given where we are in the assessment process, it is premature to identify specifics.

DEPOT POLICY

21. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, as you may know, we experienced a bit of turmoil over the last year on Federal statutes intended to provide guidance for the management of defense depot requirements. The Senate was successful in December in restoring the traditional framework, which has resulted in a balance over the years of a consistent workload for depots. Part of the agreement with DOD was to inform Congress of any potential depot policy changes before they take place. If confirmed, will you agree to share with Congress any concerns and/or policy issues related to the management of military depot activities before promulgating any policy changes to the Military Services?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, if confirmed, I will share any policy changes prior to implementation.

22. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, do you currently anticipate proposing any changes to depot policies?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. We are reviewing current polices for potential updates. We anticipate improvements in how we define depot maintenance to include clarification of modifications coincident with maintenance operations and software maintenance. We also anticipate adjustments that would address maintenance in support of systems that were acquired in nontraditional acquisitions. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the committees as we develop these proposals and will ensure our depot policies follow congressional intent.

BETTER BUYING POWER 2.0

23. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, DOD is currently developing its latest initiative designed to achieve continuous improvement. This enterprise, called Better Buying Power 2.0, places particular importance on improving not only the technical qualifications but experience and leadership skills of DOD's acquisition workforce. Ensuring DOD's acquisition workforce has greater experience and improved technical competence in order to achieve the goals of acquisition reform was a central argument in Ronald Fox's book, "Defense Acquisition Reform, 1960 to 2009: An Elusive Goal," and the Defense Science Board's 2009 study titled, "Creating a DOD Strategic Acquisition Platform". However, what is less certain are the means by which DOD intends to achieve a better trained and more experienced acquisition workforce. What are DOD's specific plans to increase the skills and experience of its acquisition workforce through the Better Buying Power 2.0 initiative?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. DOD is focused on increasing the professional skills and experience of its acquisition workforce through the Better Buying Power 2.0 initiative, which includes establishing higher professional qualification standards for Key Leadership Positions (KLPs) and the "Certification to Qualification" initiative.

The KLP initiative will define mandatory KLPs and establish core position requirements, qualifications, and attributes. The "Certification to Qualification" structure framework is currently in development and will focus on the demonstration and documentation of the skill sets required by the acquisition workforce in order to achieve successful acquisition results. The Defense Acquisition Workforce Development Fund (DAWDF) has proven to be a critical asset for the Department to increase the capacity and capability of its acquisition workforce. The DAWDF has enabled the DOD Components (Services, Defense Agencies, and other DOD organizations) to provide targeted training and leadership development programs for acquisition workforce personnel.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT

24. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, as you may know, I've expressed concern that the wide ranging authorities contained in the Defense Production Act (DPA) are being used by DOD to spend $170 million for the design and construction of a commercial biofuels refinery. Given the current budget crisis facing DOD are there higher priorities for the DPA, other than to construct a biofuels refinery, that are not currently funded?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. As one of the world's largest consumers of petroleum, the Department has an interest in diversification of fuel supplies as a hedge against potential supply disruptions, especially for our legacy fleet of ships and aircraft, which will be with us for decades to come. This initiative is consistent with the intent of the authorities of Title III of the Defense Production Act, which are uniquely focused on enabling multiple departments to leverage cost sharing with the private sector, and investing in capital expenditures, such as facility retrofits or wholesale construction.

The authority was specifically created to promote industrial production that would meet essential national defense requirements and assist in creating economically viable production capabilities. In addition to the biofuel initiative, the Title III Program is continuing to make significant investments in almost forty efforts by creating or expanding domestic production capabilities for essential materials and technologies. These include advanced lithium ion batteries for space and military applications, carbon nanotube and advanced composites for high-performance structural components, specialty steels, lightweight ammunition, and armor and advanced electronic components for next-generation radars and electronic warfare applications. We believe we are appropriately using DPA Authorities to meet our key priorities.

25. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, do you think that biofuels are a higher priority than the urgent requirements identified by the DPA Committee such as telecommunications security and the manufacturing of critical materials for military weapon systems by a country other than China? Please provide a list of the initiatives required to address shortfalls in metal fabrication, power and energy, telecommunications, and lightweight materials that are not currently funded.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. There are no unfunded DPAC initiatives. The biofuel initiative is being developed and executed concurrently with other important DPA Title III initiatives that will benefit our national defense needs and is not diverting resources from other DPA investments. The DPAC has recommended the following projects for which funds are available.

1. Metal Fabrication Study Group Heavy Forging Initiative: The DPA Title III Executive Agent is presently negotiating with the sole remaining domestic heavy forging company to modernize and expand their heavy forging capabilities that are critical for naval and other defense applications.
2. Telecommunications Study Group Optical Networks Initiative: The DPAC is working with interagency customers, including DISA and DoE that have identified a need for trusted domestic sources of hardware to support optical telecommunications capabilities.
3. Lightweight Materials Study Group: The DPAC is further defining interagency requirements for an investment in lightweight materials. Projects being developed include low cost carbon fiber and magnesium alloy processing.
4. The Power and Energy Study Group is developing initiatives for flexible solar cells for application such as Unmanned Aerial Vehicles as well as soldier portable power and power switching devices for power grid applications.

ACQUISITION REFORM

26. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Estevez, for the past several years, the Chiefs of the individual Services have repeatedly stated requirements creep is one of the major factors creating increased costs and delays in the acquisition of weapon systems. Specifically, additional capability requirements continue to be added during the development of weapons systems. Among other difficulties created by additional requirements is the redesign, and even rebuilding, of weapons systems. These concerns continue despite the fact the Joint Requirement Oversight Council must approve of any requirements changes. Therefore, what additional steps is DOD using to ensure requirements creep is reduced and to reform the Joint Capabilities Integration Development System?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. As a key factor in mitigating cost and schedule risk, control of requirements (including prevention of creep) is a priority Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(AT&L)) objective. DOD efforts are focused on definition of affordable, technically-executable requirements earlier in program development, identification of cost-informed tradespace, and robust oversight of requirements stability. Several initiatives have been introduced to address the drivers of changing requirements. Service Acquisition Executive-chaired Configuration Steering Boards (CSB) are intended as an oversight and controlling mechanism for proposed changes to requirements, stipulating annual identification of de-scoping options to reduce program cost or technical/schedule risk, and continuous monitoring of requirements stability. The USD(AT&L) Better Buying Power 2.0 initiative and DOD Instruction 5000.02 revision both advocate the CSB as a best practice to manage changes to requirements.

Recent revisions to the Joint Capabilities Integration and Development System process and business rules for the Joint Requirements Oversight Council have led to more flexible, rapid review, and, if necessary, modification of validated requirements that drive program cost or schedule growth beyond affordability caps. In addition, the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; USD(AT&L); and Director, Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation, as well as Service Vice Chiefs and Acquisition Executives, recently agreed to establish a periodic leadership forum to synchronize requirements, acquisition and programming, and budgeting activities. This will ensure further top-level leadership attention to emerging program difficulties caused by changing requirements and facilitate early engagement to ensure programs remain on track to provide timely and cost-effective capabilities to the warfighter.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

OHIO-CLASS SUBMARINE REPLACEMENT/MODERNIZATION

27. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Estevez, you will be dealing with a litany of challenges from current budget constraints. According to your duties, you will aid in the establishing of policies for acquisition (including procurement of goods and services, research and development, developmental testing, and contract administration) for all elements of DOD. There is concern that in this time of fiscal uncertainty, the replacement of the Ohio-class submarine, a requirement for past Senate ratification of the new Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), will be overlooked or delayed. How will you balance and maintain oversight of the modernization of crucial programs, such as the Ohio-class replacement program, during your time as the Under Secretary?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. DOD is dedicated to recapitalizing the SSBN force to provide the Nation's most survivable deterrence capability. The Department remains committed to an ultimate SSBN force level of 12, which is required to meet current U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM) strategic deterrence requirements.

To balance DOD priorities and meet fiscal constraints, the President's budget request for fiscal year 2013 shifted Ohio-class replacement's (OR) lead ship construction from fiscal year 2019 to fiscal year 2021 with all follow-on submarines also being shifted 2 years. The Department remains committed to accomplishing the design and construction in the most cost-effective manner possible.

This delay results in a 10-year reduction in SSBN force level. Delaying the start of construction adds risk to the Navy's ability to meet current STRATCOM requirements in the 2030s; however, during this time, neither the Ohio-class (nor the Ohio replacement) will have major overhauls planned, helping to mitigate the risk associated with a reduced force level during this period. The Navy will be closely managing this risk during this transition period. By 2042, OR construction plans will return the SSBN force level to 12, supporting the start of extended maintenance periods for the new class and removing on average 2 SSBNs from the operational fleet per year.

This delay will not materially affect the ability of the Department to support the President's commitment to a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent as long as nuclear weapons exist. I believe that we must continue to aggressively scrutinize each of our programs to ensure we maintain critical capabilities in a fiscally responsible manner, which includes force modernization efforts such as the Ohio-class replacement.

ACQUISITION WASTE

28. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Estevez, DOD, at times, has a dismal record in regards to its acquisition programs. In a report by the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessment, they estimate that in the last decade alone, $46 billion has been utilized on programs that were never fielded to the force. Wasteful spending must be mitigated and eliminated in regards to our defense acquisition programs. What overhaul or changes will you implement to ensure that acquisition programs are feasible and executable?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. If confirmed, I will continue to support the evolution of the Department's Better Buying Power initiatives and related activities. I will facilitate the implementation of affordability analysis and cost constraints on programs; in particular, this will involve monitoring and enforcing affordability caps while working with the Service Acquisition Executives and the requirements community to address cases where, despite all efforts to control costs, the caps cannot be met. In addition, I will expand the use of identifying and monitoring key framing assumptions as a tool for informing decisions as early as possible.

Throughout all of these activities, I will support the development of our acquisition workforce. Program feasibility and executability rely on our ability to work openly and intelligently with our partners outside the immediate acquisition community to inform their decisions and expectations as to what capabilities our technology and industrial base can provide and at what cost and schedule.

SMALL BUSINESS ACT

29. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Estevez, there is inherent value of small businesses in our economy which support public good especially in the economic advancement of disadvantaged demographics such as Veterans, Native Americans, Women, and Minorities. However, the Military Services all struggle to reach the 23 percent small business award goal set forth in the legislation of the Small Business Act. The Services often feel pressure to award a contract to small business to reach that goal, sometimes at greater expense to the taxpayer and lower quality to the warfighter. As a consequence, this adversely affects the cost and quality of capabilities needed by our warfighters. Also, equally worthy organizations such as non-profit institutions or educational organizations are excluded from contract competition. Given the current budget crisis facing DOD, how should we amend the Small Business Act to better serve the taxpayers and the warfighters?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. I believe that the Small Business Act, as implemented in the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) and DOD FAR Supplement, properly protects the best interests of our warfighters and the taxpayers and, at this time, I do not believe that changes to the Small Business Act are needed to achieve that objective.

Although the Small Business Act requires that the Government-wide goal for small business prime contracts be established at not less than 23 percent, the Small Business Administration negotiates with agencies to establish individual agency goals that, in the aggregate, comprise the Government-wide goal. The fiscal year 2013 DOD goal for Small Business prime contracting is 22.5 percent. Among the Military Services, the Department of the Army has consistently exceeded the DOD goal, averaging 24.06 percent between fiscal year 2009 and fiscal year 2012.

Furthermore, it has not been my experience that awarding contracts to small businesses has resulted in greater expense to the taxpayer and lower quality to the warfighter. I note in this regard that the FAR Part 19.501(g) provides that, "Except as authorized by law, a contract may not be awarded as a result of a small business set-aside if the cost to the awarding agency exceeds the fair market price." FAR Part 9, pertaining to contractor qualifications, prescribes the policy at FAR Part 9.103 that, "Purchases shall be made from, and contracts awarded to, responsible prospective contractors only." I believe DOD's acquisition workforce strives to ensure that awarded contracts represent the best value to the Government and taxpayers, while ensuring that quality goods and services are provided. In my experience, rather than adversely affecting the cost and quality of capabilities, small businesses are an important source of cost-effective innovation critical to supporting the needs of our warfighters.

30. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Estevez, how would you direct the Services to implement current exceptions to the FARs to protect educational or other non-profit institutions as well as our ability to achieve industrial mobilization?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. This is an important area and, if confirmed, I will monitor it closely. I believe the FAR permits educational and other non-profit institutions to participate in full and open competition for DOD procurements. I am unaware of instances where they have been prohibited from doing so. Additionally, protecting our ability to achieve industrial mobilization and protecting educational or other non-profit institutions providing critical support in this area can be addressed using FAR Part 6.302–3. This regulation provides that "Full and open competition need not be provided for when it is necessary to award the contract to a particular source or sources in order: (i) To maintain a facility, producer, manufacturer, or other supplier available for furnishing supplies or services. to achieve industrial mobilization," or "(ii) To establish or maintain an essential engineering, research, or development capability to be provided by an educational or other nonprofit institution or a federally funded research and development center."

Furthermore, most of DOD's work with educational and other non-profit institutions takes place pursuant to grant regulations rather than under the FAR. Therefore, at this time, I do not feel that it is necessary to provide additional direction to the Services to address these issues.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

DEFENSE INDUSTRIAL BASE

31. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Estevez, in your responses to the advance policy questions, you say that you are: "concerned about the impact that further defense budget cuts would have on the ability of the [industrial] base to provide the broad range of products and services that the Department and our Nation need." What impact would defense sequestration and a full year Continuing Resolution have on our defense industrial base?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Although a full year Continuing Resolution did not materialize, Defense sequestration is expected to lead to unintended, unsafe, and wasteful consequences for the Department, some of which will have secondary effects that last for years. Sequestration will degrade capital market confidence in the defense industry. Companies have been less willing to make internal investments in their defense portfolio, including investments in innovation and design. The impact of sequestration will be even greater on smaller firms at the lower levels of the supply chain, where much of the innovation takes place. These smaller firms often lack the capital structure to withstand prolonged uncertainty. As a result, we expect to see additional merger activity and vertical integration at the lower tiers. Some firms, particularly the small firms with more fragile capital structures, may have to close their doors completely. Continued technological innovation and the financial viability of our defense industrial base are strongly in our national interest.

32. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Estevez, what impact would this damage to our defense industrial base have on our warfighters?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. With reductions in funding, there is a likelihood that market forces and dynamics will lead to a restructuring of our industrial base. In a normal downturn cycle, these forces, and competition in general, can be positive in that they ensure industry is cost-effective and providing the greatest value for the taxpayer's investment. However, in a rapid or unstructured decline, the impact can have long-term negative consequences.

In the near-term, we could expect to see some consolidation within the smaller and mid-size firms in the industrial base, which may siphon away some critical skills, particularly in the areas of engineering and design. Our technological superiority on the battlefield relies on the skills of the engineering and design teams within industry. The loss of these design teams could have a long-term negative impact on the Department's ability to field the capabilities our warfighters need.

Recognizing the changing nature of the fiscal outlook, in 2011, the Department implemented a sector-by-sector and tier-by-tier approach to assessing the industrial base. This approach methodically assesses the criticality and fragility of DOD vendors, across sectors and down through the tiers, to identify critical skills and capabilities that if lost, could negatively affect the ability of industry to satisfy DOD requirements when called upon. In part, because of these analyses, the Department is better able to inform decisionmakers in the Services and at the Department level of the potential industrial capability impacts of budget decisions.

33. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Estevez, how would this impact our national security?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Defense cuts must be carefully managed to minimize the impact on national security. With reduced investment in the private sector, it is logical to expect some job losses as industry right-sizes to support the Department's needs. Defense cuts may disproportionately impact smaller firms at the lower levels of the supply chain because these firms lack the capital structure to withstand prolonged cuts. As a result, we will see additional merger activity and vertical integration at the lower tiers of the defense industrial base as companies reduce capacity to meet demand. This merger activity could lead to the loss of innovation and design capabilities in the industrial base. Mergers may result in reduced competition, which the government will have to monitor or address on a transaction by transaction basis. With reductions in design capabilities and production capabilities, we may see longer timelines to field, maintain, or overhaul equipment. We may also need, over the long-term, to invest significantly to restore lost capability and capacity during a crisis.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE S. LEE

BIOFUELS

34. Senator LEE. Mr. Estevez, in 2012, the Navy undertook the expensive "Great Green Fleet" demonstration, purchasing 450,000 gallons of biofuel at $26 a gallon for a total of $12 million spent on fuel for just one demonstration. The Air Force similarly spent $639,000 on 11,000 gallons of biofuels for a demonstration in 2012, costing the taxpayer $59 per gallon. With the prospect of sequestration and a much tighter defense budget in coming years, do you believe that the military should continue such large-scale demonstrations using biofuels? Please provide a yes or no answer, and if answering yes, please provide a justification as to why programs involving biofuels should be prioritized over other research and development programs.

Mr. ESTEVEZ. Yes, I believe that DOD should continue its modest investment in alternative fuels. As one of the world's largest consumers of petroleum, the Department has an interest in diversification of fuel supplies as a hedge against potential supply disruptions, especially for our legacy fleet of ships and planes, which will be with us for decades to come. Over the next 5 years, 96 percent of the Department's funding to improve operational energy use is devoted to reducing the amount of fuel required for military operations. The remaining 4 percent is a relatively small, but important investment in alternative fuels, which is a longer term strategy for our energy security. Most of this investment ensures that our equipment can operate on a wide range of fuels, so we are prepared if and when alternative fuels become commercially available. As petroleum is a finite resource, we believe this to be a prudent investment, and we have been performing these types of activities since 2003.

The Department's primary alternative fuels goal is to ensure operational military readiness and further the flexibility of military operations through the ability to use multiple reliable fuel sources. To help achieve this goal, we released the DOD Alternative Fuels Policy for Operational Platforms in July 2012. The policy confirms that all investments are subject to rigorous, merit-based evaluation and that the Department will not make bulk purchases unless they are cost competitive with petroleum products. To date, the Department has only purchased relatively small test quantities of alternative fuels, which are used in testing, evaluation, or demonstration activities. These purchases are mostly prototypes and should not be equated with commercial fuels purchases. I will ensure that the Department complies with the existing internal policy.

FUTURE ACQUISITION PROCESS

35. Senator LEE. Mr. Estevez, with the prospect of sequester cuts to DOD this year and continuing cuts through the next 9 fiscal years, we must change the way that acquisitions are conducted in order to be more efficient and cost effective. Necessary acquisitions, such as our next generation fighter jet, have been plagued by delays and budget overruns. What lessons have been learned so far from the F–35 program that you will implement in future acquisitions?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. There are a number of lessons from the F–35 program that we are applying across the acquisition structure. The previously approved level of concurrency in the F–35 program was based on the expectation that improvements in engineering design tools and modeling and simulation capabilities would result in a reduced level of discovery in flight test compared to our historical experience with similar acquisition programs. However, we learned those assumptions were invalid and they have not replaced the need for careful and thorough developmental testing of complex weapons systems. We need to ensure acquisition strategies are based on sound technological judgment, reinforced with strong program management underpinned with proven systems engineering and appropriate developmental testing. We have introduced Better Buying Power initiatives that will reinforce strong acquisition discipline, manage costs and program affordability, and strengthen the acquisition workforce. I believe it is vital that the acquisition and engineering professional leadership in the Department exercise early active involvement in our acquisition programs, and regularly ensure sound program management, engineering, and testing for every program. A program based on sound acquisition and engineering principles will have the best chance to succeed and execute within its planned cost and schedule.

F–35 COST OVERRUNS

36. Senator LEE. Mr. Estevez, delays and cost overruns with the F–35 have caused some of our partner nations, most recently Canada and Australia, to reassess their acquisition of the jets. What effects will a reduction of purchases outside of the United States have on the program and the cost of the jet?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The F–35 delivers joint- and partner-nation air power essential to our mutual security strategy and is a capability needed to defeat 21st century threats. The F–35 program was established on the concept of economies of scale for purchases. Any reduction in the planned procurement quantity of F–35s, either from the International Partners or from a U.S. Service, will result in an increase in the unit cost of each remaining F–35 to be procured. The amount of the cost increase will be a factor of how many jets are reduced from the currently planned procurement quantities, and in which years.

37. Senator LEE. Mr. Estevez, how are DOD and the Air Force working with our partner nations to address their concerns and maintain their participation in the program?

Mr. ESTEVEZ. The F–35 Program Executive Officer (PEO) and his staff actively engage the F–35 Partner nations on a daily basis. Members of the Partner nations are fully integrated into the F–35 Program Office. The PEO ensures open lines of communication to all of the Partners, so that all countries have the latest programmatic, technical, and financial updates to support their sovereign decisions on participation and purchases. Additionally, the Lead Service Acquisition Executive and the PEO host a number of forums throughout the year, such as the JSF Executive Steering Board, where all of the Partner nations can voice their concerns and have a discussion with senior program leaders. The Defense Acquisition Executive informs all of the Partner National Armament Directors on major U.S. budget developments affecting development and procurement accounts, in addition to hosting them annually (along with the CEOs of the larger F–35 defense contractors) to review strategic level program progress and concerns. The F–35 program has demonstrated continued progress in a number of areas. Of paramount interest to the partner nations is affordability and they are encouraged with the continued cost reduction improvements realized in the unit cost of the aircraft. However, sequestration effects may negatively impact this improvement in affordability over the long-term.

[The nomination reference of Hon. Alan F. Estevez follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 22, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Alan F. Estevez, of the District of Columbia, to be a Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense, vice Frank Kendall III.

[The biographical sketch of Hon. Alan F. Estevez, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF ALAN FREDRIC ESTEVEZ

Education:

North Arlington High School, NJ

- 1971–1975
- High School Diploma awarded 1975

Rutgers University

- 1975–1979
- Bachelor of Arts Degree awarded 1979

Industrial College of the Armed Forces/National Defense University

- 1994–1995
- Masters of Science Degree awarded 1995

Employment record:

Department of Defense

- Assistant Secretary of Defense (Logistics & Materiel Readiness)
  - August 2011–Present
- Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Logistics & Materiel Readiness)
  - November 2006–August 2011
  - Performing the Duties of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Logistics & Materiel Readiness), April 2009–August 2011
- Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Supply Chain Integration)
  - October 2002–November 2006
- Deputy, Office of the Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Transportation Policy)
  - May 2000–October 2002
  - Acting Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Transportation Policy), September 2001–December 2001
- Assistant for Traffic Management, Office of the Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Transportation Policy)
  - December 1995–May 2000

Honors and awards:

Department of Defense Distinguished Public Service Award (2013)
Department of Defense Distinguished Civilian Service Award (2011)
Presidential Rank Distinguished Executive Award (2011)
Presidential Rank Meritorious Executive Award (2006)

Office of the Secretary of Defense Medal for Meritorious Civilian Service (2005 & 2009)
Service to America Medal, National Security Category (2005)
Office of the Secretary of Defense Medal for Exceptional Civilian Service (2001)
Office of the Secretary of Defense Award for Excellence (1997)
Defense Logistics Agency Superior Civilian Service Award (1997)

[The Committee on Armed Services requires all individuals nominated from civilian life by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial, and other information of the nominee. The form executed by Hon. Alan F. Estevez in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Alan Fredric Estevez.

2. Position to which nominated:
Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics).

3. Date of nomination:
January 22, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
September 20, 1957; Kearny, NJ.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married to Susan Hideko Pearson (Ludrick).

7. Names and ages of children:
N/A.

8. Education: List secondary and higher education institutions, dates attended, degree received, and date degree granted.
Industrial College of the Armed Forces/National Defense University, Masters of Science in National Resource Strategy 1994–1995
Rutgers University, Bachelor of Arts in Political Science 1975–1979
North Arlington High School, NJ, High School Diploma 1971–1975

9. Employment record: List all jobs held since college or in the last 10 years, whichever is less, including the title or description of job, name of employer, location of work, and dates of employment.

Assistant Secretary of Defense (Logistics & Materiel Readiness), Department of Defense, Pentagon, Washington, DC, Aug. 2011–Present
Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Logistics & Materiel Readiness), Department of Defense, Pentagon, Washington, DC, Nov. 2006–Aug. 2011

- Performing the Duties of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Logistics & Materiel Readiness) April 2009–August 2011

Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Supply Chain Integration), Department of Defense, Pentagon, Washington, DC, Oct. 2002–Nov. 2006
Deputy, Office of the Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Transportation Policy), Department of Defense, Pentagon, Washington, DC, May 2000–Oct. 2002

- Acting Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Transportation Policy), Department of Defense, Pentagon, Washington, DC, Sept. 2001–Dec. 2001

Assistant for Traffic Management, Office of the Assistant Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Transportation Policy), Department of Defense, Pentagon, Washington, DC, Dec. 1995–May 2000

10. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed above.
DOD Liaison to Board of Governors, Electronic Product Code Global (EPCGlobal), Global Standard 1 (GS1) (standard setting group) 2004–2011.

11. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.
None.

12. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.
Member, National Defense Industrial Association
Member, Museum of Modern Art, NY
Member, Defenders of Wildlife
Member, Friends of the National Zoo
Member, Corcoran Gallery
Member, WETA
Member, The Potomac Conservancy
Member, Habitat For Humanity
Member, National Parks Conservation Association Member, The Nature Conservancy
Member, Rails to Trails
Member, Chesapeake Bay Foundation
Member, WAMU 88.5
Member, Philips Collection
Member, Potomac Appalachian Trail Club Member, C&O Canal Trust

13. Political affiliations and activities:
(a) List all offices with a political party which you have held or any public office for which you have been a candidate.
None.
(b) List all memberships and offices held in and services rendered to all political parties or election committees during the last 5 years.
None.
(c) Itemize all political contributions to any individual, campaign organization, political party, political action committee, or similar entity of $100 or more for the past 5 years.
None.

14. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, military medals and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements.
Department of Defense Distinguished Public Service Award, 2013
Department of Defense Distinguished Civilian Service Award, 2011
Presidential Rank Distinguished Executive Award, 2011
Presidential Rank Meritorious Executive Award, 2006
Office of the Secretary of Defense Medal for Meritorious Civilian Service, 2005 & 2009
Service to America Medal, National Security Category, 2005

Office of the Secretary of Defense Medal for Exceptional Civilian Service, 2001
Office of the Secretary of Defense Award for Excellence, 1997
Defense Logistics Agency Superior Civilian Service Award, 1997

15. Published writings: List the titles, publishers, and dates of books, articles, reports, or other published materials which you have written.

Estevez, A.F. and S. Geary (2006), "RFID: The Future is Now," Exceptional Release Magazine, Summer 2006, pp 26–29.

Estevez, Alan F., (2005), "RFID Vision in the DOD Supply Chain," Army Logistician, May–June 2005, pp 5–9.

Estevez, A.F. and S. Geary (2004), "Lessons from the Desert," Supply Chain Management Review, November/December 2004, pp. 38–43.

16. Speeches: Provide the committee with two copies of any formal speeches you have delivered during the last 5 years which you have copies of and are on topics relevant to the position for which you have been nominated.

I speak in my official capacity at various events about once a month on topics general DOD logistics topics. However, these are not formal speeches.

17.Commitments regarding nomination, confirmation, and service:

(a) Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Yes.

(b) Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

No.

(c) If confirmed, will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Yes.

(d) Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Yes.

(e) Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

Yes.

(f) Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

Yes.

(g) Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Yes.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–F of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–F are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

ALAN F. ESTEVEZ.

This 25th day of February, 2013.

[The nomination of Hon. Alan F. Estevez was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on March 20, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on October 30, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Mr. Frederick E. Vollrath by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. Currently, I am not aware of a need for modifications to the act but if confirmed I will review its implementation and will recommend modifications if necessary.

DUTIES

Question. Section 138 of title 10, U.S.C., provides that Assistant Secretaries of Defense shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary of Defense my prescribe.

This is a new position. Assuming you are confirmed, what duties do you expect to be assigned to you?

Answer. Upon my appointment as Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management (PDASD(R&FM)) in March 2012, it has been my task to establish the Office of Readiness and Force Management and I have been performing the duties of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management. In this position, I have been serving as the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense and the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness (USD(P&R)) on all matters relating to the areas of civilian and military personnel policies, readiness of the force, military community and family policy, Total Force planning and requirements, diversity management, equal opportunity, and transition policy.

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you to perform the duties of this position?

Answer. I have over 40 years of human resource management and executive leadership experience, including organizational development with an emphasis on strategic level efficiencies. I retired in the rank of lieutenant general after serving 35 years in the U.S. Army human resource management command and staff positions. I last served as the U.S. Army's Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel (G–1), where I directed all aspects of human resources management and administration for the total Army. I have also served as the corporate Vice President of Human Resources (HR) for a large global Fortune 150 Company. I have the unique experience of both government and nongovernment HR experience.

Question. Do you believe that there are any additional steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform these duties?

Answer. Upon starting in the position of PDASD(R&FM), I immediately conducted face-to-face meetings with my staff (collaborative and a open dialogue). I routinely meet with the deputy assistant secretaries, directors, and the Acting Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness to stay informed of current issues and to adjust strategies as needed. I will continue to reach out to the Departments of Veterans Affairs and Labor and the Office of Personnel Management to better our efforts to collaborate in solutions to DOD HR issues.

MAJOR CHALLENGES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges confronting the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management (ASD(R&FM))?

Answer. In my view, major challenges currently confronting the ASD(R&FM) include the reduced ability to accomplish all of our missions should sequestration and resulting furloughs of the civilian workforce come to pass; finding meaningful ways to combat the Department's rising level of suicides; sustaining the All-Volunteer Force during these fiscally challenging times, as well as ensuring that we have the right Force mix as we drawdown Service end strength while applying greater manpower to emerging areas of growth such as cyber; expanding the Transition Assistance Program (TAP) and implementing the new Civilian Personnel Performance Management System; ensuring the policy provisions are complete to adopt the changes from the extension of Same-Sex Partner Benefits; and ensuring the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Commission has the appropriate DOD recommendations prior to the required deadline.

Question. If confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the subject matter experts and leadership in these areas to develop proactive responses and approaches to ensure that all courses of action are timely and appropriate.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. In carrying out these duties, what would be your relationship with the following officials:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I would report through the USD(P&R) to the Secretary of Defense as this position reports directly to the USD(P&R).

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I would report through the USD(P&R) to the Deputy Secretary of Defense as this position reports directly to the USD(P&R).

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness

Answer. The ASD(R&FM) reports directly to the USD(P&R) and serves as the primary advisor on all matters relating to the areas of civilian and military personnel policies, readiness of the force, military community and family policy, Total Force planning and requirements, diversity management, equal opportunity, and transition policy. The ASD(R&FM) also provides regular updates to USD regarding matters in ASD portfolio.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs.

Answer. Collaborates with ASD for Health Affairs on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs.

Answer. Collaborate with the ASD for Reserve Affairs on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Materiel Readiness (ASD(L&MR)).

Answer. The ASD(R&FM) collaborates with ASD(L&MR) on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature.

Question. The Department of Defense General Counsel.

Answer. Seek advice on all legal matters or services performed within the office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management.

Question. The Department of Defense Inspector General.

Answer. Forward or respond to any instances of waste, fraud and abuse within the office of the ASD(R&FM) and cooperate with the Inspector General on any investigative activities.

Question. The Service Secretaries.

Answer. Collaborate with Service Secretaries on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature. Seek Service input on major policy initiatives.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries for Manpower and Reserve Affairs of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

Answer. Meet regularly with M&RAs to discuss key personnel issues. Collaborate on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature and seek input on major policy initiatives.

Question. The Deputy Chiefs of Staff of the Army and Air Force for Personnel, the Chief of Naval Personnel, and the Deputy Commandant of the Marine Corps for Manpower and Reserve Affairs

Answer. Meet with Service Chiefs on key personnel issues. Collaborate on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature.

Question. The combatant commanders

Answer. Formal communications to the commanders of the combatant commands normally is transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. The Joint Staff, particularly the Director for Manpower and Personnel (J–1)

Answer. Meet with J–1 on key personnel issues and collaborate on matters of mutual interest or are cross-cutting in nature.

DISABILITY SEVERANCE PAY

Question. Section 1646 of the Wounded Warrior Act, included in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008, enhanced severance pay and removed a requirement that severance pay be deducted from VA disability compensation for servicemembers discharged for disabilities rated less than 30 percent incurred in the line-of-duty in a combat zone or incurred during the performance of duty in combat-related operation as designated by the Secretary of Defense. In adopting this provision, Congress relied on the existing definition of a combat-related disability contained in title 10 U.S.C. 1413a(e)). Rather than using the definition intended by Congress, the Department of Defense adopted a more limited definition of combat-related operations, requiring that the disability be incurred during participation in armed conflict.

What is your understanding of the number of servicemembers impacted by the DOD interpretation of "combat-related disability," and how did the DOD interpretation affect their compensation?

If confirmed, will you reconsider the Department's definition of combat-related operations for purposes of awarding enhanced severance pay and deduction of severance pay from VA disability compensation?

Answer. Since Enhanced Disability Severance Pay is outside the portfolio of OASD(R&FM), I do not have specific details on this program. I will ensure that the proper authorities, namely the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs, understand the concern expressed here and encourage a review of policy to ensure equitable and fair treatment of our disabled servicemembers.

HOMOSEXUAL CONDUCT POLICY

Question. The law commonly referred to as "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" was repealed effective September 20, 2011. As part of the implementation of this repeal, the Secretary of Defense appointed a benefits review group to conduct a review of all potential benefits that could be made available to same-sex spouses. The report of this review group is long overdue and has been repeatedly delayed.

What is your view of the repeal of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" (DADT)?

Answer. On July 22, 2011, the President, Secretary of Defense and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff certified that repeal was consistent with the standards of military readiness, military effectiveness, unit cohesion, and recruiting and retention of the Armed Forces. Repeal occurred September 20, 2011. I fully support the repeal of DADT.

Question. What is your assessment of the implementation of the repeal of this law?

Answer. Since September 20, 2011, the effective date of repeal, the Service Secretaries, the Service Chiefs and the combatant commanders have reported no significant issues related to implementation of the repeal of DADT. I believe this success can be attributed to the Department's comprehensive pre-repeal training programs, combined with the discipline of our servicemembers and continued close monitoring and enforcement of standards by our military leaders at all levels Question. What is the status of the report of the benefits review group? When is this group expected to issue its report?

Answer. Following repeal, the Department focused its attention to benefits. The Department conducted a deliberative and comprehensive review of the possibility of extending eligibility for benefits, when legally permitted, to same-sex domestic partners of servicemembers. The benefits were examined from a policy, fiscal, legal and feasibility perspective. That review has been finalized and the Secretary of Defense approved the extension of an additional two member-designated benefits and 22 additional benefits that are to be made available by August, 31, 2013 but no later than October 1, 2013.

Question. What is your view on the issue of providing military and survivor benefits to same-sex partners?

Answer. When DADT was repealed, there remained some areas where our members and their families were not treated equally. In some of these areas, the Department can take administrative action that better cares for members and their families, consistent with the law. When servicemembers don't have to worry about their families back home, they can better focus on the mission.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that completion of the report of the Benefits Review Group is expedited and provided to Congress?

Answer. The Joint Benefits Review Working Group was chartered to provide recommendations to the Secretary of Defense on benefits that could be extended from a policy, fiscal, legal and feasibility perspective. The Secretary of Defense made his decision concerning the recommendation and released a memo on February 11, 2013 detailing which benefits would be extended.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. What is your understanding of current policies and programs of the Department of Defense regarding religious practices in the military?

Answer. Current policies and programs of the Department of Defense regarding religious practices in the military ensure servicemembers' rights to observe the tenets of their respective religions, as well as to hold no specific religious conviction or affiliation. The Chaplaincies of the Military Departments advise and assist commanders in the discharge of their responsibilities to provide for the free exercise of religion in the context of military service as guaranteed by the Constitution, assist commanders in managing Religious Affairs and serve as the principal advisors to commanders for all issues regarding the impact of religion on military operations.

Question. In your view, do these policies appropriately accommodate religious practices that require adherents to wear items of religious apparel or adhere to certain grooming practices related to their faith?

Answer. Current policies allow for consideration of accommodations of religious apparel that do not interfere with the performance of military duties. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Military Services to ensure that we maintain the right balance between military uniform and appearance standards and servicemembers' personal religious practices.

Question. In your view, do these policies appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Yes, in my view, current policies appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion for all servicemembers in the pluralistic environment that is the U.S. military. The Department of Defense does not endorse any one religion or religious organization, and provides free access of religion for all members of the military services. The Department respects (and supports by its policy) the rights of others to their own religious beliefs, including the right to hold no beliefs. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor and assess these policies.

Question. What is your assessment of measures taken at the Service Academies to ensure religious tolerance and respect?

Answer. My assessment is that these measures have been successful in fostering religious tolerance and respect. Systems are in place to provide the means for cadets to address and resolve any perceived unfair treatment on the basis of race, national origin, color, gender, and/or religious affiliation, or sexual harassment. Servicemembers can use the chain of command, Inspector General or Equal Opportunity channels to raise concerns.

Question. In your view, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by military chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious beliefs?

Answer. Existing policies provide military chaplains with sufficient guidance that allows them to balance, in both formal and informal settings, their own faith practices with the rights of others who may hold different or no religious beliefs. I acknowledge that this at times can be a difficult balance to achieve, and if confirmed, I will continue to work with the civilian and military leadership of the Department to ensure this balance is maintained.

Question. The Independent Review Related to Fort Hood observed that "DOD policy regarding religious accommodation lacks the clarity necessary to help commanders distinguish appropriate religious practices from those that might indicate a potential for violence or self-radicalization." Recommendation 2.7 of the Final Recommendations urged the Department to update policy to clarify guidelines for religious accommodation and Recommendation 2.8 urged the Department to task the Defense Science Board to "undertake a multi-disciplinary study to identify behavioral indicators of violence and self-radicalization . . . ".

What is your view of this recommendation?

Answer. Ensuring appropriate accommodations for the free exercise of religions and protecting servicemembers from violence and harm are both of vital importance. Pursuant to Recommendation 2.7, the Department updated its policy on religious accommodation to ensure religious freedoms and practices are accommodated to the fullest extent possible considering mission readiness, discipline and unit cohesion. This policy is currently under revision to incorporate language from The National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2013, section 533 which protects the rights of conscience of members of the Armed Forces and chaplains. Regarding Recommendation 2.8, the Department did task the Defense Science Board (DSB) to undertake a study. The DSB recently completed their study and found that it could not determine a specific list of behaviors that would indicate risk of violent/extremist behavior. If I am confirmed, I will continue to provide oversight regarding the implementation of the recommendations of the Fort Hood Review.

Question. Will you work to ensure that a scientific factbased approach to understanding radicalization will drive the Department's relevant policies on this topic?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed I will review the Department's existing policies and its plans to address these challenges and determine what, if any, changes should be made. I agree that any changes to how the Department approaches this issue should be based on a solid factual foundation.

MUSLIMS IN THE U.S. MILITARY

Question. In your view, did the attack at Ft. Hood encourage harassment or even violence against Muslims in the military?

Answer. The incident at Fort Hood was a tragedy and an isolated event. We must not allow the circumstances surrounding that incident to compromise the military's core values regarding the free exercise of religion and to ensure that we treat every servicemember with dignity and respect. Each servicemember has the right to practice his or her religious faith without fear of persecution or retribution. This is a core value of our Country and our military.

Question. If confirmed, what strategies would you advocate to address the potential for harassment or violence against Muslims in the U.S. military?

Answer. This sort of behavior or any form of cruelty and maltreatment is inconsistent with the military's core values, detracts from combat capability, and has no place in the Armed Forces. Through ensuring clear and consistent policy, commanders and leaders at all levels will have the guidance necessary to maintain an environment that promotes dignity and respect, and will hold them accountable for preventing harassment or mistreatment.

HAZING

Question. Numerous incidents of hazing have been reported during the last year, several of which involved suicide by hazing victims. Although several of those who committed the hazing were prosecuted, they were acquitted of the most serious allegations.

Does the Department of Defense have a comprehensive policy addressing hazing? If so, what is the policy and where is it documented?

Answer. A 1997 Secretary of Defense policy memorandum prohibiting hazing is unambiguous; however, the guidance clearly states it is contrary to good order and discipline and is unacceptable behavior. This guidance also defines the prohibited conduct which constitutes hazing as well as guidance for dealing with violations.

Recent leadership statements have continued to emphasize that such behavior will not be tolerated, to include the Secretary of Defense message of December 2011, the Secretary of the Army's tri-signed message of January 2012, and the All Marine Corps Activities message and revised Marine Corps Order 1700.28A of February 2012.

Question. In your view, should the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) be amended to specifically prohibit hazing? Are other changes to the UCMJ needed to adjudicate allegations of hazing?

Answer. It is my understanding that the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice has completed its review of hazing as a separate offense under the UCMJ and the associated report is currently under departmental review.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to address the issue of hazing?

Answer. The DOD Hazing Review Team is actively examining responsive courses of action in three focus areas—policy, training and education, and reporting—all reinforce the Department's position that hazing is unacceptable behavior.

WOMEN IN THE MILITARY

Question. Secretary Panetta, at the recommendation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, recently rescinded the policy restricting the assignment of women to certain units which have the primary mission of engaging in direct ground combat operations, and has given the military services until January 1, 2016, to open all positions currently closed to women, or to request an exception to policy to keep a position closed beyond that date, an exception that must be approved by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense.

Do you support Secretary Panetta's decision?

Answer. Yes, I support the measures Secretary Panetta has taken to expand the positions available to women.

Question. What is your view of the appropriate role for women in the Armed Forces?

Answer. I believe success in our military is based upon ability, qualifications and performance of a person consistent with our values and military readiness. I don't believe there is an appropriate role for men or for women, rather there is an appropriate position for anyone who can meet the requirements of that position.

Question. Do you believe it is in the national security interest to rescind the policy restricting assignment of women to certain units which have the primary mission of engaging in direct ground combat operations? Why or why not?

Answer. Yes, it is in the best interest of this nation to permit the most qualified individual, who meets the requirements of a position, to serve in that position regardless of gender.

Question. If confirmed, what action will you take to ensure that physical standards will be realistic and will preserve military readiness and mission capability?

Answer. The Department of Defense is aware of Public Law 103–160, section 543, which prohibits the Department from changing an occupational performance standard for the purpose of increasing or decreasing the number of women in that occupational career field. To ensure physical standards are being properly developed and accurately correlate with the requirements of the position or occupation, we have partnered with RAND to assess the Services' work against industry standards.

Question. Do you believe that decisions to open positions should be based on bona fide military requirements? If so, what steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that such decisions are made on this basis?

Answer. It is not a requirement to have women in these positions; rather it is in the best interest of the Department to allow both men and women who meet the standards for these positions to compete for them. This is not a program to put women into direct ground combat positions; it's a program to remove gender as a selection disqualifier and, if confirmed, I will ensure that such decisions are consistent with that approach.

Question. Some family members have expressed concerns about assigning women to what are currently male-only combat units.

To what extent do you believe that this will be a problem in the implementation of this policy?

Answer. It's normal for family members to have concerns about their loved ones, however I expect our commanders to select qualified personnel, male or female. Additionally, we have had a number of women in newly opened units since mid-2012, and have already experienced successful integration of women into formerly male-only units.

Question. If it is a problem, what steps would you take if confirmed to address it?

Answer. We've required the Services to provide us quarterly feedback on their elimination of gender-restrictive policy, which includes feedback on the status of women in these newly opened positions. If problems are encountered, I will, if confirmed, examine the issue and address it considering all dimensions and all recommendations consistent with sustaining readiness.

PERSONNEL AND ENTITLEMENT COSTS

Question. Personnel and related entitlement spending continues to grow and is becoming an ever increasing portion of the DOD budget.

What actions do you believe can and should be taken, if any, to control the rise in personnel costs and entitlement spending?

Answer. Congress, in the 2013 National Defense Authorization Act, established a Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Commission. Currently, the Department is reviewing all aspects of military compensation and benefits in order to provided recommendations to the Commission later this fall.

As a Department, we must continually strive to balance our responsibilities to our servicemembers, to the Nation, and to the American taxpayers. If confirmed, I am committed to exploring options to find savings and more efficient alternatives to help control the rise in personnel and entitlement costs while still fully supporting our men and women in uniform and the All-Volunteer Force.

Question. In your view, can the Department and the Services efficiently manage the use of bonuses and special pays to place high quality recruits in the right jobs without paying more than the Department needs to pay, or can afford to pay, for other elements of the force?

Answer. Bonuses and special and incentive pays are some of the most cost effective tools available to the Services. These tools provide effective and easily targetable incentives without the long-term costs associated with entitlements and are generally much more cost-effective than across-the-board pay increases. Like any compensation program, however, these tools must be continually monitored to ensure they are used both efficiently and effectively and that the Department is receiving best value for its dollars. If confirmed, I will continue to work to ensure our bonus and special and incentive pay programs are administered effectively and efficiently.

DEPENDENT CARE AND FLEXIBLE SPENDING ACCOUNTS

Question. The 10th QRMC recommended providing dependent care and flexible spending benefits to Active Duty servicemembers. Providing these benefits would seem consistent with the initiatives of First Lady Michelle Obama and Dr. Jill Biden on behalf of military families. It would appear that no new legislative authority is needed for the Department to provide these benefits to servicemembers and their families.

If confirmed, would you extend these benefits to the Active Duty servicemembers and their families?

Answer. In response to the 2006 National Defense Authorization Act, the Department examined and provided a report on the possibility of providing a flexible spending account to military members. The report identified a number of advantages and disadvantages to the Department offering an Flexible Spending Account (FSA) for military members. The central issue was a debate of whether the tax advantage to military members would warrant the cost the Department would incur implementing and managing such a program. Generally, military members pay very little out of pocket for their health care and are in a low tax bracket. Therefore, the majority of active duty military members would see little, if any, benefit to implementation of an FSA. Finally, most reservists, who typically receive medical care outside the military system, already have access to an FSA.

SUICIDE PREVENTION

Question. The numbers of suicides in each of the Services continues to concern the Committee. The Army released a report in July 2010 that analyzed the causes of its growing suicide rate and examined disturbing trends in drug use, disciplinary offenses, and high risk behaviors. In addition, studies conducted by the Army of soldiers and marines in theater showed declines in individual morale and increases in mental health strain, especially among those who have experienced multiple deployments.

In your view, what role should the Department of Defense play in shaping policies to help prevent suicides both in garrison and in theater and to increase the resiliency of all servicemembers and their families, including members of the Reserve components?

Answer. Suicide is a complex problem and each individual circumstance is unique. However, I strongly believe that suicide prevention is a leadership responsibility, and the Department encourages everyone to responsibly seek professional behavioral health and other services.

To address the factors that contribute to suicidal behavior, I believe the Department must support a culture that promotes total force fitness and resilience. This requires both military and civilian leaders to be knowledgeable on how to enhance protective factors and a positive working environment. It means involving families in solutions and care planning. Peers and non-medical case managers also need to foster resilience and build a supportive community.

If confirmed, I will partner with the Services to ensure suicide prevention and resiliency building are emphasized at all levels along with the promotion of help-seeking behaviors and improving access to behavioral health care. I will focus on finding best practices and using them to provide guidance from which the Services can most effectively operate their suicide prevention programs across the total force.

READINESS RESPONSIBILITIES

Question. Section 136 of title 10, U.S.C., gives the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness certain responsibilities for military readiness. Some important issues that affect military readiness, however, such as logistics and materiel readiness, have been placed under the jurisdiction of the Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics.

What is your understanding of the responsibilities of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness in exercising policy and program oversight of military readiness, including materiel readiness?

Answer. The responsibilities of the USD(P&R) are to develop policies, plans, and programs for the total force and its allocation among the DOD components, and between the Active and Reserve components, to ensure efficient and effective support of wartime and peacetime operations, contingency planning, and preparedness. As part of these responsibilities, the USD(P&R) coordinates closely with the USD(AT&L) by reviewing and evaluating the requirements of the Defense Acquisition Board's major defense acquisition programs and proposed weapons systems for personnel, training, and readiness implications.

Question. If confirmed, what would you propose as the most critical objectives to improve policy and program oversight over military readiness?

Answer. One of the most critical objectives facing the Department is to oversee the Service's transition, as rapidly as possible, from a counterinsurgency focused force to a Joint force capable of operating effectively across the full range of military operations. This is driven by the recognition that despite today's fiscal challenges, our forces will be expected to provide enhanced presence, deterrence, and must also be prepared to respond rapidly to emerging crises in a diverse and complicated global environment. Specifically, we must create a Joint force capable of maintaining our commitment to rebalancing our global posture and presence to the Asia-Pacific region. These requirements call for a leaner force that is more agile, ready, and technologically advanced. Achieving this force will take time and other resources to fully achieve.

This transition is not about returning to pre-September 11 force profile and readiness standards. The global dynamic, pace of activity, and our military's global responsibilities have changed since then. We must again be ready for a wide range of possible missions across the spectrum of conflict.

Question. If confirmed, how would you work with the Military Departments as well as other Office of the Secretary of Defense offices to achieve them?

Answer. Military readiness, by its very nature, has some relevance for nearly every one of the DOD components. For this reason, my office must work closely with other OSD offices, the Services, the Joint Staff, the combatant commands, and the Combat Support Agencies (CSAs) to ensure we are all moving toward the same goals.

One of the primary mechanisms for ensuring coordination and synchronization with the DOD components on readiness issues is our participation in the Deputies Management Activities Group (DMAG). The Readiness DMAG series focuses on the Department-level readiness issues that impact current and future military readiness. In support of these DMAGs, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness has created a readiness forum that is co-lead by the Joint Staff J–3 and comprised of Service readiness leads, SOCOM, nearly every OSD component, and several representatives from across the Joint Staff. This forum meets regularly and serves as an important venue to raise critical readiness concerns as well as share management best practices.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the Department's systems for readiness reporting and monitoring of military forces?

Answer. With the deployment of the Defense Readiness Reporting System (DRRS) and the pending integration of the traditional Status of Resources and Training System (SORTS), the Department's systems are fully capable of capturing accurate and timely readiness reporting indicators. The traditional SORTS metrics provide critical information to the Services that assist in force management and train, organize, and equip decisions. The DRRS provides capability assessments for what the Service's provide that enable better COCOM assessments on their ability to execute the Defense Strategy.

Question. In your view, does the current readiness reporting system accurately and reliably collect and display the information necessary to establish that our forces are not only "ready" but "ready for what"?

Answer. DRRS, has the capability for all organizations, Service, Joint, and the CSAs, to assess their readiness for any and all missions. The use of Mission Essential Tasks in these assessments provides the fidelity and flexibility for organizations and tactical units to express what capabilities they can provide and what missions they are ready to execute.

READINESS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Question. The Joint Chiefs recently stated that "the readiness of our Armed Forces is at a tipping point. We are on the brink of creating a hollow force due to an unprecedented convergence of budget conditions and legislation that could require the Department to retain more forces than requested while underfunding that force's readiness."

How do you currently assess the readiness of the Armed Forces?

Answer. In my assessment, our military forces are exceptionally prepared for the missions they have undertaken for the last 11 years. The investments the Nation has made in training technologies, force protection, command and control, and intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance systems have helped maintain our military's standing as the most formidable force in the world. Today our forces are postured globally, conducting counterterrorism, stability, and deterrence operations, maintaining a stabilizing presence, conducting bilateral and multilateral training to enhance our security relationships, and providing the crisis response capabilities required to protect U.S. interests. In the event of an unexpected crisis, large-scale conflict, or a threat to the Homeland, ready forces are available to provide the surge capacity to meet wide-ranging operational challenges today.

Question. Do you agree with the Joint Chiefs that readiness is at a tipping point?

Answer. Maintaining ready forces is a priority and I share that concern with the Joint Chiefs. The current fiscal environment makes maintaining readiness very difficult. Managing readiness after a decade of war was bound to be challenging irrespective of fiscal considerations because the Services are beginning the difficult process of resetting and restoring our force's ability to conduct the full range of military operations as required by the current defense strategy.

I believe there is a very real possibility that the readiness effects of sequestration or indefinite operation under a Continuing Resolution could be devastating. These effects are likely to reduce readiness both directly, through reductions in operations and training, and indirectly through effects on personnel and equipment. Some of those indirect effects, especially those that effect personnel or spares pipelines, could take years to realize and even longer to mitigate.

Question. If confirmed, how would you assess the impact of budget conditions on the issue expressed by the Joint Chiefs of a hollow force?

Answer. I think that we can all agree that sequestration is not an effective method to both reduce the Department's budget and minimize the impact to the readiness of the force. I agree with Secretary Panetta's description of the current circumstances as a "perfect storm". Adding the devastating effects of sequestration on top of continuing to operate under a Continuing Resolution will likely cause circumstances that are guaranteed to reduce readiness both directly, through reductions in operations and training, and indirectly through circuitous effects on personnel and equipment.

Question. How would you define a hollow force?

Answer. A hollow force is a force that has been rendered incapable of performing the mission that we expect it to conduct. While the units may exist, they would not have the personnel, equipment, and/or training necessary to make them capable of executing the defense strategy or responding to the most likely contingencies.

Question. As the United States draws down the number of forces deployed to Afghanistan, Commanders have voiced concerns about leadership challenges for forces in garrison after 12 years of sustained combat operations.

If confirmed, what could be done at your level to assist commanders with force management and readiness?

Answer. I think many of the programs the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management provides oversight on are essential to commanders both in garrison and while deployed. These programs such as suicide prevention, safety, drug demand reduction, and a multitude of family programs will continue to be essential to commanders to help maintain the health of the force. Additionally, our role to provide oversight of the readiness of the Services to provide manned, trained and equipped forces puts us in a good position to engage with commanders at all levels as they adapt what being ready means as we transition from a counterinsurgency operation focused environment to a more full spectrum capable force. In the past year, our R&FM team has established a rich dialogue with the Services over these challenges.

Question. What will be your roles and responsibilities in monitoring Service goals for reset and reconstitution of combat forces and equipment?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Services and Joint Staff to monitor the Service's progress in meeting their goals for reset, reconstitution and a return to the full range of military operations as required by the current defense strategy with clear emphasis on proper training.

READINESS MONITORING

Question. Section 117 of title 10, U.S.C., directed the DOD to "establish a comprehensive readiness reporting system for the Department of Defense" which led to the creation of the Defense Readiness Reporting System (DRRS).

What is your understanding of the responsibility you will have, if confirmed, for the implementation and operation of DRRS?

Answer. If confirmed, I will have direct oversight of the DRRS Implementation Office and ensure the program reaches its Full Operational Capability (FOC) as efficiently and effectively as possible. Additionally, moving forward from FOC, through the DRRS Executive Committee, in conjunction with the Joint Staff, I will ensure the Department's future reporting needs continue to be addressed.

Question. What is your understanding of the relationship between the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Logistics and Material Readiness with regard to the implementation and operation of DRRS?

Answer. Materiel readiness is a key component of the Department's ability to accomplish its assigned missions. Under the auspices of ASD(R&FM), DRRS provides ASD(L&MR) the forum to understand materiel readiness effect on the Department's current operations and contingency plans.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the current implementation and operating capabilities of the DRRS?

Answer. DRRS is in use across the Department today providing up-to-date readiness information. Presently, an updated version of the system, which fully incorporates the Department's net-centric architecture to consume and serve up data, is undergoing formal third-party testing to validate its accuracy, suitability, and effectiveness. All testing results to date have been positive and the newly tested version of DRRS should be ready for release later this summer.

Question. How satisfied are you of the current ability of the DRRS to inform and contribute to the development of the National Security Strategy?

Answer. DRRS is a critical Global Force Management capability that supports the National Military Strategy (NMS) which contributes to the National Security Strategy. Specifically, DRRS provides near real-time capability-based readiness of the combatant commands, Services, and Joint Organizations. DRRS also provides the ability to view mission capability and readiness metrics for all DOD organizations which drives plans and actions to ensure mission accomplishment. Finally, DRRS uses Joint and Service provided authoritative data sources in a web-based architecture providing greater fidelity for refined analysis and force management. DRRS provides the holistic picture of the DOD from the highest levels to the tactical to inform the NMS.

Question. How satisfied are you of the current ability of the DRRS to inform and help shape the development of the defense planning guidance provided by the Secretary of Defense pursuant to section 113(g) of title 10?

Answer. DRRS permits the Secretary to effectively comply with items section 113(g) of title 10, as the means by which the Secretary is able to evaluate the Department's readiness to execute its missions and contingency plans. Additionally, the nature of DRRS and its incorporation of the Civil Support Task List allows the Department to evaluate plans for providing support to civil authorities.

Question. How satisfied are you of the current ability of the DRRS to inform and assist the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in prescribing the National Military Strategy?

Answer. DRRS provides the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs with relevant readiness data to help determine whether combatant commanders can perform their assigned missions and associated Mission Essential Tasks (METs) in a joint, interagency, and multinational operational environment. Involved in this determination are Service assessments of their ability to conduct missions as part of a Joint organization. These assessments are analyzed quarterly in the Joint Forces Readiness Review providing the Chairman a comprehensive view of readiness across the force.

Question. Do you have any concerns about whether the Quarterly Readiness Report to Congress (QRRC) is providing the best mix of information to clearly inform Congress of the readiness of the Joint Force, including near-term risks and areas where congressional action may be needed?

Answer. The QRRC provides a large amount of information and data as they relate to the overall readiness of our Armed Forces. However, we feel this report can be improved, particularly in view of an austere budget climate and the impact that might have on the readiness of our Total Force. We would like to work with the congressional staffs in these matters and, if confirmed, I stand ready to brief and discuss the QRRC at any time.

Question. Are you aware of any readiness information in use within DOD that is not currently shared with Congress that would be useful for the exercise of congressional oversight?

Answer. No, I am not aware of any current readiness information that is not shared with Congress.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE PROFICIENCY

Question. In previous reporting, the GAO has identified challenges that DOD and the Services face in identifying pre-deployment training requirements for language proficiency and limitations with some of the Services information management systems to record language proficiency information.

What are the current predeployment language training requirements for individuals or units deploying to Afghanistan and other geographic combatant commands areas of responsibility and what steps has DOD taken to ensure that forces have the required levels of language proficiency?

Answer. In 2012, the Commander, U.S. Forces Afghanistan, specified the predeployment language and culture training required for all U.S. personnel deploying to Afghanistan. This policy acknowledged that various missions would place differing demands on U.S. personnel based on the anticipated degree of interaction with the Afghan population. The Department supports this policy with on-line training modules for basic cultural and communications skills for personnel expecting minimal contact with the local population. For the personnel expected to interact with Afghan personnel for the majority of their missions, DOD offers Language Training Detachments and command-sponsored classroom programs to supplement its HEADSTART 2 language and culture training modules offered by the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center (DLIFLC). Mobile Training Teams from DLIFLC are available to commanders on request. This approach allows commanders to tailor their training and maximize training resources.

Question. The Army and Marine Corps have provided substantial language training to select general purpose soldiers and marines deploying to Afghanistan, yet the Services' training and personnel systems have not fully captured information on language training that has been completed and any proficiency gained from the training.

What steps have DOD and the Services taken to provide decisionmakers with greater visibility within training and personnel systems on the language proficiency of general purpose forces that could better inform force management processes?

Answer. The Army and Marine Corps are modifying their training data bases to track language and culture training provided to individuals. Additionally, the Department is successfully tracking the language proficiency of the force using the Language Readiness Index (LRI) in the Defense Readiness Reporting System. This tool allows decisionmakers and planners to quickly identify DOD military and civilian personnel with tested and self-professed language proficiency, the languages they command, and their proficiency in those languages. This information is provided by the Services' personnel systems and the Defense Civilian Personnel Data System and portrays DOD language capability inventory.

Question. At a congressional hearing last year, Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence Michael Vickers testified that the United States could benefit by having more DOD personnel proficient in foreign languages and that, "it's an area, frankly, we still need to improve".

What is your assessment of the current level of foreign language proficiency across the Services?

Answer. Our foreign language capability is growing. Our investments have resulted in over 265,000 DOD personnel with foreign language skills an increase of 6,497 from previous years. Our challenge is to generate the language skills to meet the needs of general purpose and Special Operations Forces while at the same time training to the professional language level for strategic capabilities like Foreign Area Officers and Cryptologic Language Analysts. This is our strategy to provide the Department with the assets it needs for regional deployments at the operational and tactical levels. This is especially important as we regionally align combat forces towards specific regions.

Question. What incentives would you offer, if any, in the form of either financial stipends or professional advancement opportunities?

Answer. The Department has significantly improved the availability of Foreign Language Proficiency Bonuses for our total force over the past 5 years. The bonus was extended to the Reserve component and payment rates increased. We are assessing its impact and are considering non-monetary incentives to encourage personnel to pursue competency in a foreign language. This involves a close look at linguist career paths, proper utilization, and promotion opportunities Question. Are you concerned with the current level of reliance upon contractors to provide translators to deployed combat units?

Answer. Interpreters and translators provide the Department the ability to provide a high level of foreign language capability, on short notice, to deploying units. The use of contractors to provide interpretation to deployed combat units is closely monitored on a regular basis.

It is not possible within current resources to train sufficient numbers of military or DOD personnel to meet the ever increasing need for personnel with high levels of foreign language and cultural skills. Therefore contract interpreters have and will continue to provide a much needed surge capability to our deploying forces. However, the Department recognizes the value of having foreign language skills organic to a unit and has in the past employed the skills of personnel in the Army 09L Translator Aide program as well as Military Accessions Vital to National Interest (MAVNI) program to provide high levels of language skills to deploying units. The Department is currently exploring other avenues to provide short-term surge capability for translation. One of the more exciting initiatives is the National Language Service Corps, which offers more than 4,000 American Citizens with advanced language skills who are willing to serve as temporary Federal employees to meet urgent and surge demands in limited capacities.

SAFETY AND RISK MITIGATION

Question. Since the onset of combat operations over a decade ago, the overall readiness of the force has steadily declined in terms of personnel, training, and equipment readiness. As force readiness is consumed as soon as it is created by the demand of a high operations tempo, our readiness now faces additional challenges in an economically austere environment. If the current sequestration cuts were to occur, our understanding is that approximately $18 billion would be cut from DOD's operation and maintenance (O&M) budget. If DOD were then forced to operate under a 1-year Continuing Resolution, the O&M budget would be cut by an additional $11 billion. Furthermore, to ensure that Overseas Contingency Operations are funded, another $11 billion would then have to be cut out of the base O&M budget.

If this scenario were to unfold, how would you provide oversight, prioritize resources, and ensure the readiness of the force is sustained?

Answer. The magnitude of sequestration cuts make it impossible for the Services to avoid cuts to vital training capabilities, training infrastructure, and training deliverables. Ensuring the readiness of the force is sustained, other than those units that are next to deploy, will be virtually impossible. The Army has stated that cuts to training and maintenance will put two-thirds of their active brigade combat teams outside of Afghanistan at reduced readiness levels. Navy operations in the western Pacific, including training, will be reduced by as much as one-third. With less training and steaming days, the Navy will inevitably reduce unit readiness levels. The Air Force has stated that sequestration cuts to their flying hour program will put flying units below acceptable readiness standards by the end of the fiscal year. The furlough of DOD civilians will include civilians at training centers across the country, reducing the quality and quantity of training immediately, with long-lasting impacts on readiness.

It is clear that sequestration and a continuing budget resolution will devastate our readiness. When we are not allowed by legislation to manage individual pieces of the budget, readiness accounts inevitably pay the price, thus prioritizing resources is problematic. I will work closely with the Services and Joint Staff, through our various readiness assessment processes, to identify those readiness shortfalls that require the attention of the Department's most senior leadership.

Question. Are these potential sequestration cuts to the O&M budget accurate?

Answer. As I understand it, as part of the overall cut of the $46 billion cut, the Department's O&M accounts will be reduced by $13 billion from the annualized CR level. We must protect the O&M dollars for our men and women in combat, which under sequestration rules we can only do by cutting base-budget O&M disproportionately—this results in an additional shortfall of $5 billion in active base-budget dollars, for a total of an $18 billion cut.

If the Continuing Resolution is extended in its current form throughout the year, it exacerbates problems because it does not provide enough dollars in O&M—adding an additional shortfall of $11 billion.

Question. In your view, what are the indicators of a hollow force?

Answer. It would be a force that has been rendered incapable of performing the mission that we expect it to conduct. While the units may exist, they would not have the personnel, equipment, and/or training necessary to make them capable of executing the defense strategy or responding to the most likely contingencies. Additionally, part of avoiding a hollow force is ensuring we have a clear understanding of the size of the force we can afford to keep ready and then adhering to that plan.

Question. How has the DRRS contributed to managing risk within DOD?

Answer. DRRS provides the Department with a capabilities centric look at readiness which has allowed commanders and staffs to understand readiness issues that directly impact their mission and equate to operational risk. This knowledge provides situational awareness that allows them to initiate operational problem solving, identify capability gaps, conduct trend, threshold and predictive analysis, create capability Force Package designs and strategies to solve or mitigate readiness issues and mitigate risks.

Question. How would the DRRS inform your decisionmaking process in order to reduce risk?

Answer. DRRS contains detailed information on not only what units are capable of; it also contains data on the resources and training status on which those capabilities are based. In this sense, it provides an empirical understanding of why readiness is degraded and what the associated consequences are. This understanding is essential to identifying systematic problems and identifying potential mitigation options.

Question. Why are commanders allowed to subjectively upgrade their unit's readiness, if the intent of the DRRS is to accurately portray unit readiness up the chain of command?

Answer. DRRS, like Status of Resources and Training Systems (SORTS), allows for commanders' upgrades because an assessment of whether a unit can accomplish their assigned mission is far too complex to rely on simplistic rules on interpreting data. Intangibles, nuances, and positive and negative synergies among causal factors can be extremely important in determining an accurate assessment and we trust commanders with the responsibility to make those calls. One mechanism that we use to make sure we understand the final assessments is to monitor the empirical/non-subjective data on which they are built. This includes not only unit-level data, but also maintaining some visibility on the man/train/equip pipeline processes that generate unit readiness.

Question. If either sequestration or a full-year Continuing Resolution is to be implemented, how should they be modified to reduce the impact on readiness? Would additional reprogramming authority be required?

Answer. Both should be modified to allow the Department the flexibility to allocate our resources to our highest priorities. When we are not allowed by legislation to manage individual pieces of the budget, readiness accounts inevitably pay the price. Everything needs to be on the table. This should include military and civilian force reductions, basing, and balancing Active and Reserve components. Adequate flexibility will also require support for follow-on reprogramming authority.

JOINT TRAINING SYSTEM

Question. In June of last year, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff published CJCS Guide 3501: The Joint Training System, which provides an overview of the Joint Training System (JTS) and highlights the role of senior leadership in the planning, execution, and assessment of joint training.

What is your assessment of the effectiveness of the current JTS?

Answer. Today's force is more joint than at any time in our history. Through a decade of conflict our military members have evolved from a Service-centric force to a more capable force which includes both Service-unique attributes as well intentional Service interdependencies.

The Joint Training System described in CJCS Guide 3501 is focused on the warfighting organizations—namely the combatant commands and their Service components. As such, the JTS focuses at the strategic and operational levels, where combatant commanders can assess their readiness to "integrate and synchronize assigned forces to meet mission objectives".

One additional aspect of joint readiness bears mentioning here. While the JTS focuses at the strategic and operational levels of operations, joint readiness (and by extension, joint training) extends down to the tactical level as well. Services—including Service components of combatant commands—must be resourced to "train the way they operate". This includes joint tactical interoperability training. While tactical training is not the primary focus of the JTS, such training is also at risk in the current fiscal environment. As Services retrench into title 10 focus on core competencies, adequate resources specifically allocated for joint training must be preserved. JTS would be a more complete system if it provided a conceptual framework for combatant commanders and Services to plan, resource, and conduct joint tactical training in addition to operational training for combatant command staffs.

TRAINING RANGES

Question. DOD is fielding Unmanned Aircraft Systems (UAS) in greater numbers which has created a strong demand for access to national airspace to conduct training and for other purposes. The demand has quickly exceeded the current airspace available for military operations.

What is your understanding and assessment of DOD's efforts to develop a comprehensive training strategy for the Department's UAS, to include identifying any shortfalls associated with current policies, education, stationing plans, and simulator technologies?

Answer. The DOD UAS Training Strategy is currently being developed and the Department will be providing a report to Congress in July on its progress in this area. The training strategy will address critical elements of UAS training—unit collective training and home station training of pilots, sensor operators, and ground controllers. We anticipate that the report will identify and address shortfalls associated with current policies, training, basing, national airspace, and training technologies.

DEFENSE STRATEGIC GUIDANCE

Question. The 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance stressed that the Department will need to examine the mix of Active and Reserve component elements and stated that the expected pace of operations over the next decade will be a significant driver in determining an appropriate mix of AC/RC forces and level of readiness.

What is your assessment of the implications of a reduction in the pace of operations on the AC/RC mix and Reserve readiness?

Answer. The National Guard and Reserve have clearly proven the ability to accomplish any assigned mission whether overseas or at home. As the pace of operations declines, it is my opinion the National Guard and Reserve will continue to play a vital role in our national defense. Recent changes in laws permitting greater access to the Reserve component (RC), coupled with the proven abilities and current high state of readiness of the Reserve Forces affords the Department greater flexibility when determining appropriate force levels and AC/RC mix. In a constrained resource environment, the RC gives the department a unique opportunity to preserve overall operational capability and mitigate risk at reduced costs.

Question. In your view, how can the missions of the Reserve Forces expect to change to meet new priorities?

Answer. Over the last decade, the Department has learned a significant amount about using Reserve Forces in many different mission sets. The upcoming Quadrennial Defense Review will lay the ground work for assigning mission sets to all forces. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Services, the Reserve Chiefs, and the Chief of the National Guard Bureau to determine the most effective mix and makeup of Active, Reserve, and Guard personnel to support the National Military Strategy.

RESERVE COMPONENT AS A TRAINED AND READY OPERATIONAL RESERVE

Question. One outcome of 10 years of continuous operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, that has included the mobilization of thousands of Guard and Reserve Forces, has been the realization that our Reserve components have evolved from a rarely used strategic reserve to a more frequently used operational reserve.

In your view, what are the essential elements of readiness, if any, that distinguish the Reserve component as an operational reserve as opposed to a strategic reserve?

Answer. The decade plus of war has transformed the Reserve component from a strategic force rarely used to an integral partner of our national defense. In my opinion the most essential element of readiness is people. Today our Reserve component has experienced and skilled people. The combination of their combat experience and civilian skills make them vitally important to our Nation's defense. I think the continued use of the RC as a full partner in the Total Force is the difference between the strategic reserve of the Cold War and the required efficient use of all elements of the Total Force going forward—Active, Guard and Reserve, civilian, and contractor.

ACTIVE DUTY AND RESERVE COMPONENT END STRENGTH

Question. The Department last year announced its 5-year plan to reduce Active Duty end strengths by over 100,000 servicemembers by 2017, and the Reserve components by another 21,000 over the same period. These cuts do not include any additional personnel reductions that could result from sequestration or any agreement to avoid sequestration.

Do you agree with this plan to reduce Active Duty and Reserve component end strengths?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to review the plan, but I believe the end strength drawdown allows us to achieve the right size force and keep it modern. The plan is designed to maintain capable and ready military forces while managing reductions in a way that "keeps faith" with forces that have been at war for the past 10 years. As future national security conditions could change, our planned drawdown could change accordingly.

Question. What is your view of how these planned end strength reductions will affect dwell time ratios?

Answer. I understand that all of the Services, on average, are meeting or exceeding the Department's dwell time goal of 2 years at home for every year deployed, or 1:2, for the Active component. If confirmed, I will continue to monitor this issue closely.

The Reserve component dwell time is improving, but has not reached the Department's dwell time goal of 5 years at home for every 1 year of Active Duty, or 1:5. If confirmed, I will continue to work toward the goal of a 1:5 dwell time ratio for the Reserve component.

Question. What effect would inability to meet dwell time objectives have on the decision to implement the planned end strength reductions?

Answer. The Services are continually monitoring dwell time, if there are any early indicators that the end strength reductions are affecting the ratio, I will work with the Services to address the issues. Re-examination of end strength reductions would certainly be one of the considerations to remedy potential dwell problems.

Question. What additional military personnel reductions do you envision if the sequester is triggered in accordance with the Budget Control Act?

Answer. If the Department were required to sequester funding, I believe that it would first require a revision of the current National Security Strategy announced by the President last January. The current strategy could not be met with the significantly diminished resources that sequester would impose. The revised strategy could very well impact all components of the total force—Active Duty military, Reserve component military, Government civilians, and contractors.

Question. In your view, what tools do the Department and Services need to get down to authorized strengths in the future, and which of these require congressional authorization?

Answer. The Department already has or has been granted the total force shaping tools necessary to meet the drawdown in its current plan.

MILITARY QUALITY OF LIFE

Question. In your view, what is the relationship between military recruitment and retention and quality-of-life improvements and your own top priorities for the Armed Forces?

Answer. The Military Services must attract and retain people with the necessary talent, character, and commitment to become leaders and warriors in the Nation's Armed Forces. The military has consistently used a coordinated recruiting and retention strategy which maximizes the efficient use of our greatest asset—our people. This strategy consists of monetary and non-monetary compensation packages that include the use of special pays, enlistment bonuses, educational benefits and quality of life programs. It has long been said that you recruit an individual and retain a family. As such, it is critical that quality of life (family, education, child-care, housing), quality of service (work environment, infrastructure capacity, and support, time to train), and compensation (pay and benefits) are constantly evaluated and adjusted to respond to needs of an evolving force and to varying economic conditions. Recruiting and retention strategies must be able to generate success in both good and bad economic times. The Services cannot afford to wait for recruiting and retention misses to signal a need for adjustments—adjustment tools and authorities to achieve skill and strength requirements must be set as a priority and readily available.

Question. If confirmed, what further enhancements to military qualify of life would you consider a priority, and how do you envision working with the Services, combatant commanders, family advocacy groups, and Congress to achieve them?

Answer. I recognize that the well-being of the force, as well as recruiting and retention efforts, are significantly impacted by quality of life programs. If confirmed, I look forward to coordinating the efforts of the Services and combatant commanders in order to ensure we have a comprehensive, accessible, and affordable suite of programs. We will continue our work with Congress and family advocacy groups to supplement and enhance our programs and services as needed.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Senior military leaders have warned of growing concerns among military families as a result of the stress of frequent deployments and the long separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for servicemembers and their families, and, if confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. Quality of Life programs and services consistently rank high among the considerations of servicemembers and their families when deciding whether to stay in the military. Families will need assistance to reintegrate, and communicate with each other after a decade of deployments and long separations. Programs and services need to be readily accessible in order to provide servicemembers and their families established support programs using a variety of delivery systems, including in-person, web-based, or online support. The DOD Family Advocacy Program (FAP) provides funding and resources to the Military Departments to strengthen families. FAP is one of the many family readiness programs within the Department, and DOD remains steadfast in its commitment to ensure adequate personnel and resources are available to assist, assess, and treat servicemembers and their families when and where needed. Moreover, we work closely with the civilian community and our Federal partners to support military families.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and anticipated reductions in end strength?

Answer. Key areas of focus will be on downsizing, and providing support for transition planning throughout the military life cycle. This will include the active engagement of family members in the process. It will be important to continue to develop family readiness so that military families can continue to face the anticipated challenges associated with global rebasing, deployments and anticipated reductions in end strength.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to active duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. DOD is not resourced to meet all the needs of military families. Actively engaging military families in community-based programs and services by encouraging participation in the design, development, and delivery of such programs and services will ensure that they meet the needs of military families. A variety of programs and services are already available to assist with the networking, coordination, and collaboration that is necessary to build community capacity to support military families.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to enhance family support?

Answer. We must continue to work with civilian communities where most military families live to promote quality of life enhancements that address military and family readiness challenges. Beyond looking to the local community, DOD will continue to assist in workforce development efforts already underway to create a cadre of service providers who can provide that support within DOD. This will occur through our partnership with professional educational institutions and with local, State, Federal, public, and private agencies and organizations. If confirmed, I will continue to build upon these relationships with community partners to provide the necessary services.

MILITARY CHILD DEVELOPMENT CENTERS

Question. Late last year, the Army announced that it was conducting a 100 percent audit of employee background check processes at all 283 of its child care facilities at installations in the United States and overseas because "derogatory" information was found in the security background checks of employees at the Joint Base Myer-Henderson Hall Child Development Center. As a result, the Secretary of Defense ordered a 100 percent background check audit of all providers who have regular contact with children in DOD Child Development Centers, School Age Care Programs, and Youth Programs, and a 100 percent review and evaluation of the actual background check documentation on file for each individual, employee and volunteer, for compliance with applicable DOD and Military Service policies. Subsequently, DOD reviewed over 44,000 records and reported validation of background checks had been initiated across the Department as required. Additionally, at the time of the review, approximately 1,200 background checks were pending adjudication.

What is the status of the remaining background checks pending adjudication?

Answer. Because of the length of time required for the adjudication process, there will always be background checks in adjudication. Adjudication is the process through which an employee is evaluated for suitability of employment. Currently, the adjudication process is specific to each Military Service. It is important to note the FBI background checks, which include fingerprints, often require months for completion and it is typical for all programs to have some background checks in process/pending. For employees whose background checks are pending, those individuals are either working within line-of-sight supervision in accordance with Public Law 102–190, section 1094, or are not yet working in the program.

Question. Are you convinced that the Services performed these reviews adequately and thoroughly?

Answer. Yes. Additionally, this audit revealed some areas for improvement and, as a result, all applicable directives and other regulatory guidelines will be updated to ensure these improvements are incorporated. DOD leadership and child development program staff are committed to high quality and consistent delivery of these services and to ensure the safety and well-being of children in our care.

Question. Are policies and programs in place now to ensure the safety and welfare of children in Child Development Centers, School Age Care Programs, and Youth Programs in the future?

Answer. DOD has a longstanding standardized and comprehensive process for screening applicants for positions involving child care services on DOD installations and in DOD activities. By law, employment applications must include a question as to whether the applicant has ever been arrested for or charged with a crime involving a child. The application states that it is being signed under penalty of perjury. Additionally, we are required by law to conduct at least two types of background checks on every employee who works with children in child and youth programs. DOD conducts additional background checks, and the Military Departments and Defense Agencies have the discretion to conduct more restrictive screenings. These background checks are part of a system of measures currently in place to ensure children's safety in DOD programs.

Question. Are OSD policies and programs in place to provide continued oversight of these programs in the future?

Answer. Based on the findings of the review, we are strengthening our policies, specifically highlighting prompt and consistent adjudication. In addition, the Military Departments and Defense Agencies will increase oversight during unannounced annual inspections of these facilities and programs.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE SCHOOLS IN CONUS

Question. Some have questioned the continuing need for DOD-operated schools for military dependent children within the Continental United States (CONUS).

In your view, should DOD reassess or update its criteria for the continued operation of DOD schools within CONUS?

Answer. The Department intends to conduct a comprehensive study to determine the feasibility of transferring the CONUS based DOD schools. The Department's planned study that will examine such factors as the quality of education, adequacy of Impact Aid funding, State laws and prohibitions on using tax revenues for a public education on Federal property (e.g., Delaware), capacity of LEAs to assume the educational responsibility, adequacy of educational and support services for military dependents, and impact on the morale of military families. The study will also examine any viable educational alternatives to DOD ownership.

Question. If so, and if confirmed, how would you approach this task?

Answer. If confirmed, I will closely examine the issue and the results of the study considering all dimensions and all recommendations.

CONDITIONS OF K–12 SCHOOLS

Question. In 2011, The Department of Defense committed to a $4 billion plan to renovate or construct new K–12 DOD Education Activity (DODEA) schools over 5 years in order to address inadequate and deteriorated facility conditions throughout the DODEA facility inventory. In response, Congress called upon the Department to develop a minimum standard of design to ensure that DODEA would provide world-class education facilities for the children of military members.

What is your assessment of this construction program?

Answer. It is critical that we continue with the school construction program. Nearly 70 percent of our schools are in poor condition. The Department recognized this growing problem, and approved a multi-billion dollar construction program through 2018. These schools are being designed to meet the high-technology teaching and learning requirements of the 21st century and leverage "green" technologies to improve the environmental impact and long-term operating costs.

Question. If confirmed, will you continue the investments to achieve the goal to provide world-class schools?

Answer. A world-class education is a top quality of life and readiness factor for our military families. Dependent education consistently has been a top priority for the Department. I will continue to ensure that we invest in the education of our children, and maintain a top-quality education for our military dependents.

Question. What is your position on the use of defense funds to pay for facility improvements for schools that are owned and operated by local education activities?

Answer. The Department continues to work closely with local school districts to address the capacity shortfalls and physical condition deficiencies in many of the 160 public schools located on military installations. It remains important for the Department to continue the administration of the public schools on military installation grant program, which, as of February 21, 2013, has distributed more than $208 million to projects for 10 of the 12 highest priority schools. If confirmed, I would support the President's fiscal year 2013 budget request to continue the program.

Question. If confirmed, how would you work with local education activities to ensure an adequate level of investment is provided to schools with a predominant student population of Military Dependents?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Department of Education and support the full funding of Impact Aid. Annually, the Department offers about $35 million in grants which have provided school districts funding to expand learning opportunities in such areas as foreign languages; STEM, and Advanced Placement Math, Science, and English and will continue to leverage available resources to provide the educational opportunities for all 1.2 million school-aged children of our military families and remain committed to providing a quality education for all military dependents Question. What is your view on the adequacy of the Department of Defense's involvement with the Impact Aid Program?

Answer. The DOD Supplement to Impact Aid program is an important additional source of funding for local school districts that have lost property tax revenue due to the enrollment of a large number of military-connected children. The Department faces challenging budgetary uncertainties at this time. Many programs are underfunded. Impact Aid is no exception.

Question. If confirmed, would you recommend any changes to the Impact Aid program?

Answer. The Department of Education has made significant enhancements to this program since its inception. The Department's study of the DOD Domestic Schools will also examine Impact Aid issues.

OFFICE OF COMMUNITY SUPPORT FOR MILITARY FAMILIES WITH SPECIAL NEEDS

Question. In the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010, Congress required the establishment of an Office of Community Support for Military Families with Special Needs within the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness. The purpose of this office is to enhance and improve Department of Defense support for military families with special needs, whether educational or medical in nature.

In your view, what should be the priorities of this Office of Community Support for Military Families with Special Needs?

Answer. A key priority for the Office of Community Support for Military Families with Special Needs is to strengthen personal readiness for military families with special needs through a comprehensive policy, oversight of programs that support military families with special needs, identification of gaps in services to such families, and the accessibility to appropriate resources.

Presently, over 126,000 military family members are enrolled in the Exceptional Family Member Program (EFMP). The EFMP supports military families with special medical and/or educational needs in three components areas: identification/enrollment, assignment coordination to determine the availability of services at a projected location, and family support to help families identify and access programs and services.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure outreach to those military families with special needs dependents so they are able to get the support they need?

Answer. Communication with military families with special needs and the provision of information about the EFMP is a major focus of DOD. If confirmed, I will ensure the Department continues to develop and implement a comprehensive communication and marketing plan designed to deliver consistent information about the EFMP to families, service providers, and leadership. We will also continue to solicit input from families with special needs through the Special Needs Advisory Panel, as mandated by Congress.

GI BILL BENEFITS

Question. Congress passed the Post-9/11 Veterans Educational Assistance Act in 2008 (Post-9/11 GI Bill) that created enhanced educational benefits for servicemembers who have served at least 90 days on Active Duty since September 11. The maximum benefit would roughly cover the cost of a college education at any public university in the country.

What unresolved issues related to implementation of the Post-9/11 GI Bill (e.g., coverage of additional military personnel) do you consider most important to be addressed?

Answer. With the recent change in Public Law 111–277 that corrected technical issues related to National Guard (title 32) service, I believe all Armed Service Veterans are fully covered.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of the Post-9/11 GI Bill on recruiting and retention, including the provision of transferability for continued service?

Answer. Post Service education benefits have been a cornerstone of our military recruiting efforts since 1985, and a major contributor to the success of the All-Volunteer Force. Money for education has been, and remains at the forefront of reasons young Americans cite for joining the military. There is no doubt that the Post-9/11 GI Bill will continue to have this same impact. The Department of Defense is an "education" employer. We hire educated young people, invest in them while in Service, and we encourage them to invest further in themselves when they leave. The VA-administered education benefits, and in particular the Post-9/11 GI Bill, facilitates that investment.

MILITARY AND VETERAN EDUCATION PROGRAM OVERSIGHT

Question. Congress remains interested in strengthening oversight of Department of Defense and Department of Veterans Affairs education programs, including the VA's Post-9/11 GI Bill, and DOD's tuition assistance and Military Spouse Career Advancement Accounts (MyCAA) programs.

What is your view of proposals that would require that all schools participating in these programs be compliant with title IV of the Higher Education Act, so long as the administering Secretaries had the authority to exempt such requirements on a case-by-case basis?

Answer. DOD supports the proposal and is clarifying policies to ensure tuition assistance funding will only be paid to educational institutions accredited by an accrediting organization, recognized by the Department of Education, approved for Department of Veterans Affairs funding, and participating in Federal student aid programs through the Department of Education under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

Question. What is your view of proposals to change the so-called 90/10 rule to exempt these programs from the calculation altogether, as has been proposed by officials of the Bureau for Consumer Financial Protection and others?

Answer. DOD has no objection with the proposal to exempt title X tuition assistance funds from the 90/10 calculation. Technical assistance and oversight of any statutory changes to the proposed 90/10 rule should reside with the Department of Education.

MORALE, WELFARE, AND RECREATION

Question. What challenges do you foresee in sustaining Morale, Welfare, and Recreation (MWR) programs, particularly in view of the budget challenges the Department faces?

Answer. Quality of life programs for our military members and their families are essential to the resiliency of the force, as well as to recruiting and retention efforts. Changes in our basing, deployment patterns and force structure have had a significant impact on our ability to deliver quality of life programs to our military families. With more than 75 percent of military families now living off installation, there is an increasing need for partnerships and support from local governments, school systems, and businesses to ensure we continue to provide comprehensive, accessible, and affordable quality of life programs. Additionally, we are conducting a major assessment of Morale, Welfare, and Recreation programs to ensure they are being operated in as efficient and cost-effective manner as possible.

Question. How would you seek to deal with these challenges?

Answer. Sustaining family programs in the current fiscally constrained environment will be challenging but of vital importance as we seek to reach servicemembers on and off the installations. If confirmed, I will make every effort to protect funding for family quality of life programs to the greatest extent possible and ensure they are operating efficiently. Good stewardship demands that available resources are utilized in the most effective manner.

Question. If confirmed, what improvements would you seek to achieve?

Answer. We have a responsibility to ensure access to quality programs, information and resources regardless of where our servicemembers and their families are located. I've mentioned the need to develop and maintain a strong network of community-based providers. We'll need to enhance our information and referral resources by maximizing electronic opportunities provided through internet social networking avenues and electronic applications. We also have opportunities to improve the effectiveness of outreach programs, to better meet military families where they live. If confirmed, I will evaluate these opportunities, and how we can better coordinate efforts among the various entities providing support to our military members and their families.

COMMISSARY AND MILITARY EXCHANGE SYSTEMS

Question. What is your view of the need for modernization of business policies and practices in the commissary and exchange systems, and what do you view as the most promising avenues for change to achieve modernization goals?

Answer. Both the Defense Commissary Agency (DeCA) and the military exchanges are progressive organizations seeking to reduce costs within their respective businesses. DeCA, for example, has a proven history of reducing the costs of the commissary system without decreasing the value of the benefit provided. Since its beginning in 1991, efficiencies have allowed DeCA to reduce its workforce by almost 7,000 full time equivalent positions and operating costs by approximately $700 million in constant fiscal year 1992 dollars. In fact, when measured in constant dollars, DeCA's operating costs are only slightly more than one-half of what they were when the Agency was created.

Exchanges are evolutionary models driven by best business practices and the need to remain relevant to servicemembers in a highly competitive and ever-changing retail environment. Today's exchanges have gone beyond the traditional brick and mortar environment, embracing e-commerce and mobile retail channels to satisfy customer demands. They are using digital marketing and social media that are now common in the marketplace for customer outreach. In the traditional brick and mortar environment, robust infrastructure re-investments, new branding strategies, enhanced customer service postures, supply chain enhancements, and targeted merchandise assortment driven by unique installation customer demographics are all delivering a customer shopping experience on par or better than the most successful retailers in the commercial market place. The exchanges continue to exceed the DOD Social Compact on savings for servicemembers.

For the Exchanges, there are already mechanisms for modernization through the Cooperative Efforts Board. Promising areas for change include non-resale procurement, logistics and distribution, exchange select/private label, legislative and policy, and seasonal and one time buys.

Question. What is your view of the proposals by some to consolidate or eliminate commissaries and exchanges?

Answer. Eliminating the commissary and exchanges would be a direct hit on military compensation. In fiscal year 2012, commissaries saved military shoppers approximately $2.76 billion, a return of more than double the $1.31 billion annual commissary appropriation. At a personal level, a family of four shopping at the commissary regularly can save $4,500 a year. Exchanges, which receive very little appropriated fund support, save our customers 22 percent, on average, over commercial retail stores.

Commissary and exchange benefits form a major part of the military community support structure that contributes to mission readiness. The commissary continues to be one of the most popular non-pay compensation benefits of our military members. Exchanges provide valuable savings at home and essential health, comfort and convenience items to military personnel in forward deployed and combat areas. Military families would rightfully view the elimination of these systems as a significant reduction of their compensation.

CIVILIAN PERSONNEL SYSTEMS

Question. Section 1113 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 provides DOD with extensive personnel flexibilities for its civilian employees that are not available to other agencies. In particular, section 9902(a) of title 5, U.S.C., as added by section 1113, directs the Department to establish a new performance management system for all of its employees. Section 9902(b) directs the Department to develop a streamlined new hiring system that is designed to better fulfill DOD's mission needs, produce high-quality applicants, and support timely personnel decisions.

What is your understanding of the current status of the Department's efforts to implement the authority provided by section 1113?

Answer. I understand the Department and organizations that represent DOD employees, including unions and the Federal Manager's Association, worked collaboratively over a span of 18 months to design a performance management system and improved hiring processes. The Department launched its pre-decisional collaborative process that came to be known as "New Beginnings" in the spring of 2010. The effort culminated in a comprehensive report from three joint labor-management design teams. All recommendations have been reviewed through the Departmental process. If confirmed, I will continue to support the work that is underway to comply with the National Defense Authorization Act.

Question. Do you agree that DOD's civilian employee workforce plays a vital role in the functioning of the Department?

Answer. Yes, DOD's civilian employee workforce plays an instrumental role in the functioning of the Department as part of the total force across a range of missions.

Question. If confirmed, will you make it a priority to implement these flexibilities in a manner that best meets the needs of the Department and promotes the quality of the Department's civilian workforce?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I would make it my priority to implement those flexibilities that would facilitate accomplishing the Department's missions.

Question. Section 1112 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 directs the Department to develop a Defense Civilian Leadership Program (DCLP) to recruit, train, and advance a new generation of civilian leaders for the Department. Section 1112 provides the Department with the full range of authorities available for demonstration programs under section 4703 of title 5, U.S.C., including the authority to compensate participants on the basis of qualifications, performance, and market conditions. These flexibilities are not otherwise available to the Department of Defense.

What is your understanding of the current status of the Department's efforts to implement the authority provided by section 1112?

Answer. I understand that the Department has designed a new leadership program and has graduated the first cohort. Still in the pilot phase, a second cohort is underway. If confirmed, I will fully engage to ensure the new program meets the intent of the NDAA authority.

Question. Do you agree that the Department needs to recruit highly qualified civilian personnel to meet the growing needs of its acquisition, technical, business, and financial communities?

Answer. Yes. I completely agree that recruiting highly qualified civilian personnel both in mission critical occupations, such as acquisition and finance, and in leadership positions across the Department is essential to mission success.

Question. In your view, has the existing civilian hiring process been successful in recruiting such personnel and meeting these needs?

Answer. Although I believe the Department currently has a highly talented workforce, I wholeheartedly support the initiatives to streamline and reform the civilian hiring process. While I understand the Department is making progress, there is still work to be done in this area, and if confirmed, I would ensure the Department continues to actively engage in civilian hiring reform initiatives and aggressively pursues continued improvements.

Question. If confirmed, will you make it a priority to implement the authority provided by section 1112 in a manner that best meets the needs of the Department and promotes the quality of the Department's civilian workforce?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed I will make it a priority to implement the authority provided by section 1112. The Department recognizes the need for an improved leader-development model to attract, retain, and develop civilian leaders to support pipeline readiness and enhance bench strength. If confirmed, I will assess the section 1112 pilot outcomes to ensure a successful framework for developing the next generation of innovative leaders with the technical competence to meet the future leadership needs of the Department.

HUMAN CAPITAL PLANNING

Question. The Department of Defense faces a critical shortfall in key areas of its civilian workforce, including the management of acquisition programs, information technology systems and financial management, and senior DOD officials have expressed alarm at the extent of the Department's reliance on contractors in these areas. Section 115b of title 10, U.S. Code, requires the Department to develop a strategic workforce plan to shape and improve its civilian employee workforce.

Would you agree that the Department's human capital, including its civilian workforce, is critical to the accomplishment of its national security mission?

Answer. Yes. I believe such planning would well position the Department to acquire, develop, and maintain the workforce it needs to meet current and future mission challenges.

Question. Do you share the concern expressed by others about the extent of the Department's reliance on contractors in critical areas such as the management of acquisition programs, information technology and financial management?

Answer. We must ensure that we have a properly sized, and highly capable, civilian workforce that guards against an erosion of critical, organic skills and an overreliance on contracted services, particularly in such areas as acquisition program management, information technology, and financial management. If confirmed, I will continue to support the administration's and Department's focus on reducing inappropriate or excessive reliance on contracted support, particularly for critical, and closely associated with inherently governmental, work. I will continue to support the ongoing efforts to further utilize the Strategic Workforce Plan to mitigate against civilian workforce competency gaps and skill shortfalls in these areas.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the Department undertakes necessary human capital planning to ensure that its civilian workforce is prepared to meet the challenges of the coming decades?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure Department decisions on workforce shaping align with the Department's long-term strategic workforce plan, with the understanding that short-term exceptions may be needed due to emerging dynamics in the budget environment. Forecasts for the Department's workforce must be based on validated mission requirements and workload, both current and projected, and any reductions in the civilian workforce must be directly linked to workload so as to not adversely impact overall mission capabilities.

Question. Section 955 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 requires a 5 percent reduction in anticipated funding levels for the civilian personnel workforce and the service contractor workforce of the Department of Defense, subject to certain exclusions.

What impact do you expect the implementation of section 955 to have on the programs and operations of the Department of Defense?

Answer. Section 955 requires a reduction in available funding for the civilian workforce and contracted support, and as such, is being led by the Office of the Under Secretary, Comptroller. The impact of how section 955 will be implemented is still being determined and I do not have enough information at this time to speak to specific impacts to programs and/or operations. If confirmed, I will work with my counterparts in Comptroller to ensure that the Department's implementation of section 955 is done in a manner that reduces mission impact and mitigates risk to programs and operations, while maintaining core capabilities and support to our warfighters and their families.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that section 955 is implemented in a manner that is consistent with the requirements of section 129a of title 10, U.S.C., for determining the most appropriate and cost-efficient mix of military, civilian and service contractor personnel to perform DOD missions?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with my counterparts in Comptroller to ensure implementation of section 955 recognizes that the sourcing of work among military (Active/Reserve), civilian, and contracted services must be consistent with requirements, funding availability, readiness and management needs, as well as applicable laws (such as section 129a of title 10, U.S.C.) and other total force management and workload sourcing mandates. The Department must avoid any inappropriate transfer of work from civilians to contract support or military personnel. We must also ensure the most cost effective performance possible while being mindful that risk mitigation must take precedence over cost considerations to ensure mission success and prevent an overreliance on contractors.

Question. What processes will you put in place, if confirmed, to ensure that the Department implements a sound planning process for carrying out the requirements of section 955, including the implementation of the exclusion authority in section 955(c)?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with my counterparts in Comptroller to ensure the requirements of section 955 are implemented in manner which complements the Department's current processes for workforce determinations, which strive to achieve effective and efficient total force manpower solutions consistent with law and available resources. While I cannot speak to specific exclusions, I will work to ensure that the workforces of the Department are sized to perform the functions and activities necessary to achieve the missions and enable the capabilities of the Department.

ACQUISITION WORKFORCE

Question. Section 852 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008 established an Acquisition Workforce Development Fund to help the Department of Defense address shortcomings in its acquisition workforce. This provision was amended by the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 to ensure a continuing source of funds for this purpose.

Do you believe that the DOD acquisition workforce development fund is still needed to ensure that DOD has the right number of employees with the right skills to run its acquisition programs in the most cost effective manner for the taxpayers?

Answer. The acquisition workforce development fund has been instrumental in the Department's efforts to recapitalize its acquisition workforce and improve oversight, management, and accountability in the procurements of goods and services. I believe that the fund is still necessary to further enhance and sustain the training and expertise of our dedicated acquisition workforce.

Question. If confirmed, what steps if any will you take to ensure that the money made available through the workforce development fund is spent in a manner that best meets the needs of the Department of Defense and its acquisition workforce?

Answer. It is my understanding that management and execution of the acquisition workforce development fund is a joint responsibility of the Offices of the Under Secretaries of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics and Comptroller. If confirmed, I will work with my counterparts in those offices to ensure that application of resources is done in a manner that is consistent with the training, development, and sustainment needs of the acquisition workforce.

Question. One of the central tenets of the Department's Better Buying Power 2.0 is to improve the "the Professionalism of the Total Acquisition Workforce." The Department has subdivided this tenet into four separate initiatives. These initiatives are:

1. Establish higher standards for key leadership positions.
2. Establish stronger professional qualification requirements for all acquisitions specialties.
3. Increase the recognition of excellence in acquisition management
4. Continue to increase the cost consciousness of the acquisition workforce—change the culture.

If confirmed, how will you use funds from the Acquisition Workforce Development Fund to accomplish the objectives of these initiatives?

Answer. These specific initiatives are under the purview of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics and I cannot speak to their specifics. However, to improve overall stewardship of the Department's resources, the continuation of the workforce development fund to recruit, retain, train, and sustain a professional and highly skilled acquisition workforce is critical.

Question. Section 872 of the Ike Skelton National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2011 codifies the authority for the Department of Defense to conduct an acquisition workforce demonstration project and extends the authority to 2017.

Do you believe it would be in the best interest of the Department to extend and expand the acquisition workforce demonstration project?

Answer. The Department is authorized by law up to 120,000 employee participants covered under acquisition demonstration projects. It is my understanding that today the Department has 15,800 employee participants, the majority of which returned to the demonstration project following the repeal of the National Security Personnel System (NSPS) as directed by the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2010. With that complete, several acquisition organizations across all components have expressed interest in participating in the project. Project participation is voluntary and based on meeting acquisition related workforce demographic eligibility criteria.

Question. What steps would you take, if confirmed, to implement section 872?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics and the Department components to ensure the Department is effectively positioned to appropriately expand the Acquisition Demonstration project.

LABORATORY PERSONNEL DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM

Question. The laboratory demonstration program founded in section 342 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1995 as amended by section 1114 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2001, section 1107 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008, section 1108 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2009, and section 1105 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010, paved the way for personnel management initiatives and new flexibilities at the defense laboratories. These innovations have been adopted in various forms throughout other DOD personnel systems.

If confirmed, will you fully implement the laboratory demonstration program and the authorities under these provisions?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics to fully implement laboratory demonstration programs under these authorities.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the directors of the defense laboratories are provided the full range of personnel flexibilities and authorities provided by Congress?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics and the Department components to ensure the directors of defense laboratories are provided the full range of personnel flexibilities and authorities provided by Congress.

DOD SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNICAL PERSONNEL

Question. Recently, the Department issued guidance, as part of its efficiencies initiatives, to centralize certain hiring authorities, including for highly-qualified experts and Inter-Governmental Personnel Assignment (IPA) positions. Both are heavily used by the Department's scientific and technical (S&T) enterprise, including the DOD's laboratories and the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA). The benefit of these authorities is to use them to make rapid hiring decisions for individuals in a highly competitive national S&T jobs market. However, there is concern that the centralization of the process will actually slow down the Services' and defense agencies' ability to hire rapidly.

What will you do to ensure that these special hiring authorities are not negatively impacted in terms of allowing DOD to rapidly hire these types of highly specialized individuals?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure that the Department actively engages in initiatives to streamline and reform the civilian hiring system, to include efforts to ensure that the Department's processes for using special hiring authorities are efficient in fulfilling DOD's mission needs.

Question. Under the Military Accessions Vital to National Interest (MAVNI) program, the Department is able to expedite U.S. citizenship for foreign nationals that enlist in the military and have either specialized medical or linguistic skills.

How could this program be extended to include, subject to appropriate security reviews, highly skilled scientific and technical foreign nationals—e.g., graduates of U.S. universities with doctorates in fields the DOD has a demand for and where less than half of these graduates are U.S. citizens?

Answer. Although new enlistees under the MAVNI program are eligible for expedited naturalization under the provisions of section 1440, title 8, U.S.C., the MAVNI Pilot Program was designed to meet critical military readiness needs in the Armed Forces by using the provisions of section 504(b)(2), title 10, U.S.C. to enlist certain legal non-immigrants.

Currently, the Services have identified and scoped the program for fully-qualified health professional in critical medical skills and individuals with heritage-level language abilities and cultural backgrounds in a specific set of languages critical to current and emerging readiness needs.

Although the need for scientific and technical skills has been identified as a shortage in civilian requirements, expanding MAVNI to fill civilian needs would not meet the intent or the language of the statutory provisions under which MAVNI operates.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

SIMULATION TRAINING

1. Senator NELSON. Mr. Vollrath, as the defense budget shrinks, simulation technology is a way troops can remain war ready. Simulation training—available for a wide variety of weapons systems and crew positions—is not only cost effective, but reduces the wear and tear on military hardware. As fiscal constraints reduce live exercises and training opportunities, can mobility and simulation be relied upon to a greater extent?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Modeling and simulation (M&S) supported training certainly presents an opportunity to mitigate live training costs and is presently being used by all Services to supplement/support live training. The Department of Defense has conducted a study of relevant factors to determine what types of military training are best suited for M&S supported training. In making this decision, some factors that must be considered include: individual or collective task; learning complexity; interaction/fidelity; maturity of technology; and task domain (procedural, affective, psychomotor, or cognitive). Finally, the total life cycle costs of live training as compared to M&S supported training must also be evaluated and compared for each training task. In general, the study concluded that given current technologies, training tasks that are procedural, rote, and individual or of low to medium complexity can be performed very cost effectively with M&S supported capabilities. As always, the Department will leverage and further explore any and all ways to cost effectively prepare our Nation's force for military operations.

MILITARY READINESS

2. Senator NELSON. Mr. Vollrath, readiness is already impacted by sequestration. The Florida Air National Guard has reduced their flying hours by 57 percent, impacting the ability for pilots to remain current and qualified. The 125th Fighter Wing in Jacksonville provides air dominance for the southeastern United States. Can you speak to the downsides of establishing tiered readiness levels for our combat units, such as the 125th Fighter Wing?

Mr. VOLLRATH. The Services must be resourced to provide enough ready units when the Nation needs them. Each Service has force generation functions to produce ready units/capabilities. They recognize the realities of how long it takes to generate ready units/capabilities (and keep them ready) as well as the particulars of the demand signal from our combatant commanders. Many units/capabilities aren't required in large numbers or on an immediate timeline, and in those cases, building rotational force generation models (i.e. "tiering") makes perfect sense. What is harmful is when it isn't the demand signal that shapes the "tiering", but a shortage of resources. My concern is this will result in an inadequate supply of ready forces when the need arises, and/or the inability to restore the readiness of forces to meet required timelines.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

MENTAL HEALTH

3. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Vollrath, the Armed Forces Health Surveillance Center recently conducted a study that found pilots of drone aircraft experience mental health problems like depression, anxiety, and post-traumatic stress at the same rate as pilots of manned aircraft who are deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. Air Force officials and independent experts have suggested several potential causes, among them witnessing combat violence on live video feeds, working in isolation or under inflexi-ble shift hours, juggling the simultaneous demands of home life with combat operations, and dealing with intense stress because of crew shortages.

The Air Force also conducted research into the health issues of drone crew members. In a 2011 survey of nearly 840 drone operators, it found that 46 percent of Reaper and Predator pilots, and 48 percent of Global Hawk sensor operators, reported "high operational stress". Those crews cited long hours and frequent shift changes as major causes. That study found the stress among drone operators to be much higher than that reported by Air Force members in logistics or support jobs. But it did not compare the stress levels of the drone operators with those of traditional pilots.

The new study looked at the electronic health records of 709 drone pilots and 5,256 manned aircraft pilots between October 2003 and December 2011. Those records included information about clinical diagnoses by medical professionals and not just self-reported symptoms. The study found that pilots of both manned and unmanned aircraft had lower rates of mental health problems than other Air Force personnel. Clearly this is a readiness issue, with the contradiction in the findings of those two studies, do you think we have a clear picture of the mental health needs of our pilots?

Mr. VOLLRATH. After consulting with the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs, it is clear that the Department's understanding of this issue is constantly improving. It is important to note that rates of formally diagnosed PTSD in Air Force pilots have remained low. Despite many years at war and an increasing reliance on remotely piloted aircraft, PTSD rates in all pilots as a group remain lower (at about two per thousand) than many other career groups, such as airmen in "outside the wire" combat missions (e.g., security forces or explosive ordnance disposal staff) or others with direct exposure to the dead or dying, such as medical personnel.

Even though rates of formal diagnosis of PTSD have remained low, we are aware that pilots experience stress. Pilots with traditional combat exposure or those who visualize battle remotely can be at risk for combat stress or PTSD. Since 2009, line leaders and the USAF School of Aerospace Medicine (USAFSAM) have monitored closely our RPA and intelligence career fields. Through a series of surveys and interviews USAFSAM continues to gather information, expand research, and provide recommendations to leaders and providers, and to inform aeromedical policy. Future studies will seek to compare RPA teams with other high tempo teams such as aeromedical and C–17 missions. Finally, stepping forward to help meet the needs of the growing remotely piloted mission, the Air Force dedicated several additional mental health providers to RPA and intelligence units. In concert with flight medicine physicians, chaplains, and commanders, they will assist Air Force leaders and supervisors in comprehensive support of these valued teams.

4. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Vollrath, do you believe there is any pressure among both manned and unmanned aircraft pilots not to report mental health symptoms to doctors out of fears that they will be grounded?

Mr. VOLLRATH. I consulted with the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs in order to properly respond to this question. That aircrew (whether from manned or unmanned airframes) may not fully disclose mental health problems to physicians due to fears of being grounded is a phenomenon that is not unique to aircrew, nor to non-rated servicemembers with mental health problems. Military members are reluctant to report any condition that they think may adversely impact their duty or retention status. This is particularly true of aviators who must meet more restrictive standards, whose special pay is attached to their operational readiness, and whose competition for promotion may be affected by an untimely and prolonged "Duties Not Involving Flying" period. It is a finding that military leadership has often encountered across the Services and myriad of career fields.

DOD health care utilization rates are not the most reliable form of identifying mental health issues within military populations, including RPA operators. Relying on self-disclosure to estimate true prevalence rates has known methodological limitations. Research has shown higher rates of self-disclosure of symptoms in the pilot community using anonymous surveys rather than annual web-based health assessments. Additionally, placement of operational psychologists embedded within flight medicine and operational units facilitates interaction and disclosure of problems among RPA pilots. The Air Force implemented this initiative in 2011 and continues to increase the placements of operational psychologists across the Air Force.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

CHILD DEVELOPMENT CENTERS

5. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, allegations of child abuse at the Fort Myer Child Development Center (CDC) in December prompted the Secretary of Defense to order the Services to fully investigate all CDC activities and to provide reports to him by January 21, 2013. The audit revealed areas for improvement. Last week, we learned that the Fort Myer CDC has lost its accreditation. When will Congress be provided the findings of DOD's audit of CDCs?

Mr. VOLLRATH. At this time, the Office of the Secretary of Defense has not indicated that the report is available for release. It will be made available to Congress as soon as it is approved for release by the Secretary of Defense. The Services and OSD are addressing identified areas of improvement at the DOD and Military Service level. The Fort Myer Child Development Center National Association for the Education of Young Children (NAEYC) accreditation was revoked. NAEYC procedures require revocation if a required standard is not met.

6. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, what improvements will DOD make to ensure that young children are protected from abuse when receiving care in CDCs?

Mr. VOLLRATH. DOD and the Military Services are committed to providing a safe environment for the 200,000 children that we provide care for on a daily basis. We are revising the current Department of Defense Instruction (DODI) which covers background checks for any individuals who have contact with children on a regular basis (including child care workers, volunteer coaches, youth recreation employees, et cetera). While the existing DODI met the requirements of current legislation, the audit ordered by the Secretary of Defense identified areas that could be improved upon and we are focusing on making these changes.

SPOUSE EDUCATION AND CAREER OPPORTUNITIES

7. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, how many spouses have been helped, and how many still need help from Spouse Education and Career Opportunities (SECO) programs?

Mr. VOLLRATH. In fiscal year 2012, the SECO program provided career and education counseling for more than 132,000 spouses through the SECO Career Center; provided more than 36,000 military spouses with scholarships for job training, licensing and certificates through the My Career Advancement Account (MyCAA) scholarship program, and worked with 160 private sector companies and organizations to hire more than 36,000 military spouses. However, more than 1 in 4 (26 percent) military spouses in the labor force are unemployed, which accounts for approximately 90,000 spouses. Furthermore, when they are employed, the income levels of military spouses often lag behind their civilian counterparts. A recent study showed that military wives with full-time jobs earned 25 percent less than their civilian counterparts. In light of these statistics, we must continue to work to ensure that our military spouses are provided the tools, resources, and opportunities to contribute to their family's financial stability, resilience, and well-being.

8. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, do you believe these programs, as currently resourced and executed, are actually helping military spouses gain employment opportunities that meet their financial and professional stability needs?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes. The SECO program has been successful because we address the comprehensive needs of military spouses throughout their career lifecycle. SECO assists them in deciding on a career path, provides them information to train and learn in order to access the career they have chosen, gives them tools and assistance to embark on an effective career search and makes the connection to the employer who will value the skills that they bring to the 21st century workforce.

HEALTHCARE COSTS

9. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, DOD's personnel and entitlement spending represent an ever increasing portion of the DOD budget. Healthcare spending is a big driver of increased costs. DOD's health care budget has increased from about $19 billion in fiscal year 2001 to about $52 billion in fiscal year 2013. Healthcare represents about 10.2 percent of DOD's topline. In the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, Congress established the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Commission to study and make recommendations on compensation and retirement reform. Should this Commission consider the impact of healthcare costs as it develops its recommendations on compensation and retirement reform?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes, the Department believes the Commission should consider the impact of healthcare costs as it develops recommendations on modernizing the military compensation and retirement systems. For its part, health and dental care are among the areas currently under review by the Department as it develops modernization recommendations for the Secretary to transmit to the Commission.

10. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, how can DOD better control the cost of healthcare of servicemembers as they move through the accession-to-retirement continuum and beyond?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Although health care is not within the purview of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management, I have consulted with the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs in order to properly respond to this question. Controlling health care costs is a complex problem that will require a complementary approach to solving. The Military Health System advocates four simultaneous actions to reduce costs: (1) internal efficiencies to better organize our decisionmaking and execution arm; (2) a continuation of efforts to appropriately pay private sector providers; (3) initiatives that promote health, reduce illness, injury and hospitalization; and (4) proposed changes to beneficiary cost-sharing under TRICARE.

DOD REVIEW OF SAME SEX SPOUSE BENEFITS AND IMPACT OF DEFENSE OF MARRIAGE ACT

11. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, recently, the Secretary of Defense announced the intent to provide additional benefits to same-sex domestic partners who declare a committed relationship, but not to unmarried heterosexual domestic partners. What is the legal and policy rationale for DOD to favor same-sex partners over heterosexual partners in offering these benefits?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Heterosexual couples, if they so choose, have the opportunity in every State to get married, and their marriage is recognized in Federal law. Currently, same-sex couples do not have this opportunity (per the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), we can only recognize marriage between a man and a woman). Thus, same-sex couples and opposite-sex couples are not similarly protected under the law. The benefits extended are a significant effort to close the gap in equity for benefits, consistent with current law.

12. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, has DOD considered the potential for litigation by heterosexuals, who are not married but who are also in a committed relationship, who believe they are being denied equal treatment?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Same-sex and opposite-sex couples are not similarly situated. Opposite-sex couples can get married in any State, the District of Columbia, or U.S. territory, and their marriage is recognized under Federal law. Currently, same-sex couples do not have this same opportunity (per DOMA, we can only recognize marriage between one man and one woman). Thus, the two categories of couples are not similarly situated under the law.

13. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, what will be the increased costs associated with extending benefits to the same sex spouses of military members during a time when this administration has imposed drastic budget cuts to DOD?

Mr. VOLLRATH. The cost of extending benefits to same-sex domestic partners of military members is negligible. Many of the benefits selected for extension are self-sustaining programs designed to accommodate fluctuations in need and population, such as commissary and exchange privileges and MWR programs. Other benefits, such as dual military spouse assignments and emergency leave, are provided to the servicemember regardless of relationship status therefore there is no additional cost anticipated.

WOMEN IN COMBAT

14. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, I am concerned about the potential adverse impacts to readiness resulting from Secretary of Defense Panetta's announcement to rescind the 1994 rule that prohibits women from being assigned to smaller ground combat units, and his plan to potentially open more than 230,000 combat positions to women. DOD is pursuing this major policy change during a time when every branch of the Armed Forces has consistently met recruitment goals, is attracting and retaining high quality and skilled personnel at record rates and, recently, requested Congress to authorize the Army and Marine Corps to reduce end strength by 100,000 ground troops over the next 4 years. What compelling national security interest is advanced by opening up more positions to women at this time?

Mr. VOLLRATH. It is the in best interest of national security to have the best and brightest person serving in any position based upon their abilities, qualifications, and guiding principles developed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This is consistent with our values and enhances military readiness.

15. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Vollrath, what assurance can you provide that decisions to open positions and units to women will be based on bona fide military requirements, and will not result in needlessly exposing any American servicemember, men or women, to more risk of death or serious injury, than is absolutely required by military necessity?

Mr. VOLLRATH. The decision to open positions to all qualified personnel enhances military readiness. The Department can ill afford to arbitrarily reduce the pool of qualified personnel based on gender. As a result, it is in the best interest of the Department to allow both men and women who meet the standards for these positions to compete for them.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

END STRENGTH IN THE SERVICES

16. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, in your responses to the advance policy questions you discuss end strength reductions that are being implemented between now and 2017. You correctly highlight the importance that we keep faith with our troops. In the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, I was able to include a provision (section 525) that requires the secretary of each Military Department to report to Congress regarding troops that were involuntarily separated from the military. I am especially concerned about the Army. The Army has testified in the past that it may have to issue thousands of involuntary separations to achieve its end strength reductions. I believe it would be breaking faith with our troops if we welcome home well-performing troops by handing them a pink slip. Do you agree?

Mr. VOLLRATH. It is the Department policy that voluntary separation authorities be used to the maximum extent possible prior to using involuntary measures to reduce the force. Indeed, that is the best way to keep faith with our troops. However, we also realize there are circumstances that may preclude Services from using voluntary measures.

1. Voluntary separation incentives can drive up costs; the Secretaries of the Military Departments have to balance these costs with the need to maintain mission readiness. Voluntary separation incentives may not be sufficient to properly shape the force.
2. Involuntary separations may be necessary for the Services to properly shape their forces and to allow selectivity when drawing down the size of our forces. As we draw down it is imperative that we retain those that the Department will need in the future.
3. The military is the most respected profession in the United States. Strong retention numbers demonstrate that many of our members love what they do and want to continue serving as long as possible.

17. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, do you commit to ensuring the Services honor the reporting requirements in section 525?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Yes. If confirmed, I will ensure we fully comply with the reporting requirements of section 525.

18. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, will you make every effort to avoid the use of involuntary separations as we reduce the size of our force?

Mr. VOLLRATH. If confirmed, I will make every effort to minimize the use of involuntary separations. However, we should all be cognizant of the fact that involuntary separations will be necessary to ensure the military is postured correctly for mission readiness and to meet all national security objectives.

19. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, what assistance or additional authorities do you need to achieve this goal?

Mr. VOLLRATH. The Department is requesting additional authority for the Secretary of Defense to have the flexibility to reduce the mandatory retirement point

(for years of service) for lieutenant colonels and Navy commanders from 28 years of Active commissioned service to 25 years; and for colonels and Navy captains from 30 years of Active commissioned service to 27 years.

UTILIZING THE RESERVES

20. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, in your responses to the advance policy questions, you write: "In a constrained resource environment, the Reserve component gives the Department a unique opportunity to preserve overall operational capability and mitigate risk at reduced cost." Do you agree that the Reserve component can provide comparable operational capability at a reduced cost?

Mr. VOLLRATH. I believe the last 10 years have proven the Reserve component can provide comparable operational capability. The current budget environment provides an opportunity to examine ways in which the Reserve component may offer the Services an effective way to preserve capability and capacity, within manageable risk. Each Service should review their roles and missions and determine the appropriate AC/RC mix within their respective organization. This review should include factors such as the capabilities required by the combatant commanders and the associated timelines, pay, operating costs, time to train, and levels of proficiency.

21. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, based on declining defense resources, do you agree that we should be increasing, not decreasing, our reliance on the Reserve component?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Over the last 10 years, we've seen that the Reserve component can be a very capable resource. However, getting the right balance of capabilities across the components is important and should be a direct function of the demand signal from our combatant commanders as well as the comparative advantage of each component to produce and retain those capabilities. We know from past experience that if the Reserve component is not properly funded, it will atrophy resulting in recovery timelines that are long and expensive. Getting the right balance between our AC/RC components is important, particularly as we adjust to reduced resources.

22. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Vollrath, are there any roles and missions that we should increasingly shift from the Active component to the Reserve component?

Mr. VOLLRATH. Our current fiscal environment, recent legislation passed by Congress in the 2012 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA), plus our new defense strategy offers us a unique opportunity to shape our future forces. Getting the right balance of capabilities across the components is important and should reflect the demand signal from our combatant commanders as well as the comparative advantage of each component to produce and retain those capabilities. There may be current roles and missions that reside in the active component that could shift to the Reserve and vice versa. As we work the Quadrennial Defense Review, the Services will take this opportunity to shape their force mix to maintain the most capability and capacity while mitigating risk.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE S. LEE

BIOFUELS

23. Senator LEE. Mr. Vollrath, in 2012, the Navy undertook the expensive "Great Green Fleet" demonstration, purchasing 450,000 gallons of biofuel at $26 a gallon for a total of $12 million spent on fuel for just one demonstration. The Air Force similarly spent $639,000 on 11,000 gallons of biofuels for a demonstration in 2012, costing the taxpayer $59 per gallon. With the prospect of sequestration and a much tighter defense budget in coming years, do you believe that the military should continue such large-scale demonstrations using biofuels? Please provide a yes or no answer, and if answering yes, please provide a justification as to why programs involving biofuels should be prioritized over other research and development programs.

Mr. VOLLRATH. As this issue is outside of the purview of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management, I defer to my colleagues Mr. Estevez and Mr. Fanning to respond to this question.

FUTURE ACQUISITION PROCESS

24. Senator LEE. Mr. Vollrath, with the prospect of sequester cuts to DOD this year and continuing cuts through the next 9 fiscal years, we must change the way that acquisitions are conducted in order to be more efficient and cost effective. Necessary acquisitions, such as our next generation fighter jet, have been plagued by delays and budget overruns. What lessons have been learned so far from the F–35 program that you will implement in future acquisitions?

Mr. VOLLRATH. As this issue is outside of the purview of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management, I defer to my colleagues Mr. Estevez and Mr. Fanning to respond to this question.

[The nomination reference of Mr. Frederick E. Vollrath follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 22, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Frederick Vollrath, of Virginia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Defense. (New Position).

[The biographical sketch of Mr. Frederick E. Vollrath, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF FREDERICK E. VOLLRATH

Education:

University of Miami

- 1958–1962 - Bachelor of Business Administration in Management awarded 1962

Central Michigan University

- 1975–1976 - Master of Arts in Personnel Management awarded 1976

Employment record:

Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management - 2012–present

Computer Sciences Corporation - 1999–2006

- Corporate Vice President of Human Resources

U.S. Army - 1963–1998

- Human Resources Management Command
- Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel (G–1)
- Retired as Lieutenant General in 1998

Honors and awards:

Distinguished Service Medal
Legion of Merit
Bronze Star
Meritorious Service Medal
Army Commendation Medal
Adjutant General Corps Regimental Hall of Fame

[The Committee on Armed Services requires all individuals nominated from civilian life by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial, and other information of the nominee. The form executed by Mr. Frederick E. Vollrath in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Frederick Emil Vollrath.

2. Position to which nominated:
Assistant Secretary of Defense for Readiness and Force Management.

3. Date of nomination:
January 22, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
July 16, 1940; Miami Beach, FL.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married to Joy Pollock Vollrath.

7. Names and ages of children:
Forrest Vollrath, 48 years.
Hans Vollrath, 46 years.
Mark Vollrath, 39 years.

8. Education: List secondary and higher education institutions, dates attended, degree received, and date degree granted.
Coral Gables High School, HS Diploma, 1954–1958.
University of Miami, Coral Gables, FL, Bachelor Business Administration, 1958–1962.
Central Michigan University, Mount Pleasant, MI, Master of Arts, Personnel Management, 1976.

9. Employment record: List all jobs held since college or in the last 10 years, whichever is less, including the title or description of job, name of employer, location of work, and dates of employment.
Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Readiness and Force Management)
Retired, Lorton, VA, January 2006–March 2012.
Corporate Vice President Human Resources, Computer Sciences Corporation, El Segundo, CA, February 1999–December 2005.

10. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed above.
U.S. Army, May 1963–October 1998

11. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational or other institution.
None.

12. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.

Society of Human Resource Management, Member, Alexandria, VA.

Kappa Sigma Fraternity, Member, Charlottesville, VA.

13. Political affiliations and activities:

(a) List all offices with a political party which you have held or any public office for which you have been a candidate.

None.

(b) List all memberships and offices held in and services rendered to all political parties or election committees during the last 5 years.

None.

(c) Itemize all political contributions to any individual, campaign organization, political party, political action committee, or similar entity of $100 or more for the past 5 years.

Hillary Clinton for President, $2,200.

14. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, military medals and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements.

Distinguished Service Medal
Legion of Merit
Bronze Star
Meritorious Service Medal
Army Commendation Medal
Adjutant General Corps Regimental Hall of Fame

15. Published writings: List the titles, publishers, and dates of books, articles, reports, or other published materials which you have written.

None.

16. Speeches: Provide the committee with two copies of any formal speeches you have delivered during the last 5 years which you have copies of and are on topics relevant to the position for which you have been nominated.

None.

17.Commitments regarding nomination, confirmation, and service:

(a) Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Yes.

(b) Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

No.

(c) If confirmed, will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Yes.

(d) Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Yes.

(e) Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

Yes.

(f) Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

Yes.

(g) Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Yes.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–F of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–F are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

FREDERICK E. VOLLRATH.

This 21st day of February, 2013.

[The nomination of Mr. Frederick E. Vollrath was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on March 20, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on April 18, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Mr. Eric K. Fanning by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. Not currently. I agree with the goals of those defense reforms; they remain essential to the effective employment of our Nation's Armed Forces. Most importantly, they have yielded a demonstrated improvement in the joint warfighting capabilities of the U.S. military.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I have no suggestions for modifications to the Goldwater-Nichols legislation. Should I identify areas that merit reform, I will propose those changes through the appropriate established process.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. If confirmed, I will bring more than 2 decades of broad experience in national security policy and programs as well as management to this position. From research assistant on the House Armed Services Committee, to Senior Vice President for Strategic Development at Business Executives for National Security, to my current position as the Deputy Under Secretary of the Navy, I have examined national security challenges from many perspectives. I have worked closely with the other Military Services, the national security interagency community, and Members of Congress to help make the right decisions for our Nation's defense. I have also grappled with tough trade-offs among programs in a fiscally-constrained environment and have considered the implications of changes in defense law and policy. If confirmed, I believe these skills and my experience can benefit the Air Force and the broader Department of Defense (DOD).

DUTIES

Question. Section 8015 of title 10, U.S.C., states the Under Secretary of the Air Force shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary of the Air Force may prescribe.

What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Under Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. The position of the Under Secretary of the Air Force is established by law within the Office of the Secretary of the Air Force. Subject to the Secretary of the Air Force's direction and control, the Under Secretary exercises the full authority of the Secretary to conduct the affairs of the Department of the Air Force (except as limited by law, regulation or limitations imposed by DOD or the Secretary of the Air Force). The Under Secretary also serves as the Chief Management Officer of the Air Force, the senior energy official, and the focal point for space at the Air Force headquarters.

Question. What recommendations, if any, do you have for changes in the duties and functions of the Under Secretary of the Air Force, as set forth in section 8015 of title 10, U.S.C., or in DOD regulations pertaining to functions of the Under Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. At this time, I am unaware of any reason to change the duties and functions of the Under Secretary as set out in title 10 and pertinent DOD regulations. If I am confirmed and I identify areas that I believe merit changes, I will propose those changes through the appropriate established processes.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what additional duties, if any, do you expect will be prescribed for you?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Secretary of the Air Force to further his vision and goals for the Air Force. I expect the Secretary to prescribe duties for me relating to the Under Secretary of the Air Force's responsibilities, particularly in the role of Chief Management Officer.

Question. Section 904(b) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008, directs the Secretary of a Military Department to designate the Under Secretary of such Military Department to assume the primary management responsibility for business operations.

What is your understanding of the business operations responsibilities of the Under Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. It is my understanding that the business operations responsibilities of the Chief Management Officer, consistent with section 904 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008, include the following: ensuring the Air Force's capability to carry out DOD's strategic plan in support of national security objectives; ensuring the core business missions of the Department of the Air Force are optimally aligned to support the Department's warfighting mission; establishing performance goals and measures for improving and evaluating overall economy, efficiency, and effectiveness and monitoring and measuring this progress; and working with DOD's Chief Management Officer to develop and maintain a strategic plan for business reform.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. If confirmed, what would be your working relationship with:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Secretary of Defense serves as the principal assistant to the President on all DOD matters. The Secretary of the Air Force is subject to the authority, direction and control of the Secretary of Defense and the Under Secretary of the Air Force works for the Secretary of the Air Force. The Under Secretary also serves as the Chief Management Officer of the Air Force, the senior energy official, and the focal point for space at the Air Force headquarters. As the focal point of space for the Air Force, the Under Secretary coordinates all of the space functions and activities across the Air Force, and is the primary interface to the Office of the Secretary of Defense for space matters. If confirmed, I would look forward to working closely with the Secretary of Defense and his office on space-related matters, energy issues, and other matters as directed by the Secretary of the Air Force.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Deputy Secretary of Defense assists the Secretary of Defense in carrying out his duties and responsibilities and performs those duties assigned by the Secretary of Defense or by law. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Deputy Secretary of Defense on a range of matters. In particular, I would look forward to working with and supporting the Deputy Secretary of Defense in his role as Chief Management Officer of DOD.

Question. The Deputy Chief Management Officer of the Department of Defense.

Answer. The Deputy Chief Management Officer (DCMO) is the principal staff assistant and advisor to the Secretary of Defense and Deputy Secretary of Defense for matters relating to the management and improvement of integrated DOD business operations. In this role the DCMO is charged with leading the synchronization, integration, and coordination of the disparate business activities of the Department to ensure optimal alignment in support of the warfighting mission. If confirmed, I look forward to building on my close working relationship with the DCMO in my new capacity as the Air Force Chief Management Officer.

Question. The Director of the Business Transformation Agency.

Answer. This office no longer exists.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is the principal military advisor to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Chairman through the Chief of Staff of the Air Force on appropriate matters affecting the Air Force.

Question. The Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Vice Chairman has the same statutory authorities and obligations of other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. When performing duties as the acting Chairman, the Vice Chairman's relationship with the combatant commanders is exactly the same as that of the Chairman. If confirmed, I will work closely with the Vice Chairman through the Chief of Staff of the Air Force on appropriate matters affecting the Air Force.

Question. The Secretary of the Air Force.

Answer. Subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Air Force is responsible for and has the authority necessary to conduct all affairs of the Department of the Air Force. The Under Secretary of the Air Force is subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of the Air Force. If confirmed, I expect the Secretary to assign me a wide range of duties and responsibilities involving, but not limited to, organizing, supplying, equipping, training, maintaining, and administering the Air Force. I look forward to working closely with the Secretary as his deputy and principal assistant.

Question. The Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

Answer. The Chief of Staff of the Air Force is directly responsible to the Secretary of the Air Force and performs duties subject to his authority, direction, and control. For the Secretary of the Air Force, the Chief of Staff is responsible for providing properly organized, trained, and equipped forces to support the combatant commanders in their mission accomplishment. The Chief of Staff oversees members and organizations across the Air Force, advising the Secretary on plans and recommendations, and, acting as an agent of the Secretary, implementing plans upon approval. If confirmed, I would foster a close working relationship with the Chief of Staff to ensure that policies and resources are appropriate to meet the needs of the Air Force and respect his additional responsibilities as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force.

Answer. The Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force carry out the goals and priorities of the Air Force. If confirmed, I will assist the Secretary in building a strong team through close relationships and information sharing, and I look forward to working with the Assistant Secretaries to further the Secretary's vision.

Question. The General Counsel of the Air Force.

Answer. The General Counsel (GC) is the senior civilian legal advisor to Air Force senior leaders and all officers and agencies of the Department of the Air Force. The GC serves as the chief ethics official. If confirmed, I look forward to developing a strong working relationship with the GC and his staff.

Question. The Inspector General of the Air Force.

Answer. The Inspector General (IG) of the Air Force is a general officer who is detailed to the position by the Secretary of the Air Force. When directed, the IG inquires into and reports on matters affecting the discipline, efficiency, and economy of the Air Force. He also proposes programs of inspections and investigations as appropriate. If confirmed, I would look forward to developing a good working relationship with the IG.

Question. The Surgeon General of the Air Force.

Answer. The Surgeon General (SG) of the Air Force is the functional manager of the Air Force Medical Service and provides direction, guidance, and technical management of Air Force medical personnel at facilities worldwide. The SG advises the Secretary of the Air Force and Air Force Chief of Staff, as well as the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs, on matters pertaining to the medical aspects of the air expeditionary force and the health of Air Force personnel. If confirmed, I would look forward to developing a good working relationship with the SG.

Question. The Air Force Business Transformation Office.

Answer. The Air Force Business Transformation Office is responsible for assisting the Under Secretary of the Air Force in performing the duties of Air Force Chief Management Officer as they relate to improving the effectiveness and efficiency of Air Force business operations. The Air Force Deputy Chief Management Officer has been designated as the Director of the Air Force Business Transformation Office. The office advises Air Force senior leadership on establishment of strategic performance goals, management of Air Force-wide cross functional activities to meet those goals, and implementation of continuous process improvement initiatives. If confirmed, I anticipate a very active and involved role with the Air Force Business Transformation Office on matters affecting the Air Force-wide business operations.

Question. The Judge Advocate General of the Air Force.

Answer. The Judge Advocate General (TJAG) is the senior uniformed legal advisor to Air Force senior leaders and all officers and agencies of the Department of the Air Force and provides professional supervision to TJAG's Corps in the performance of their duties. If confirmed, I will look forward to developing a good working relationship with TJAG and the TJAG staff.

Question. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

Answer. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau is the senior uniformed National Guard officer responsible for formulating, developing, and coordinating all policies, programs, and plans affecting Army and Air National Guard personnel, and is also a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Appointed by the President, he serves as principal adviser to the Secretary of Defense through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on National Guard matters. He is also the principal adviser to the Secretary and Chief of Staff of the Air Force on all National Guard issues and serves as the Department's official channel of communication with the governors and adjutants general. If confirmed, I will look forward to developing a good working relationship with the chief of the National Guard Bureau on appropriate matters affecting the Air Force.

Question. The Under Secretaries of the Military Services.

Answer. If I am confirmed, I will work diligently to foster a close working relationship with the Under Secretaries of the Army and Navy. I look forward to sharing information and expertise that will assist in the management of the Department of the Air Force and our coordination with the other Services on matters of mutual interest, particularly in our capacities as Chief Management Officers for our respective Services.

MAJOR CHALLENGES AND PRIORITIES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges, if any, that you would confront if confirmed as Under Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. This is a time of great challenge for the Air Force, DOD, and the Nation. The security environment is one where the pace of change is rapid. We live in a world where individual acts are powerful and the effects of these acts can be global. This requires a resilient, flexible, and responsive force ready to answer the Nation's call.

Force structure choices are difficult, especially under current fiscal conditions. But the Air Force, like all of the Services, must continue to maximize each taxpayer dollar to support the joint warfighter in today's conflict while ensuring we can prevail in the next fight, whatever and wherever it may be. The Air Force must balance the need to modernize platforms with the requirement to invest in new technologies and capabilities. As we all know, the men and women who serve are truly our most valuable asset. So, the Air Force must also ensure that it can continue to recruit, train, deploy, and retain highly-skilled airmen, and support those airmen and their families. At a time of great fiscal uncertainty for our Nation, these challenges will continue to pose hard choices for the Service in the years ahead.

If confirmed, I will work to meet these challenges, especially in my role as the Chief Management Officer of the Air Force, by continuing to identify efficiencies, ensuring that the Air Force is getting the most from its investment of taxpayers' resources. I will also work toward more efficient and cost-effective acquisition processes and program execution, particularly in the areas of energy and space. I look forward to working closely with DOD and Air Force leadership, along with this committee, to develop strategies for addressing these major challenges facing the Air Force and the Nation.

Question. If confirmed, how would you prioritize and what plans would you have, if any, for addressing these challenges?

Answer. The Secretary and Chief of Staff of the Air Force have laid out clear priorities—continue to strengthen the nuclear enterprise; partner with the joint and coalition team to win today's fight; develop and care for airmen and their families; modernize air and space inventories, organizations, and training; and recapture acquisition excellence.

If confirmed, I look forward to working with senior DOD and Air Force leadership, as well as this committee, to ensure that we make the right choices for the Air Force and the Nation. All of these priorities will require sustained leadership and effort with an eye toward ensuring the best support for the warfighter and the wise use of taxpayer resources.

AIR FORCE GLOBAL POSTURE

Question. The Department of Defense Strategic Guidance issued in January 2012 emphasized the Asia-Pacific and Middle East regions while still ensuring the U.S. ability to maintain mutual defense commitments in Europe. The Strategic Guidance calls for a rebalancing of the U.S. military investment in Europe, which will be achieved in part through rotational presence at overseas bases in Europe.

In your view, should we consider making more substantial reductions in Air Force force structure in Europe, particularly in view of the shift in strategy toward the Asia/Pacific arena?

Answer. The United States' defense commitments to Europe and our role in NATO remain paramount to regional stability and our international security interests. Considerations to substantially reduce force structure or employ it in new ways within Europe will require clear planning with our partners. The Air Force brings unique capabilities to Europe as part of a balanced forward presence that assures our allies of our commitment and dissuades potential adversaries from dangerous action. Additionally, I understand the Air Force meets the capability and force-sizing requirements directed by the new Defense Strategic Guidance, providing global and adaptable forces in the highest priority areas and missions in the Asia-Pacific region and the Middle East, while still ensuring our ability to maintain our defense commitments to Europe and other allies and partners. If confirmed, I will work to ensure we continue to invest in collaborative defense programs, which are in the strategic best interests of both the United States and our allies. Additionally, if we identify redundant capabilities that our partners can provide, we should carefully analyze the marginal costs of overseas presence and adjust appropriately.

MANAGEMENT OF SPACE ACTIVITIES

Question. As the Under Secretary of the Air Force, you would have an important role in helping the Secretary of the Air Force discharge his responsibilities as the Department of Defense Executive Agent for Space, in particular, for developing, coordinating, and integrating policy, plans and programs for major defense space acquisitions.

If confirmed, will you be designated as the DOD Executive Agent for Space?

Answer. I do not expect to be designated as the DOD Executive Agent for Space. While this role has been delegated in the past, the new DOD Directive does not extend the Executive Agent for Space authority.

Question. If you are designated as the DOD Executive Agent for Space, or are otherwise assisting the Secretary of the Air Force in his role as Executive Agent, how would you ensure that each of the Military Services remains fully engaged in and knowledgeable about space programs and the advantages that such programs can bring to the warfighter?

Answer. If confirmed, I do not expect to be designated as the DOD Executive Agent for Space. While this role has been delegated in the past, the new DOD Directive does not extend the Executive Agent for Space authority. However, assisting the Secretary of the Air Force in his role as EA for Space, I will foster a close working relationship with the Under Secretaries of the Army and Navy, as well as the appropriate Under and Assistant Secretaries of Defense and the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), to ensure space acquisition planning, programming and budgeting are synchronized to continue to deliver the best space capability to the warfighter.

The responsibilities of the Air Force as the DOD's Executive Agent for Space can most successfully be accomplished through close coordination with these organizations for the development of space policy and the integration of space systems into broader departmental efforts.

Question. What is your view of the relationship of the Under Secretary of the Air Force to the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Networks and Information Integration with regard to space policy and systems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will be assigned a wide range of duties and responsibilities subject to the authority, direction and control of the Secretary of the Air Force. I anticipate being an active participant in a number of deliberative bodies which focus on developing, coordinating and integrating DOD policy, plans and programs for major defense acquisitions. For example, I will co-chair the Air Force Space Board and participate in the Defense Space Council as the Air Force representative. The perspective gained in these roles will inform my vision of the best ways to facilitate unity of effort across the space enterprise with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the DOD Chief Information Officer, as well as other stakeholders.

Question. In your view, what are the authorities of the Executive Agent for Space regarding: (1) the budgets, programs, and plans of the various Service and Defense Agency space programs; and (2) milestone decisions for space acquisition programs of the various Services and Defense agencies?

Answer. With respect to planning, budgeting, and programming, I view the authorities of the DOD Executive Agent for Space as an integration function across the entire Department and space communities. If confirmed, I view the synchronization of space budgets between the Services and the coordination of space and nonspace acquisitions as paramount to delivering fully integrated weapon systems to the battlefield.

Currently, the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics has milestone decision authority for space acquisition programs. If confirmed, I look forward to assisting the Under Secretary in managing and delivering space capabilities to the warfighter.

Question. The Government Accountability Office (GAO) has consistently pointed to fragmented leadership as a key contributor to disconnects in space programs and to acquisition problems. GPS-user equipment, for example, lags a decade behind new satellites because of disparate acquisition authority. Architectures for critical areas such as space situation awareness were slow to develop because of a lack of an authority that could pull together and adjudicate the needs of the many organizations in the space arena. Large programs have been canceled partly because agencies could not agree on requirements or work effectively together to provide oversight.

What do you think your role would be, if confirmed, in bringing together the space community versus protecting only the institutional interests of the Air Force?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with counterparts in the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD), the Service Departments and other Defense agencies on space-related issues. While the vast majority of space capabilities reside within the Air Force, I understand these capabilities exist to support national security objectives and the joint warfighter. The office of the Deputy Under Secretary (Space) shares a staff with the DOD Executive Agent for Space. This office is staffed by all four Services, which ensures a multi-Service perspective is brought forth on issues. Additionally, I will encourage a strong partnership with OSD and the Service Departments utilizing the Defense Space Council and other mechanisms for further collaboration, synchronization, and integration across DOD space activities.

If confirmed, I would use the current governance mechanisms to actively work with the other members of the Space community; I would informally develop relationships with peers outside of the Air Force (e.g. NASA, NRO, ODNI): and I would act in a highly collaborative and reliable manner with the other members of the Space community Question. How would you foster better cooperation and coordination with agencies inside and outside the Defense community?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working with the Secretary of the Air Force, the Executive Agent for Space, to further cooperate on space activities across the U.S. Government. The National Reconnaissance Office is a member of the DSC while the Office of the Director of National Intelligence is regularly represented as well. The Intelligence Community Space Board also includes several members from DOD agencies, including the Defense Intelligence Agency and Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, and observers from the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the Director of the Executive Agent for Space Staff.

If confirmed, I will also participate in routinely scheduled, Executive-level meetings such as those between the Air Force, NASA, and the National Reconnaissance Office. The perspective gained in these roles will inform my vision of the best ways to facilitate unity of effort across the DOD Space enterprise and support the Secretary of the Air Force.

Question. Do you see a need to strengthen the authority of the Under Secretary of the Air Force or to establish any new authority to ensure better Government-wide coordination for space?

Answer. At this time, I am unaware of any reason to change the authorities assigned to the Under Secretary of the Air Force. Formed approximately 2 years ago, the Defense Space Council has had a positive impact on Government-wide coordination of space activities. If confirmed, I look forward to working closely with the Secretary of the Air Force in any capacity to build upon the success of the Defense Space Council.

SPACE LAUNCH

Question. On May 2, 2005, Boeing and Lockheed Martin announced plans to merge the production, engineering, test, and launch operations associated with providing Evolved Expendable Launch Vehicle (EELV) services to the U.S. Government. The companies believed the merger could save $100–150 million per year for the U.S. Government while continuing to provide assured access to space. An October 2011 GAO report indicated that these cost savings have not materialized and have in fact increased due to lack of insight into the costs by the merged EELV contractor.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that the costs of launch are contained and transparent to the U.S. Government?

Answer. The new EELV acquisition strategy with quantity, rate, and time commitments, better executive oversight, the emergence of competition and better incentive contract types should ensure launch costs are contained. If confirmed, I plan to become more familiar with these efforts, to evaluate the actual cost savings and other benefits of the Air Force strategy.

Question. Maintaining assured access to launch has been the national security goal of the Department of the Air Force.

In your view is that goal achieved with the EELV vehicles or is there a need for alternative launch options by attracting new entrants to compete with the current EELV contractor?

Answer. Assured access to space has been achieved to date by the current ULA launch systems in the EELV program. However, both public law and policy require the U.S. Government to provide equal opportunity for all qualified providers. Commercial space transportation providers that have demonstrated their ability to safely and reliably launch payloads will be provided the opportunity to compete.

Question. There has been considerable discussion in the past year about the Air Force's plans for a block buy strategy for space launch. The high cost of launch, our knowledge about the industrial base, uneven agency coordination, and inadequate transparency into cost and efficiencies have been significant elements of the debate over this upcoming procurement.

If confirmed, how would you ensure that the Air Force works closely with the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) to ensure that DOD has sufficient knowledge of the heavy-lift program decisions of the administration to facilitate the ability of DOD's ability to negotiate EELV launch contract prices in a manner that maximizes investment?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to working with NASA and others across the U.S. Government to maximize the Department's investment. DOD and NASA collaborate on studies and conduct joint meetings to provide insight into each organization's acquisition strategy. If confirmed, I will continue to work with NASA to ensure full understanding of the bearing NASA program decisions may have on sustaining the launch industrial base.

Question. Do you think that the Air Force's current approach to coordination with NASA is sufficient or are changes needed?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to supporting the Secretary's efforts to build strong relationships with NASA. The Air Force works jointly with both NASA and the NRO on several key areas including the acquisition of space launch services and new launch service provider entrant criteria.

I plan to continue engaging with our space launch partners on matters regarding the stability of the industrial base, EELV launch requirements and competition for DOD launch services. I will continue to look for opportunities for improved cooperation and coordination while the organizations pursue their respective programs.

Question. In light of budgetary constraints, can more be done to leverage the expertise and resources of both agencies as well as other agencies that rely on our national security launch capability, such as the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO)?

Answer. If confirmed, I will evaluate opportunities to leverage expertise across agencies with space launch responsibilities while bearing in mind that there are many existing collaboration activities underway. As an example, the Air Force, NRO, and NASA jointly lead the Government Expendable Launch Vehicle Executive Board as a forum for interagency communication of acquisition, certification, and programmatic launch issues.

Question. The discussion over the last year highlighted a need for a longer term, national strategy for launch—one that optimizes the industrial base, enables competition, advances technology, and can respond to a need to change the current acquisition paradigm for space.

What role do you believe the Air Force should play in developing a national launch strategy?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Air Force and across the Department to evaluate the need to develop a comprehensive national launch strategy. As the DOD's Executive Agent for Space, the Air Force has the ability to reach across the Department to address DOD space equities and collaborate with external stakeholders. If confirmed and requested by the Secretary, I will work with our partners to understand the challenges and assess where key strategic choices are required.

Question. How can this strategy leverage the government's buying power to assure mission success while minimizing costs?

Answer. My understanding is that the objective of such a national strategy is to establish an environment to ensure a stable, flexible, responsive, and appropriately sized U.S. domestic propulsion industrial base capable of fulfilling national requirements and commercial market demands. I look forward to helping develop and decide on a common strategy. A key element to the strategy should be better leveraging the government's buying to gain our desired outcomes.

Question. How can we incentivize contractors to implement efficiencies without adversely affecting mission success?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Air Force to ensure mission assurance is maintained as an important contributing factor to launch mission success. I have learned that the Air Force has taken steps to effectively incentivize ULA to gain efficiencies in launch capability without impacting mission assurance through its two-pronged approach—a mission success performance incentive to ensure focus on mission requirements, and the cost control incentive to find efficiencies. Careful consideration will be taken to ensure these incentive features of the contract structure are appropriately balanced to influence behavior without adversely affecting mission success.

Question. In the near term, what are your plans, if any, to foster competition in the launch vehicle industry to ensure DOD pays competitive prices?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Department on the implementation of its new acquisition strategy, approved in November 2012, which authorizes competition for up to 14 missions for New Entrants.

Question. What insight do you plan to have into the progress of new commercial launch providers in obtaining a government certification?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan on seeing the rapid application of the Air Force's New Entrant Certification Guide (NECG), to guide the evaluation and certification processes for prospective New Entrants. Per the NECG, the Air Force formally reviews and approves all certification approaches proposed by New Entrants, thereby providing me direct insight into any government certifications.

MILITARY SPACE ACQUISITION POLICY

Question. A major issue in space acquisition is the decoupling of acquisition schedules between ground terminals and equipment and the actual satellite. The result is billions of dollars being spent to launch next generation communications, early warning, and GPS systems without the capability on the ground to utilize the full suite of capabilities on the satellites.

If confirmed, what will you do to ensure that ground and satellite capabilities are synchronized as contemplated in section 911 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013?

Answer. It is my understanding that the deployment of ground and satellite capabilities is not always optimally synchronized.

If confirmed, I plan to address programs from an enterprise perspective and improve synchronization of space, control, and user segments. I also plan to ensure appropriate resources are allocated and to balance the need for early development with the appropriate timeline for fielding.

Question. For several years, the Air Force has proposed a multi-year procurement approach for its largest satellite programs. This would have an advantage of stabilizing cost and enabling efficiencies, but there is also a risk of locking in a strategy that may not be suited for the decades ahead and of disabling innovation. At the same time, DOD is weighing the pros and cons of relying more on the commercial sector to carry military space payloads on board commercial satellites as well as alternate architectures that emphasize the use of smaller, simpler satellites that rely on both space and ground networks to carry out the same missions that large, complex, and expensive satellites do today.

What are your views on multi-year procurement, incremental funding, and block-buy approaches, and to what extent do you envision the Air Force using these approaches for acquiring space systems?

Answer. The Block buys enable "process efficiencies" otherwise lost as a result of production breaks. Lowering production costs by building and testing two or more satellites in succession by using nontraditional space procurement funding approaches uses production facilities more efficiently and helps the Department avoid untenable funding spikes, which inject instability into programs and hurt the Space Industrial Base suppliers.

These approaches may not be appropriate for every space system procurement activity. If confirmed, I will support using innovative space system procurement approaches, including multi-year procurement, to ensure we are able to fund and produce these vital systems while still maintaining our ability to fund other core Air Force capabilities.

Question. If confirmed, what would be your plan to maintain superiority in space, to push the state of technology, and to sustain innovation in light of an approach that locks the incumbent contractor into a long-term deal with just incremental advances in capability?

Answer. Maintaining superiority in space requires continued investment in science and technology and innovative acquisition approaches that allow for incremental improvements to operational satellite programs. If confirmed, innovation will continue to be an Air Force priority, and I will continue supporting a strong government-contractor environment that balances affordability with the opportunity for incremental system improvement.

Question. Do you foresee opportunities to develop national security space satellites that are smaller, operationally responsive, and cost less to launch?

Answer. The most important factors in any architecture development are how they accomplish the mission and how they meet requirements. Any opportunities for national security satellites that meet mission needs, cost less to operate, are more responsive, and potentially smaller should be considered seriously.

Question. If so, what role would you play, if confirmed, in changing the acquisition culture from one that coalesces around large, complex, exquisite programs to one that coalesces around smaller, simpler programs that emphasize resilience over reliability?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work closely with our Air Force acquisition leadership and with stakeholders in the Defense Department to foster an acquisition culture that supports delivering capabilities the warfighter needs. If the needs are best met by smaller, simpler programs, we will provide the guidance and resources to deliver space capabilities in that manner.

Question. To what extent would you eliminate barriers and restrictions to enable DOD to more fully use hosted payloads and ride-share arrangements?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure we look at the totality of mission needs. Hosted payloads and ride-share arrangements may provide responsive and cost-effective space capabilities, but rigorous analysis and cost estimating are required. If hosted payloads and/or ride share agreements are selected as part of architecture to meet mission requirements, I will deal with barriers and restrictions to the best of my ability to enable these nontraditional approaches.

Question. For fiscal year 2013, Congress rejected the termination of the Operationally Responsive Space Program and instead moved the office and function under the Space and Missile Systems Center (SMC), as found in section 914 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013.

If confirmed, will you support the implementation of section 914 and support the timely and successful integration of the Operationally Responsive Space Program into SMC?

Answer. Yes, the Air Force transitioned the ORS Office to AFSPC/SMC. A more detailed, long-term plan is pending a fiscal year 2013 Appropriations Bill.

Question. If confirmed, will you fully, and in a timely manner, answer congressional inquiries on the status of the Operationally Responsive Space Office?

Answer. Yes, I will make it a priority to respond to all congressional inquiries.

LONG-RANGE BOMBERS

Question. The B–52s will begin to be retired in the 2030 timeframe but are in urgent need of recapitalization of their data backbone for advanced targeting and communications.

Do you support the B–52 Combat Network Communications Technology (CONECT) program and will you work with Global Strike Command to ensure the full suite of capabilities of the CONECT system are implemented in the aircraft?

Answer. I support the capabilities that the CONECT program brings in order to enable more effective B–52 employment in the complex, network-centric battle space of the future. Although the Air Force restructured the CONECT program in the fiscal year 2013 PB, the capability remains a top Air Force Global Strike Command priority. If confirmed, I will work with Global Strike Command to balance warfighter needs and resources as we address our future budgets.

DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES AS CHIEF MANAGEMENT OFFICER

Question. Section 904 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008 designates the Under Secretary of the Air Force as the Air Force's Chief Management Officer (CMO). Section 908 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2009 requires the CMO of each Military Department to carry out a comprehensive business transformation initiative, with the support of a new Business Transformation Office.

What is your understanding of the duties and responsibilities of the Under Secretary as the CMO of the Department of the Air Force?

Answer. It is my understanding that the responsibilities of the Chief Management Officer, consistent with section 904 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008, include the following: ensuring the Air Force's capability to carry out DOD's strategic plan in support of national security objectives; ensuring the core business missions of the Department of the Air Force are optimally aligned to support the Department's warfighting mission; establishing performance goals and measures for improving and evaluating overall economy, efficiency, and effectiveness and monitoring and measuring this progress; and working with DOD's Chief Management Officer to develop and maintain a strategic plan for business reform. Under section 908 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2009, the Chief Management Officer is also responsible for carrying out an initiative for business transformation for the Air Force. Under section 2222 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010, I would be responsible for pre-certification for Air Force business systems programs prior to submission for Department of Defense Deputy Chief Management Officer review and certification. If confirmed, I will ensure the core function and missions of the Air Force are optimally aligned to support the joint warfighting mission. I intend to fulfill the requirements of the law by establishing performance goals and measures for improving and evaluating the overall affordability, efficiency, and effectiveness of Air Force programs.

Question. What background and expertise do you possess that you believe qualify you to perform these duties and responsibilities?

Answer. I have held equivalent duties and responsibilities as the Deputy Under Secretary of the Navy and Deputy Chief Management Officer, Office of the Under Secretary of the Navy. While in this capacity, I have been engaged in the implementation of the CMO duties directed by section 904 of NDAA 2008, section 905 of NDAA 2009, and section 2222 of NDAA 2010 and intimately familiar with the related DOD guidance issued by the DOD Deputy Chief Management Officer. My experience in Navy Enterprise Resource Planning implementation and assuring compliance with financial improvement and audit readiness requirements will be of particular benefit in my new duties.

Question. Do you believe that the CMO and the Business Transformation Office have the resources and authority needed to carry out the business transformation of the Department of the Air Force?

Answer. Yes I do, putting aside the uncertainty of sequestration and further fiscal challenges imposed on the Department and Air Force. I have favorable first impressions. If, upon further analysis, I become convinced more resources are required to affect transformation, I would work closely with the Secretary to ensure the Air Force is applying sufficient effort to this important issue.

Question. What role do you believe the CMO and the Business Transformation Office should play in the planning, development, and implementation of specific business systems by the Military Departments?

Answer. Consistent with the laws that established them, the CMO and the Business Transformation Office should work with the Secretary and Chief to set transformation priorities aligned to DOD and Air Force needs. They should work to ensure business systems solutions make economic sense and are feasible; build on or replace existing systems; and enforce sound execution through application of the DOD certification process, pursuant to the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2005 and amplified in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, that requires all business systems over $1 million in cost across the future years program be certified as meeting a mission need and supported by a business case.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to the statutory provisions establishing the position of CMO and creating the Business Transformation Office?

Answer. I have no recommendations to make at this time. If confirmed, I will continue to assess the requirement for additional or modified authorities and look forward to working with this committee to ensure that the objectives of the CMO, as intended by Congress, are met.

Question. Section 2222 of title 10, U.S.C., requires that the Secretary of Defense develop a comprehensive business enterprise architecture and transition plan to guide the development of its business systems and processes. The Department has chosen to implement the requirement for an enterprise architecture and transition plan through a "federated" approach in which the Business Transformation Agency has developed the top level architecture while leaving it to the military departments to fill in most of the detail. The Air Force's business systems, like those of the other military departments, remain incapable of providing timely, reliable financial data to support management decisions. In particular, the Government Accountability Office has reported that the Air Force has not yet followed DOD's lead in establishing new governance structures to address business transformation; has not yet developed comprehensive enterprise architecture and transition plan that plug into DOD's federated architecture in a manner that meets statutory requirements; and instead continues to rely upon old, stove-piped structures to implement piecemeal reforms.

If confirmed, what steps, if any, would you take to ensure that the Air Force develops the business systems and processes it needs to appropriately manage funds in the best interest of the taxpayer and the national defense?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Air Force comptroller to ensure that Air Force funding execution is more visible in real time to senior leaders. While I have not yet been briefed in detail on the status and challenges for Air Force systems, I would work to ensure that our systems and processes achieve the outcome of enhancing our ability to manage funds; ensure a detailed schedule is put in place and managed to achieve that outcome; and ensure audits are conducted to validate performance.

Question. Do you believe that a comprehensive, integrated, enterprise-wide architecture and transition plan is essential to the successful transformation of the Air Force's business systems?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. What steps would you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Air Force's enterprise architecture and transition plan meet the requirements of section 2222?

Answer. If confirmed, I will engage the business transformation staff in a detailed review of how the Air Force is developing and using its business enterprise architecture to manage transformation and stay aligned with the DOD Business Enterprise Architecture and related strategic transformation priorities. I would make it a priority to meet very early on with the Deputy CMO and Business Transformation staff to validate the current state of the Air Force business enterprise architecture and its alignment to the DOD architecture. I would focus our review on how the architecture is being applied within the Air Force governance process, and would direct and implement any needed improvements

Question. What are your views on the importance and role of timely and accurate financial and business information in managing operations and holding managers accountable?

Answer. I think timely financial information is critical in managing the operations of large organizations. I understand the frustration of many at the difficulty in achieving audits of DOD financial statements and appreciate congressional efforts, through section 1003 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012, reinforcing the Secretary of Defense's goal of accelerating audit readiness. If confirmed, I will be active in supporting DOD and Secretary of the Air Force's continued focus on financial issues, achieving the end of calendar year 2014 deadline for Statement of Budgetary Resources, and realizing full audit readiness by 2017.

Question. How would you address a situation in which you found that reliable, useful, and timely financial and business information was not routinely available for these purposes?

Answer. If confirmed, I would use that situation as an opportunity to improve the process of providing such financial and business information. I would make this area a priority, especially if it aligns to the major strategic mission priorities of the organization, and assign actions with accountability for corrections. Finally, I would provide active follow-up to ensure the needed results were achieved.

Question. What role do you envision playing, if confirmed, in managing or providing oversight over the improvement of the financial and business information available to Air Force managers?

Answer. If confirmed, I will focus on establishing the priorities for business performance improvements on behalf of the Secretary of the Air Force and report on progress toward achieving these goals. As the CMO, I would expect to be an active and key member of the Air Force governance process, enforcing Department priorities in decisions regarding programs, organizations and processes across the functional staff and Air Force Major Commands.

AUDITABLE FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Question. Section 1003 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2010 requires the Chief Management Officer of the Department of Defense to establish a plan to ensure that DOD's financial statements are validated as ready for audit by not later than September 30, 2017. The Secretary of Defense has established the additional goal of ensuring that the statement of DOD's budgetary resources is validated as ready for audit by not later than September 30, 2014.

In your opinion, is the Department of the Air Force on track to achieve these objectives, particularly with regard to data quality, internal controls and business process re-engineering?

Answer. The Air Force plan has been reviewed and integrated with the OSD FIAR plan that integrates the entire DOD business environment but, admittedly, it is still not without risk. However, they are seeing successes to date that affirm they are on the right path. The Air Force continues to be cautiously optimistic. It has received seven favorable opinions with two more assertions currently under examination. The Statement of Budgetary Resources has received clean opinions on the Budget Authority covering $161 billion while the Existence and Completeness of Mission Critical Assets has received favorable opinions on a total of $97.4 billion. The Air Force is the first Service given a clean opinion on its Fund Balance with Treasury reconciliation process. This gives the Air Force the ability to validate its transactions between the general accounting system and Treasury. The Air Force will continue to assert assessable units until the entire SBR is audit ready. If confirmed, I will make it a priority in my capacity as Chief Management Officer to more closely review and monitor the Air Force strategy.

Question. If not, what impediments may hinder the Air Force's ability to achieve this goal and how would you address them?

Answer. Currently, a key impediment to the Air Force's ability to achieve this goal is the lack of contract support to collect, document, test, and audit the existing business processes. At this time, the fiscal year 2012 through fiscal year 2017 Financial Improvement Audit Readiness (FIAR) support contract is under protest. The Air Force is carefully working to resolve the issue, but without contract support, the progress level is greatly reduced. This risk has the potential to increase due to the current fiscal environment

A second impediment is the lack of an integrated transaction-based accounting system. The Air Force's reliance on legacy systems requires additional compensating process controls. The Air Force will analyze legacy systems and implement appropriate cost-effective changes while they continue to pursue the Defense Enterprise Accounting and Management System and the Air Force Integrated Personnel and Pay System. Further, the Air Force continues to collaborate within the Department to share lessons learned, establish performance measures and consolidate efforts where applicable.

Question. In your view, are the steps that the Air Force needs to take to meet the 2014 goal consistent with the steps that DOD needs to take to achieve full auditability by 2017?

Answer. Yes, the Air Force approach to audit readiness is consistent with DOD. As an active member of the FIAR Governance, the Air Force has the opportunity to collaborate on establishing the goals, objectives and guidance to produce auditable financial statements for the Department. The Air Force adheres to the same guidance published by OUSD(C) which controls the standards for sampling, threshold, and scope to be used during audit readiness efforts. The DOD Comptroller reviews all assertion packages prior to submission for audit by an Independent Public Accounting Firm or the DOD Inspector General. Upon favorable examination, the Air Force will sustain those auditable processes to support the overall DOD assertion for the principal financial statements.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that the Air Force moves to achieve these objectives without an unaffordable or unsustainable level of one-time fixes and manual work-arounds?

Answer. The Air Force has established a governance process to oversee its audit readiness objectives, which is aligned to its Investment Review process, to ensure Senior Leadership oversight across the Air Force enterprise. This governance is aligned to OSD governance to ensure Department-wide integration of efforts to achieve audit objectives and avoid those stove-piped, unaffordable, and unsustainable fixes. A key element of this governance will be to document and standardize the business processes across the Air Force to ensure they are traceable and auditable. In order to do this, the Air Force is implementing a standard set of tools to validate, document, re-use, and sustain the results from its audit readiness efforts, while also ensuring auditability of its Information Technology systems.

Utilizing these standards and tools will allow Senior Leader oversight on the corrective action plans being implemented across the Air Force in collaboration with the Army, Navy, and Service providers throughout the Federal Government. This holistic, enterprise-wide approach will allow the Air Force to determine impacts of business process changes, ensure alignment with the DOD Business Enterprise Architecture, and inform its IT investment decisions. Finally, the Air Force strategy will provide a mechanism to encourage culture change, which is necessary for future continuous process improvement, the results of which will also be documented and auditable.

If confirmed, I will continue to press forward on auditability goals, but with an eye towards sustainability so as not to waste valuable resources in this tight fiscal environment.

ACQUISITION ISSUES

Question. What are your views regarding the need to reform the process by which the Department of the Air Force acquires major weapons systems?

Answer. Continuing to improve the acquisition process for major weapons systems is a critical issue for the Air Force, as well as for DOD. My initial impression is that the Air Force has taken focused actions to reform its acquisition processes and is continuing to work to make further improvements in response to the Weapons System Acquisition Reform Act of 2009. In addition, I understand that the Air Force is working on Mr. Kendall's "Better Buying Power 2.0" initiatives in the pursuit of greater efficiency and productivity. If confirmed, I would expect to learn more about the challenges facing Air Force acquisition and to help the leadership team take further steps to deliver better value to the taxpayer and warfighter by improving the way the Air Force does business.

Question. What steps would you recommend to improve that process?

Answer. If confirmed, I would continue the acquisition improvements begun by the Secretary of the Air Force and the Chief of Staff and work with OSD on their acquisition improvement initiatives. Specifically, I would recommend the Air Force work with OSD on program affordability, cost control throughout the program lifecycle, and improving the acquisition workforce across the Air Force.

Question. If confirmed, what role do you expect to play in the major defense acquisition programs of the Department of the Air Force?

Answer. If confirmed, I will assist the Secretary of the Air Force in his goal of recapturing acquisition excellence. I understand his initiatives include providing full spectrum acquisition capabilities to the Air Force and the Department of Defense, and ingraining a culture of process improvement within acquisition. I would look forward to helping the Secretary to achieve his acquisition goals in whatever capacity he believes I am best suited to serve.

Question. Roughly half of the Department of Defense's largest acquisition programs have exceeded the so-called "Nunn-McCurdy" cost growth standards established in section 2433 of title 10, U.S.C. One such program is the Air Force's Joint Strike Fighter program, for which total life-cycle cost has now been estimated to exceed $1 trillion.

If confirmed, what steps, if any, would you take to address the out-of-control cost growth on the Department of the Air Force's major defense acquisition programs?

Answer. I am in support of the principles that motivated the Weapons Acquisition Reform Act of 2009. I think that law lays out both the drivers of program challenges and the need to take very seriously any critical breaches of Nunn-McCurdy thresholds. As such and if confirmed, my analysis of the Air Force's acquisition programs would focus on the assumptions used in establishing program baselines. Such baselines must be based on realistic schedule and technical assumptions and accurate cost estimates. If confirmed, I will place an emphasis on realistic budgeting based on improved program cost estimates.

Question. What principles will guide your thinking on whether to recommend terminating a program that has experienced "critical" cost growth under Nunn-McCurdy?

Answer. The direction provided by Nunn-McCurdy and by the Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 is essential in determining whether to terminate or continue a program that has experienced a critical cost growth. I agree with the new law that, when such breaches occur, we must understand what the root cause of that breach is. I further agree with the presumption for termination that must guide one's analysis and also the requirement that, if a program is restructured, it should be required to receive new milestone approval before proceeding. While there are programs that will be essential to national security, I believe the Department must undertake hard analysis in looking at the alternatives in such a case.

Question. Many experts have acknowledged that the Department of Defense may have gone too far in reducing its acquisition workforce, resulting in undermining its ability to provide needed oversight in the acquisition process.

Do you agree with this assessment?

Answer. The answer in the past would have been yes, but my understanding is that the Air Force has alleviated a lot of these issues through its acquisition improvement initiatives since fiscal year 2008.

Question. If so, what steps do you believe the Department of the Air Force should take to address this problem?

Answer. If confirmed, I will look for ways to continue strengthening the Air Force's acquisition workforce.

Question. The Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 (WSARA) was intended to ensure that future weapon systems move forward on a sound footing by addressing unrealistic program cost and schedule estimates, the absence of clearly defined and stable requirements, the inclusion of immature technologies that unnecessarily raise program costs and delay development and production, and the failure to solidify design and manufacturing processes at appropriate junctures in the development process.

Do you support the approach taken by WSARA?

Answer. I fully support the approach taken by WSARA and all efforts to improve acquisition in the Air Force.

Question. What additional steps, if any, do you believe the Department of the Air Force should take to address these problems?

Answer. I believe the Air Force should continue the effort to improve and maintain the acquisition workforce expertise. Specifically, I recommend enhanced acquisition training and increasing the availability of highly qualified course instructors in such functional areas as cost estimating that would strengthen the Air Force's program management business negotiation and oversight role.

Question. By some estimates, the Department of Defense now spends more money every year for the acquisition of services than it does for the acquisition of products, including major weapon systems. Yet, the Department places far less emphasis on staffing, training, and managing the acquisition of services than it does on the acquisition of products.

What steps, if any, do you believe the Air Force should take to improve the staffing, training, and management of its acquisition of services?

Answer. The Air Force must continue its focus on improving services acquisition. Leaders throughout the Air Force must be aware of their role in properly assigning personnel to the acquisition teams, resourcing the programs, ensuring personnel receive the necessary service acquisition training, and growing experts in acquiring services. Specifically, the Air Force Senior Manager for Services has partnered with Air Force Major Commands to identify senior level Services advocates to ensure consistency with approved processes and that DOD and Air Force policy is being followed.

Question. Do you think the Air Force should develop processes and systems to provide managers with access to information needed to conduct comprehensive spending analyses of services contracts on an ongoing basis?

Answer. Yes. It is critical that decisionmakers have access to key metrics throughout the life of contracted services. The Air Force is currently developing a senior leader dashboard to provide near real time visibility on program execution and ensure transparency of contracted services.

AIR FORCE POLICIES REGARDING DRUG AND ALCOHOL ABUSE

Question. What is your understanding of the Air Force's policy with respect to disciplinary action and administrative separation of Air Force personnel who have been determined to have used illegal drugs? Do you agree with this policy?

Answer. The Air Force does not have any policy per se on disciplinary actions with respect to particular criminal offenses. However, I know each drug case is investigated by law enforcement personnel and the report of investigation is provided to the airman's commander to review the evidence for appropriate disposition. Each case is evaluated on its merits, including the type of illegal drug used, the facts and circumstances of the use or uses, the military record of the airman, and the strength of the evidence.

The Air Force has a policy on administrative separation for illegal drug use found in its administrative separation instruction. It states that drug abuse is incompatible with military service and airmen who abuse drugs one or more times are subject to administrative separation for misconduct. In fact, administrative separation processing is mandatory for drug abuse unless a waiver is granted. This seems to be an appropriately fair policy to me.

Question. What is your understanding of the Air Force's policy with respect to rehabilitation and retention on Active Duty of members of the Air Force who have been determined to have used illegal drugs or abused alcohol or prescription drugs? Do you agree with this policy?

Answer. Only in very limited circumstances does the Air Force retain airmen determined to have used illegal drugs, including illegal use of prescription drugs. In order to be retained, airmen have the burden of proving that retention is warranted by meeting a number of criteria, to include if such drug use was a departure from the airman's usual behavior and is not likely to recur, does not involve recurring incidents, and does not involve distribution. The Air Force does provide some limited protection for airmen who self-identify their drug use for the purpose of seeking treatment in that they may avoid criminal prosecution, but will still face administrative separation. This seems to be an appropriately fair policy to me.

Question. Do you believe that the Air Force has devoted sufficient resources for implementation of its rehabilitation policies and objectives since 2001? If not, in what ways have resources been insufficient?

Answer. Yes. The Air Force maintains a comprehensive and dynamic drug detection and response program that includes rehabilitation as a key element. There are trained alcohol and drug counselors and medical providers at each installation to provide evaluation and outpatient treatment services. For airmen needing more intensive inpatient treatment, medical teams arrange for these services through TRICARE with local community medical centers.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. The DOD Independent Review Related to Fort Hood observed that "DOD policy regarding religious accommodation lacks the clarity necessary to help commanders distinguish appropriate religious practices from those that might indicate a potential for violence or self-radicalization" and recommended that the policy be updated.

What is your understanding of current policies and programs of the Air Force regarding religious practices in the military?

Answer. The Air Force Chaplain Corps provides spiritual care and the opportunity for airmen, their families, and other authorized personnel to exercise their constitutional right to the free exercise of religion. Every effort is made to ensure this right is protected. Consistent with the Air Force Fort Hood Follow-On Review recommendations, the Air Force is reviewing and updating policies and guidance consolidation into a single series of instructions. This should ensure that leaders consult chaplains and legal counsel before making decisions, to better address prevention, identification, and response to religious-based disrespect, harassment, and discrimination in relevant training of airmen (e.g., equal opportunity training, free exercise of religion training, wingman training, and commander courses).

Question. What is your view of the need to clarify the policy regarding religious accommodation in the Air Force?

Answer. The Air Force continues to ensure clarity to commanders by providing clear policy on religious accommodation, which maintains consistency with DOD policy. Air Force policy directs that requests to commanders for religious accommodation are welcomed and dealt with fairly and consistently throughout the Air Force. While requests vary in need and accommodation, all requests should be approved unless approval would have a real (not hypothetical) adverse impact on military readiness, unit cohesion, standards or discipline and, therefore, disapproval of the accommodation request is in furtherance of a compelling military or government interest. Commanders are to consult with their installation chaplain and staff judge advocate on requests for religious accommodation. However, consistent with the Air Force Fort Hood Follow On Review recommendations, the Air Force is presently reviewing and updating policy and guidance to address prevention, identification and response to religious-based disrespect, harassment and discrimination.

Question. Do Air Force policies regarding religious practices in the military accommodate, where appropriate, religious practices that require adherents to wear items of religious apparel or adhere to certain grooming practices related to their faith?

Answer. The Air Force has a clear process to ensure every request for religious accommodation is welcomed and dealt with as fairly and consistently. Requests for accommodation should be approved, unless approval would have a real (not hypothetical) adverse impact on military readiness, unit cohesion, standards or discipline, and therefore, disapproval of the accommodation request is in furtherance of a compelling military and/or government interest. Concerning the wearing of religious garments or other articles, requests for accommodation involving items such as the outdoor wear of religious head coverings that are not concealed under military headgear and those impacting grooming and personal appearance (e.g., hair length and style, tattoos, and "body art") must be approved by the Deputy Chief of Staff for Manpower, Personnel, and Services.

Question. In your view, do these policies accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Yes, the policies are intended to protect both the free exercise of religion for all airmen and avoid the appearance of an official endorsement of any particular religion. Air Force policy presently communicates that all airmen have the freedom to choose to practice their particular religion or subscribe to no religious belief at all. If confirmed, I will closely monitor the implementation of this policy.

Question. In your view, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by military chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious beliefs?

Answer. From what I have been told so far, I believe that Air Force Chaplains are well trained to provide prayers offered in pluralistic settings. This requires sensitivity to their audience which includes individuals from various religious traditions as well as those who profess no religious belief at all. The guidance provided by Air Force leaders also makes clear that supervisors respect each chaplains' right to adhere to the tenets of his or her faith and thus not require chaplains to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, which are inconsistent with their faith tradition. If confirmed, I will look into this in greater detail.

Question. What is your assessment of measures taken at the Air Force Academy to ensure religious tolerance and respect?

Answer. Air Force leadership clearly takes very seriously the idea of religious tolerance and respect. The team effort to improve the religious atmosphere at the Academy continues to reduce cases of intolerance and inappropriate behavior. Since beginning their Cadet Religious Respect Training Program, 7,782 cadets have been trained to respect the beliefs or non-beliefs of others. In addition, the Dean of Faculty trained 910 staff members to ensure the academic environment is free of negative religious expressions. Further, the Athletic Department's Religious Respect Program trained 300 coaches and staff to ensure the athletic department adheres to the guidance. Finally, the Cadet Interfaith Council continues to positively impact relationships between various faith groups and cooperates in various service projects to improve the community. If confirmed, I will monitor this closely to ensure that the training put in place is yielding the desired outcomes.

AIR FORCE SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question. If confirmed, what direction would you provide regarding the importance of innovative defense science and technology in meeting Air Force missions?

Answer. The innovative technology produced by the Air Force Science and Technology (S&T) Program balances high-risk with high-return science and knowledge. If confirmed, the direction I provide would focus on supporting the Air Force capabilities fundamental to deterring and defeating aggression, projecting power in anti-access and area denial environments, operation in space and cyberspace domains, and maintaining a safe, secure and effective strategic deterrent.

Question. Do you believe the current balance between short- and long-term research is appropriate to meet current and future Air Force needs?

Answer. From what I can tell at this point, yes. The success of the Air Force will depend on continued innovation and technical excellence. The Air Force S&T Program invests across a broad portfolio to attain a balance between near-term, quick-reaction capability support; mid-term technology development to modernize the force; and revolutionary technologies that address far-term warfighting needs.

Question. If confirmed, what role would you play in ensuring research priorities that will meet the needs of the Air Force over the next 10 years?

Answer. As outlined in the Defense Strategic guidance, the future strategic environment will require an agile and flexible military. Therefore, it is important that the Air Force S&T Program continue to invest in a broad portfolio of research to anticipate future needs. If confirmed, in my role as the senior energy and sustainability official, I will also take special interest in the Air Force's continued investment in the development and demonstration of advanced technologies that address affordability and lifecycle costs of future systems.

Question. In the face of rising acquisition costs for programs such as the Joint Strike Fighter, and programs to support space operations, if confirmed, how would you plan to ensure the protection of funding for long-term science and technology investments?

Answer. I take the issue of rising acquisition costs very seriously. Protecting the funding for the Air Force S&T Program is very important as it is a key element in making mature technologies available for transition into development programs. The S&T Program allows the Air Force to sustain its heritage of technological superiority.

AIR FORCE LABORATORIES

Question. What role should Air Force laboratories play in supporting current operations and in developing new capabilities to support Air Force missions?

Answer. It is my view that the Air Force S&T program—including the labs—should continue to develop and transition innovative and relevant technologies; build and nurture a technically skilled, highly educated and adaptive workforce able to provide effective solutions for today's issues; and conduct innovative research to maintain our technological edge over potential adversaries.

Question. If confirmed, how will you ensure that Air Force laboratories have the highest quality workforce, laboratory infrastructure, resources, and management, so that they can continue to support deployed warfighters and develop next generation capabilities?

Answer. If confirmed, I will spend time educating myself on the details of the Air Force's current initiatives in this area. Ensuring the Air Force continues to have war-winning technology requires the proactive management of its current Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics (STEM) workforce and a deliberate effort to grow the laboratory scientists and engineers of the future. Those researchers need state-of-the-art laboratory facilities to best support deployed warfighters with ready-to-use technologies and develop next generation capabilities. I will rely on and support the senior leadership of the acquisition community to assess and invest in infrastructure, including workforce, research facilities and funds necessary to support the future technology needs of the Air Force.

Question. Do you support the full utilization of authorities established by Congress under the Laboratory Personnel Demonstration program?

Answer. Retaining the current world-class, highly-skilled workforce is an important part of the Air Force's Bright Horizons STEM workforce strategic roadmap. I understand that the Lab Demo program has done much to ensure the Air Force Research Laboratory's ability to attract and retain personnel since its inception in 1997. This flexible system has helped to achieve the best workforce for the mission, adjust the workforce for change and improve overall quality. If confirmed, I will work with the laboratory leadership to monitor the Lab Demo program to ensure it remains effective for its primary purpose and propose changes to the program as they become required.

Question. Do you believe that the Air Force's laboratories and engineering centers should have a separate, dynamic personnel system, uniquely tailored to support laboratory directors' requirements to attract and retain the highest quality scientific and engineering talent?

Answer. If confirmed, I look forward to carefully examining the Air Force's experience with the Lab Demo program and working with laboratory director's to determine future needs and authorities for the program.

Question. How will you assess the quality of Air Force laboratory infrastructure and the adequacy of investments being made in new military construction and sustainment of that infrastructure?

Answer. I am aware that the 2005 Base Realignment and Closure (BRAC) effort successfully completed in September 2011 provided several new, state-of-the-art facilities within the Air Force Research Laboratory. The Laboratory's BRAC realignments successfully realized the Secretary of the Air Force's priorities for BRAC 2005, including the goals of realigning Air Force infrastructure with the future defense strategy, maximizing operational capability by eliminating excess physical capacity, and capitalizing on opportunities for joint activity. If confirmed, I will work closely with the leadership of the acquisition community to ensure that we remain vigilant and upgrade our S&T infrastructure in a timely manner so that major research and programs are not put at risk due to aging facilities.

Question. Are you concerned about the current or future supply of experts in defense critical disciplines, particularly personnel with appropriate security clearances, to hold positions in defense laboratories?

Answer. Yes, I am always concerned about maintaining a solid representation of Science, Technology, Engineering and Math (STEM) professionals in the critical defense disciplines our laboratories and acquisition enterprise require. As I understand it, in the last 5 years, the Air Force has been able to meet its needs by accessing more than 3,100 engineers, physical and analytical scientists. Congressionally-authorized personnel and hiring authorities have helped improve the Air Force's compensation and hiring abilities.

AIR FORCE TEST AND EVALUATION CAPABILITIES

Question. Over the past few years, the Air Force has proposed taking measures to significantly reduce its test and evaluation capabilities—both infrastructure and workforce. These efforts have, in general, been overturned by the Department of Defense and Congress.

Do you believe that the Air Force has test and evaluation capabilities that are excess to Department of Defense needs?

Answer. The Air Force strives to ensure it uses and organizes its test and evaluation (T&E) capabilities as efficiently as possible to meet Air Force and DOD needs within a fiscally constrained budget. If confirmed, I will work to continue balancing Air Force T&E capabilities, Air Force and DOD needs, the available budget, and our National interest to propose feasible and prudent adjustments.

Question. What steps will you take to ensure that the Air Force has the appropriate testing infrastructure and qualified test workforce?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work cooperatively with the SecAF, DOD, and industry to help shape the future of our Nation's infrastructure and workforce. I will look at the T&E infrastructure and workforce requirements to identify potential efficiencies; support workforce shaping, training, and retention programs; and focus the test infrastructure to support the current and future needs of the DOD acquisition community and broader national interests.

AIR FORCE INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY PROGRAMS

Question. What major improvements would you like to see made in the Air Force's development and deployment of major information technology systems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will further explore how information technology systems are delivered to our airmen. Specifically, I will review the Air Force's current information technology and acquisition governance structures and processes and look for opportunities to further strengthen oversight and instill rigor and discipline in the planning, development, and deployment of major information technology systems. This is particularly important when the business case supports pursuing an enterprise solution.

Question. How will you encourage process and cultural change in organizations so that they maximize the benefits that new enterprise information technology systems can offer in terms of cost savings and efficiency?

Answer. If confirmed, I will delve deeper into this area in order to fully understand and appreciate previous and ongoing Air Force efficiency efforts and how technology was used to drive down costs. I will also ensure that there is a solid and rigorous governance structure in place to ensure the necessary business process reengineering takes place to realize the benefit of enterprise systems, when the business case makes clear the value. Savings are not realized when individual components are able to bend the technology to fit their processes, rather than change processes to meet the enterprise solution.

Question. What is the relationship between Air Force efforts to implement enterprise information technology programs and supporting computing services and infrastructure to support Air Force missions, to the efforts being undertaken by the Defense Information Systems Agency and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Networks and Information Integration?

Answer. All of the Military Departments, led by the Joint Staff and the DOD Chief Information Office, and in close partnership with the Defense Information Systems Agency, are in close collaboration and planning for the implementation of the Joint Information Environment. This partnership allows the Air Force to synchronize ongoing consolidation and enterprise service efforts and transition to the Department's enterprise solutions. If confirmed, I will continue to forge this relationship and find opportunities to leverage Air Force investments to better posture the Department to employ the full range of operational capability and capacity to the Joint warfighter. I will also look for opportunities from Department investments that the Air Force can leverage to meet its mission needs.

INVESTMENT IN INFRASTRUCTURE

Question. In recent years, various witnesses appearing before the Committee have testified that the Military Services under-invest in their facilities compared to private industry standards. Decades of under-investment in our installations have led to increasing backlogs of facility maintenance needs, created substandard living and working conditions, and made it harder to take advantage of new technologies that could increase productivity.

What is your assessment of Air Force infrastructure investment?

Answer. The Air Force, like all Services, is having to make difficult investment trade-offs as budgets decrease. If confirmed, I will review the current and future requirements for infrastructure, to ensure that the Air Force can support its mission requirements and the Secretary of the Air Force's priorities.

Question. If confirmed, what actions, if any, would you propose to increase resources to reduce the backlog and to improve Air Force facilities?

Answer. If a thorough review of infrastructure investment indicates the Air Force is taking too much risk, then, if confirmed, I will work closely with Air Force leadership to make appropriate fiscal adjustments to reduce the backlog and improve facilities.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE

Question. The Air Force is investigating numerous allegations of sexual misconduct by Military Training Instructors at Basic Military Training at Joint Base San Antonio-Lackland. Several instructors have already been convicted of various offenses and others are pending trial by court-martial. The Air Force addressed similar allegations of sexual misconduct at the Air Force Academy nearly a decade ago. Allegations of sexual misconduct are not unique to the Air Force and numerous cases of sexual misconduct involving servicemembers in theater have been reported over the last several years. Many victims and their advocates contend that they were victimized twice: first by attackers in their own ranks and then by unresponsive or inadequate military treatment. Secretary Panetta has recently implemented several new initiatives aimed at curbing sexual assaults in the military and improving victim support.

What is your assessment of the Air Force's implementation of the Secretary's new policies, including his decision to withhold initial disposition authority over certain offenses to the general court-martial convening authority?

Answer. I support the Secretary of Defense's leadership and his decision. Withholding the initial disposition authority at the Special Court Martial Convening authority level reassures airmen that we are taking the issue of sexual assault very seriously.

Question. What is your understanding of the resources and programs the Air Force has in place to provide victims of sexual assaults the medical, psychological, and legal help that they need?

Answer. From initial briefings, it appears to me that the Air Force Military Treatment Facilities (MTFs) have the appropriate resources to offer support to sexual assault victims. Additionally, Air Force forward deployed mental health assets are available to provide necessary consultation, assessment, intervention, and referral for mental health issues, to include support in cases of sexual assault.

The Air Force has also forward deployed judge advocates to provide complete legal support to the Air Force and Joint missions. Legal services available to victims at their home station are equally fully available to victims in deployed locations, to include legal assistance, defense services, victim witness assistance, or other legal needs.

This is an issue I take very seriously, and if confirmed I would make it priority to ensure that adequate resources and programs are available to victims of sexual assault.

Question. What is your view of the steps the Air Force has taken to prevent additional sexual assaults? In your view, are these steps adequate?

Answer. I believe Air Force leadership has made a clear priority of the prevention of sexual assaults and are taking the necessary steps to do so. The Secretary, Chief of Staff and the Chief Master Sergeant of the Air Force recently issued a tri-signature memorandum addressed to every airman that highlighted zero tolerance of sexual assault, the importance of bystander intervention and responsibility for victim care. The Chief of Staff also recently convened a wing commander's call to discuss this topic and directed commanders to conduct a health and welfare inspection of workplaces to ensure a culture of dignity, trust and respect is fostered. If confirmed, it would be a priority of mine to support these steps.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources the Air Force has in place to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault?

Answer. I believe the Air Force has taken significant and effective steps to increase training and provide resources for investigating and responding to allegations of sexual assault. Air Force installation level Sexual Assault Response and Prevention Coordinators (SARCs) and Victim Advocates (VAs) receive extensive initial training before assuming their positions. Additionally, both SARCs and VAs receive annual refresher training.

All Air Force Office of Special Investigations (AFOSI) special agents receive extensive training in the handling of violent crime investigations, including specific handling of sexual assault investigations. In 2009, the Air Force funded 24 additional civilian special agents to focus on sexual offenses at locations with the highest incidence of sexual assault. AFOSI also recently developed a 2-week advanced training course, dedicated exclusively to sexual assault investigations.

The Judge Advocate General is fully committed to aggressively addressing allegations of sexual assault and ensuring that commanders, victims, and accused airmen are appropriately advised on the legal issues. The Air Force is committed to training prosecutors and defense counsel to the highest standards. Base staff judge advocates work closely with the AFOSI special agents to ensure comprehensive investigations. Through the Senior Trial Counsel (STC) program, 16 highly trained and experienced trial counsel assist base legal offices in all aspects of evaluating and preparing sexual assault cases and are detailed to represent the United States as the prosecutor in these cases. Seven of these STCs are dedicated to specializing in prosecution of sexual assault cases. Senior Defense Counsels provide assistance to local defense counsel and representation of accused airmen at trial. The Judge Advocate General believes that fully training and equipping both the prosecution and defense in these cases offers the best hope of optimal fact finding and professionalism in adjudicating sexual assault cases.

Question. Do you consider the Air Force's current sexual assault policies and procedures, particularly those on confidential reporting, to be effective?

Answer. Current Air Force policies and procedures, particularly those on restricted reporting, are effective, available both at home and in deployed locations, and do more than allow victims confidential access to medical care. When coupled with the new victim to victim advocate privilege, the policies address many of the concerns victims have about coming forward and help protect the victims' confidentiality. The policies preserve the possibility of future prosecution by allowing victims to anonymously receive Sexual Assault Forensic Examinations (SAFEs), which are held for 5 years. Victims may convert their confidential restricted report at any time and participate in the military justice process. Restricted reporting allows for the preservation of evidence that would otherwise be unavailable and the Air Force is able to offer victims care and treatment that victims may have not accessed without this confidential option.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of resources in the Air Force to investigate allegations of sexual misconduct and to hold perpetrators accountable for their actions?

Answer. I believe we are well positioned to execute this responsibility. The JAG Corps and AFOSI have developed a robust special victims capability that focuses specifically on teaming to jointly investigate and prosecute sexual assault offenses. For the 24 civilian AFOSI agents and 7 senior trial counsels working these cases, this is their primary mission. The Air Force developed training that JAGs will be attending jointly with AFOSI in fiscal year 2013. These are the Sex Crimes Investigation Training Program at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center and the Advanced Sexual Assault Litigation Course at the Air Force JAG School. AFOSI and JAGs will attend both courses, focusing respectively on the investigation and prosecution stages.

Question. What problems, if any, are you aware of in the manner in which the confidential reporting procedures have been put into effect?

Answer. Sexual assault victims who seek medical care or SAFEs in some States (i.e., California) cannot make a restricted report because State laws mandate reporting to law enforcement by healthcare providers. This limitation creates a "have and have not" reporting situation amongst military victims. However, the Air Force provides the same support and care for the victim whether they filed a restricted or unrestricted report.

Question. What is your view of the appropriate role for senior military and civilian leaders in the Secretariat and the Air staff in overseeing the effectiveness of implementation of new policies relating to sexual assault?

Answer. Senior military and civilian leaders at all levels, beginning at the Secretariat and the Air Staff, must focus on promoting an environment that prevents sexual assault. Eliminating this horrible crime is absolutely critical. The Secretary of the Air Force directed a Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Executive Steering Group (ESG) comprised of all the senior functional stakeholders to continually assess the program and provide advice for improvements in policy and procedures. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary and these leaders to maintain a very clear focus on this issue.

Question. Do you believe that sexual assault continues to be an underreported crime within the Department for the Air Force?

Answer. Sexual assault is the most underreported violent crime in both the military and in American society and so I believe that it continues to be an underreported crime within the Air Force. The Air Force survey commissioned by Gallup on sexual assault also confirmed this view. The Air Force is focused on ways to increase reporting, from enhanced training throughout an airman's career, to unrestricted and restricted reporting options, to a wide range of medical, legal, and functional military services available to airmen who report being a victim of sexual assault.

Question. If so, what are the barriers that discourage or prevent victims from coming forward?

Answer. Shame, fear, stigma, and concern for potential re-victimization continue to be the primary reasons victims do not come forward. To remove these barriers, victims must have confidence in the system and in their leadership to do the right thing. Air Force senior leaders, commanders and senior enlisted are personally involved and their leadership is instrumental to removing these barriers and ensuring victims receive the care and support they deserve. This effort includes the opportunity to request expedited transfers for those filing unrestricted reports, legal assistance for victims, the support of a victim advocate and specially trained investigators who are not a part of the chain of command.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps would you take to remove barriers to reporting sexual assaults?

Answer. First, continued focus on eliminating sexual assaults. Prevention efforts include training and establishing command climates where sexual assaults are not tolerated. Thorough and timely investigation of cases independent of the chain of command provides reassurance to victims. Another important factor is holding perpetrators accountable. Finally, victims who file unrestricted reports are afforded the opportunity to request expedited transfers. This program provides the victim with safety and security which helps remove barriers to reporting.

In order to aid in lessening these barriers, we must continue efforts to remove any perceived negative impact from coming forward after an assault. Allowing members to seek help and open communication with them is essential for leading the way in changing perceptions. Members need to know they will be supported regardless, and that service leadership is resolved to care for airmen.

Question. In response to the Annual Report on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies for Academic Program Year 2011–2012, the Secretary of Defense wrote to the Service Secretaries and the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness stating: "Despite our considerable and ongoing efforts, this year's Annual Report on Sexual Harassment and Violence at the Military Service Academies demonstrates that we have a persistent problem. I am concerned that we have not achieved greater progress in preventing sexual assault and sexual harassment among academy cadets and midshipmen. These crimes and abhorrent behavior are incompatible with the core values we require of our Armed Forces' future officers. A strong and immediate response is needed."

What has the Air Force done to respond to the Secretary of Defense's requirement for a strong and immediate response?

Answer. The Secretary of the Air Force and the Chief of Staff have made this a priority and have stated that the Air Force succeeds because of the professionalism and discipline of its airmen. Sexual assault undermines that professionalism. Each cadet now receives over 12 hours of SAPR education training over the course of four years. Innovative training, to include scenario based programs with subject matter experts, is now a part of the USAFA SAPR curriculum. Additionally, the USAFA is in the process of instituting new initiatives. In April 2013, cadets will be leading the way in developing and running the USAFA's sexual assault awareness month (SAAM) activities and in the fall of 2013, the USAFA plans to institute Cadet Bystander Intervention Training (BIT).

Additionally, in January, an integrated process team, to include members of the USAFA staff, met with subject matter experts and Air Force SAPR program managers to review SAPR training for all new accessions. Based on the recommendations of this group, the Air Force is capturing best practices while instituting standardized core competencies and learning objectives as directed by the Secretary of Defense.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to address the findings contained in this report?

Answer. As the Secretary of Defense states, there is no place in the military for sexual assaults. If confirmed, I would focus on victim care and support, to include legal assistance. Victims should be able to trust their leadership to do the right thing. This includes focused efforts on investigations and prosecutions. This, of course, is on top of the training being implemented currently.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL

Question. What are your views about the responsibility of The Judge Advocate General (TJAG) of the Air Force to provide independent legal advice to the Chief of Staff and Secretary of the Air Force and to the Air Staff, particularly in the areas of military justice and operational law?

Answer. I believe it is critical for the Under Secretary to receive independent legal opinions from his senior uniformed judge advocate. Senior uniformed lawyers bring a wealth of experience and perspective shaped by years of working with commanders in the field. TJAG's ability to provide independent legal advice is statutorily guaranteed and vitally important to Air Force senior leader decisionmaking. Generally, I believe senior leaders are better informed to make the best decisions when they are aware of both The Judge Advocate General's advice and the advice of the Air Force General Counsel.

Question. What are your views about the responsibility of staff judge advocates throughout the Air Force to provide independent legal advice to military commanders in the field and throughout the Air Force?

Answer. Staff Judge Advocates (SJAs) are essential to the proper functioning of both operational and support missions. SJAs have a major responsibility to promote the interests of a command by providing relevant, timely, and independent advice to commanders, and this independence is reflected in statute (title 10, U.S.C., § 8037(f)(2)). Convening authorities are required by statute (title 10, U.S.C., § 806) to communicate with their SJAs on issues related to military justice matters, which is critical to disciplined mission execution. In addition, commanders and other leaders rely on their staff judge advocates for advice on all types of legal and policy matters. SJAs offer legal advice independent of any particular agenda. I believe it is very important for commanders to continue to receive uniformed legal advice.

AIR FORCE END STRENGTH REDUCTIONS AND TRANSITION ASSISTANCE

Question. The National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 established an Active Duty Air Force end strength of 329,460, a reduction of 3,340 airmen from the fiscal year 2012 authorized level. The Air Force has informed the committee that it will achieve this reduction using only voluntary measures, and that transitioning airmen will benefit from a "considerably expanded" Transition Assistance Program (TAP).

Please describe the voluntary measures that will be used to manage the Air Force's personnel reductions in fiscal year 2013, and whether the Air Force envisions using involuntary measures in fiscal year 2014 and beyond.

Answer. The Air Force active component authorized end strength in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 is 329,460, requiring the Air Force to reduce 3,340 airmen from the fiscal year 2012 authorized end strength of 332,800. Should sequestration go into effect and continue beyond 2013, the Air Force corporate process would evaluate and prioritize resources to maintain a balance between people, equipment and available funding. Continued budgetary shortfalls could lead to out-year funding cuts that might drive internal Air Force decisions to decrease force structure, which would undoubtedly lead to further end strength reductions.

The reduction in end strength in fiscal year 2013 alone will require the Air Force to take continued force management actions to reduce the number of airmen serving the Nation while ensuring they maintain a high quality force. To do so, they will continue a multi-year force management strategy of leveraging voluntary programs first, offering incentive programs where needed, and executing involuntary actions only if required. They currently have the full range of legislative authorities necessary to execute a force management program to meet congressionally mandated end strength.

In fiscal year 2013 enlisted airmen in non-critical overage Air Force Specialty Codes will be offered time-in-grade, Active Duty service commitment, and enlistment contract waivers. They will also continue the expanded Palace Chase program. The Air Force also implemented the Temporary Early Retirement Authority for a second year, Date of Separation Rollbacks, reduced accessions, initial skills training separations and Career Job Reservation constraints.

For officers, the Air Force expects no involuntary separations for fiscal year 2013 other than a limited number of initial skills training separations for officers. Voluntary programs will include time-in-grade, Active Duty service commitment, and 10 versus 8 years of commissioned service waivers for certain year groups and overage career fields. They will also continue the Palace Chase program for eligible lieutenant colonels and below. Additionally, they will be offering the Temporary Early Retirement Authority program and the Voluntary Retirement Incentive program to the officer force in fiscal year 2013.

For fiscal year 2014, the Air Force expects similar force management programs, but may include involuntary Selective Early Retirement Boards. However, given the current set of fiscal challenges and the uncertainty sequestration presents, I would continue to assess the need to pursue additional voluntary and involuntary force management authority actions to meet reassessed authorized end strength levels in fiscal year 2014 and beyond as approved by Congress and the Secretary of the Air Force.

Question. Please describe the new TAP program and how it will help airmen transition back into civilian society during this period of unstable economic conditions.

Answer. The Departments of Defense, Veterans Affairs and Labor launched a redesigned Transition Assistance Program (TAP) effective 21 November 2012 to better prepare airmen for the transition to civilian life. The redesigned TAP is focused on reducing veteran unemployment levels which are 2 percent higher than the rest of the population and aims to bolster and standardize the transition support that airmen across the Armed Forces receive prior to separating or retiring from the Air Force in order to make them as employment ready as possible.

The Veterans Opportunity to Work (VOW) Act of 2011 and the Veterans Employment Initiative (VEI) drove the new legislated TAP requirements to expand training and employment services for Active and Reserve component members who transition from the Air Force.

DOD and its agency partners work closely with approximately 85 Air Force Installations (to include 2 Guard and 1 Reserve training hub), to coordinate delivery of transition services included in the redesigned TAP.

TAP has been redesigned as a comprehensive, mandatory program that includes pre-separation counseling, a military to civilian skills review, VA benefits briefings, financial planning support, job search skills building, and an individual transition plan (ITP) preparation which will aid in a successful transition into a "career ready" civilian. The program will be renamed "Transition GPS (Goals, Plans, Success)".

The new program features a 5-day workshop with further "optional" training tracks (Higher Education, Technical Training, and Entrepreneurship taught by the Small Business Admin) in addition to extensive one-on-one counseling.

The "target population" of airmen who may need a higher level of support during their transition process has been defined as: (1) young airmen (18–24 years old); (2) those completing their first term of enlistment; (3) members involuntarily separated due to force reshaping; and (4) those separating rapidly.

Eligible Reserve component airmen are also mandated to actively participate in the redesigned Transition Assistance Program. Eligibility includes all members of the Guard and Reserve who are separating after serving more than 180 days of continuous Active Duty.

Spouses are encouraged to participate with the airman in all facets of the redesigned program.

The Air Force is aggressively rolling out the redesigned TAP program to assist transitioning airmen with becoming as competitive as possible in civilian society during this period of unstable economic conditions.

PERSONNEL AND ENTITLEMENT COSTS

Question. Military personnel costs, including health care, compensation, and retirement continue to soar and are becoming an ever increasing portion of the DOD and Air Force budgets.

What actions do you believe can be taken to control the rise in personnel costs and entitlement spending?

Answer. Military compensation is, and must remain, competitive to sustain the recruitment and retention of high caliber men and women to meet readiness requirements and accomplish our national security mission. If confirmed, I will remain committed to this goal. However, in light of the current economic crisis and overall reductions in defense spending, we must look at balancing personnel costs to avoid reductions to force structure and modernization efforts critical to the support of the warfighter and the defense of our Nation. I look at management of force structure as being a key element in controlling personnel costs. If confirmed, I will ensure that the Air Force continues to make difficult, but fiscally responsible decisions to implement force management programs that allow us to remain at authorized end strength levels. Additionally, I will pursue legislative and policy changes needed to ensure that the Air Force is able to operate as a total force with the most effective use of resources.

Question. What is your assessment of the Air Force's use of military bonuses in both the Active and Reserve components?

Answer. The bonus programs are among the most flexible and responsive force management tools to retain airmen in critical fields with high ops demand and low manning such as special operations, explosive ordnance, aircrew, intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance, RPA pilots and health professions. Although overall retention remains high, bonuses are necessary to target these critical skills for current health and as an investment in emerging missions. If confirmed, I would work to ensure that we are using bonuses only where necessary to maintain the proper force structure and skill sets.

Question. What is your assessment of the Air Force's use of aviation career incentive pay or assignment incentive pay for unmanned aerial systems operators, both those who are rated pilots and those who are not?

Answer. Aviation career incentive pays are an important compensation tool used to motivate and retain aviators operating manned and remotely piloted aircraft. As the demand for remotely piloted aircraft continues to grow, we will continue to rely on monthly incentive pays to attract officers and enlisted personnel who not only possess a unique skill set, but who work under challenging conditions to provide the Nation with an unparalleled combat capability. If confirmed, I will ensure that we continue to periodically review the efficacy of all aviation pays and bonuses to ensure we are fiscally responsible.

SEQUESTRATION

Question. What would be the impact on the Air Force if sequestration were to take effect on March 1, 2013, as currently required by law?

Answer. The Air Force would not be able to eliminate the adverse impacts of sequestration to readiness or modernization or even substantially mitigate them. If triggered, the Air Force would ramp down spending while protecting wartime and readiness accounts for as long as possible. Additional programs would need to be restructured, reduced and/or terminated. The effects of sequestration would cause great harm to national security, both by the size of the reductions and the across-the-board nature of the implementation of those reductions. If triggered, the Air Force will also begin the deliberate programming process of prioritizing programs ensuring we continue to strive to meet the DOD Strategic Guidance.

Question. What would be the specific impact on Air Force civilian and military personnel; on family programs; on morale, welfare and recreation programs; and on the delivery of health care to airmen, their families, and retirees?

Answer. The Military Personnel Appropriation has been exempted from sequestration. Any civilian personnel actions taken would be based on specific guidance from OSD.

SUICIDE PREVENTION

Question. The number of suicides in the total Air Force continues to be of concern to the Committee.

If confirmed, what role would you play in shaping suicide prevention programs and policies for the Air Force, the Air National Guard, and the Air Force Reserve, to prevent suicides and increase the resiliency of airmen and their families?

Answer. Engaged leaders and communities are the key to suicide prevention. Although lower than comparable civilian rates, the Air Force's total force suicide rate has seen a slow but very concerning rise in the last several years. It is now at just under 16 per hundred thousand per year, and I am greatly concerned that we still lose about 50 active duty airmen per year from suicide. Fortunately the Air Force has an effective program in place—one that is continually improving, targeting career fields at higher risk. The Air Force Suicide Prevention Program is a community-based approach that fosters a Wingman culture organized under commander-led committees of installation helping agencies. The program is composed of 11 elements of community and command involvement. Research shows that the Air Force suicide rate is lower when these 11 elements are fully engaged. This year, the Air Force is improving the annual self-assessment of those elements.

The Air National Guard and Reserve Command airmen's suicide rates have been similar to those of active duty Air Force. Although not all Reserve component airmen are in contact with their units as regularly as those on Active Duty, their leaders have, and will continue to be fully engaged in their lives—there for them and their families when they are in crisis. Like the Active Duty units, the Air National Guard and Reserve Command both utilize these elements of the prevention program. In concert with supervisors, chaplains, and community resources, wing and regional directors of psychological health work to get these airmen the help they need in crisis.

FAMILY SUPPORT

Question. Military members and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of growing concerns among military families as a result of the stress of frequent deployments and the long separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for Air Force personnel and their families, and, if confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. I understand that a primary concern for airmen and their family members is their ability to do the mission and simultaneously support their families. Specific areas of concern include access to quality specialized child care and education. Also, for those transitioning to the civilian sector, military members are concerned about being prepared for employment and/or continuing their education. Families are concerned about the civilian spouse finding employment as they relocate from installation to installation.

I am aware there are DOD and Air Force programs that address these issues, such as the Transition Assistance Program (TAP), which has been recently enhanced by the Veteran Opportunity to Work Act of 2011. If confirmed, I will ensure a thorough review of all available resources to support valuable family programs.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. I understand the Airman and Family Readiness Centers serve as a resource hub for Air Force families prior—to, during, and following deployments. The deployment programs the Airman and Family Readiness Center have in place for the airmen and family members are crucial in supporting the mission. DOD has funded valuable resources in Military Family Life Consultants that work in Air Force Family Support Programs to deal with family and life issues, child behavioral issues and school transition issues. I will ensure the Air Force programs are adequately supported with this valuable resource.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to active duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

The Air Force is a total force, and provides resources and support to all components through various Airman and Family and Child and Youth programs. These support programs are sustained through continued collaboration with the State Joint Base Board and other services.

Geographically separated servicemembers (and their families) have immediate access to many resources online that enable them to remain connected to their units and support services.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to enhance family support?

Answer. I will review current manpower and staffing for family programs. In keeping with current White House directives, I will support programs that enhance mission readiness.

I would like to see sufficient staffing and training for family readiness staff as we partner with community organizations to continue building support for airmen and their families.

MORALE, WELFARE, AND RECREATION

Question. Morale, Welfare, and Recreation (MWR) programs are critical to enhancement of military life for members and their families, especially in light of frequent and lengthy deployments. These programs must be relevant and attractive to all eligible users, including Active Duty and Reserve personnel members and families assigned overseas, and personnel deployed in support of military training and operations.

What challenges do you foresee in sustaining Air Force MWR programs, and, if confirmed, what improvements would you seek to achieve?

Answer. MWR programs exist to provide Quality of Life (QOL) programs and services to airmen and their family members. There is a recognized correlation between QOL, readiness, and resilience, particularly in light of frequent and lengthy deployments.

A top priority for the Air Force is to develop and care for airmen. I don't foresee any change to that focus. The Air Force's MWR programs are currently undergoing an enterprise-wide transformation to right-size and ensure their currency and relevancy for airmen and their families.

Without a doubt, MWR programs and services for military members and their families are critical to Air Force readiness and mission capability. As the Air Force advances MWR transformation, I will advocate for the Air Force to seek partnership opportunities with local communities to help ensure they provide the best support possible for the Air Force while embracing efficiencies and innovative ways of doing business.

If confirmed, I will fully support the ongoing MWR transformation efforts to be a model of innovation, efficiency, and resource stewardship, geared toward meeting the needs of airmen and families now and in the future.

BALANCE BETWEEN CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AND CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEES

Question. In recent years, the Air Force and the Department of Defense have become increasingly reliant on services provided by contractors. In many cases, contractor employees work in the same offices, serve on the same projects and task forces, and perform many of the same functions as Federal employees.

Do you believe that the current balance between civilian employees and contractor employees is in the best interests of the Air Force and the Department of Defense?

Answer. I believe we must continue to ensure that inherently governmental functions are not outsourced and scrutinize those areas where the distinction is blurred, and could result in the potential for wasteful spending. If confirmed, I will work with the Secretary of the Air Force and leaders across the Air Force to assess this matter to ensure compliance with the law and with the President's policy. I believe there is a great deal to do in this area, and will bring lessons learned from the Department of the Navy, where we have made a substantial and successful effort to better shape the balance between the civilian and contractor workforce.

Question. In your view, has the Air Force become too reliant on contractors to perform its basic functions?

Answer. The Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) and title 10, U.S.C., section 129, restrict the use of personal services contracts. I believe these regulations best serve the interests of the Air Force. If confirmed, I would continue to work with the Secretary of the Air Force and leaders across the Air Force to ensure compliance with applicable law and policy.

I agree with the view expressed in President Obama's March 4, 2009 memorandum on government contracting, that states excessive reliance by executive agencies on sole-source contracts create a risk where taxpayer funds could be inefficiently spent and otherwise not service the needs of the Federal Government. I would work with the Secretary of the Air Force and leaders across the Air Force to assess this matter to ensure compliance with the law and with the President's policy. I believe there is a great deal to do in this area, and will bring lessons learned from the Department of the Navy, where we have made a substantial and successful effort to better shape the balance between the civilian and contractor workforce.

Question. Do you believe that the current extensive use of personal services contracts is in the best interest of the Air Force?

Answer. The Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) and title 10, U.S.C., section 129, restricts the use of personal services contracts. I believe these regulations best serve the interests of the Air Force. If confirmed, I would continue to work with the Secretary of the Air Force and leaders across the Air Force to ensure compliance with applicable law and policy. I believe there is a great deal to do in this area, and will bring lessons learned from the Department of the Navy, where we have made a substantial and successful effort to better shape the balance between the civilian and contractor workforce.

Question. Do you believe that the Air Force and the Department of Defense should undertake a comprehensive reappraisal of "inherently governmental functions" and other critical government functions, and how they are performed?

Answer. The Department's "sourcing" of functions and work between military and civilians, or through contracted services, must be consistent with workload requirements, funding availability, readiness and management needs, as well as applicable laws and statutes. Consistent with existing statutory requirements (such as FAIR Act and title 10, U.S.C., section 2330a), and the total force mix of military, civilian, and contracted support, I believe the Air Force should pursue a mitigation of risk and the appropriate consideration of costs. Even during this period of constrained defense budgets, the Air Force should ensure that military or Federal civilians are performing all inherently governmental jobs, and that sufficient levels of civilians are available to perform critical oversight, management, and readiness functions of the Air Force. I do not believe a comprehensive review of "inherently governmental functions" is necessary, but I do believe more rigorous oversight where we apply contracted services is necessary across the Department.

Question. If confirmed, will you work with other appropriate officials in the Department of Defense to address these issues?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to collaborate with other Air Force officials to ensure these matters are addressed in the best interest of the Air Force and the Department of Defense.

Question. Section 955 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 requires a 5 percent reduction in anticipated funding levels for the civilian personnel workforce and the service contractor workforce of the Department of Defense, subject to certain exclusions.

What impact do you expect the implementation of section 955 to have on the programs and operations of the Air Force?

Answer. Based on the Air Force's understanding of section 955's requirement for DOD to reduce at least the same percentage reduction in anticipated funding levels for the civilian personnel workforce and service contractors as compared to reductions in military pay levels, and contingent on receipt of DOD's efficiencies plan, the Air Force is working the following actions:

Civilian—The Air Force, as part of a larger OSD-led effort, conducted a comprehensive review of capabilities performed by its civilian workforce. During the course of this review, the Air Force identified areas where it could most prudently accept risk, while still being able to accomplish its mission. The result of this analysis led to a 2.8 percent reduction to Air Force civilian manpower over the next five years, exceeding the 2.3 percent reduction to Air Force military manpower over the same time period.

Contractor—The Air Force, as part of the OSD led Limitation on Aggregate Annual Amount Available for Contracted Services (section 808 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012), has worked to ensure that contract obligations for fiscal year 2012 and fiscal year 2013 remain at, or are lower than, what was requested for contracted services in the fiscal year 2010 President's budget. This, coupled with previously identified service contract efficiencies (Knowledge Based Services, Advisory Studies, Service Support Contractors, and Program Mission Augmentation), should meet the intent of section 955.

Question. What steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that section 955 is implemented in a manner that is consistent with the requirements of section 129a of title 10, U.S.C., for determining the most appropriate and cost-efficient mix of military, civilian, and service contractor personnel to perform Air Force missions?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure the Air Force sufficiently determines the most appropriate and cost-effective mix of military, civilian, and contracted services by reviewing the performance of functions identified as core or critical to the mission of the department, consistent with the workload analysis and risk assessment required by sections 129 and 129a of title 10.

Question. What processes will you put in place, if confirmed, to ensure that the Air Force implements a sound planning process for carrying out the requirements of section 955, including the implementation of the exclusion authority in section 955(c)?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work within the Air Force to put a process in place to determine core or critical requirements that considers critical occupations in the Acquisition Workforce Plan, personnel employed at facilities that provide core logistics capabilities, medical services, and maintenance and repair of military equipment. Civilian personnel workforce or service contractor workforce performing other critical functions may be identified as requiring exemptions or exclusion authority in the interest of the national defense.

Question. Section 808 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 requires the Department of Defense to implement a freeze on spending for contract services, comparable to the freeze on civilian personnel required by the efficiencies initiatives.

What is your understanding of the impact that the freeze on spending for contract services has had on the Air Force?

Answer. I understand the Air Force began aggressively reducing spending on contracted services in fiscal year 2009 and continues while ensuring continued mission capability. Decisionmakers must balance acceptable risk and available budgets to ensure future mission capability as the reductions are made.

Specific to fiscal year 2012 and fiscal year 2013, the period covered by the NDAA, my understanding is the limitation is a broad brush that puts an overall ceiling on not only management support contracts, but also other mission critical contracts such as Weapon System Sustainment, Ranges, and Critical Infrastructure. If the limitation is so broad that it encompasses all contracts, there may be unintended consequences.

Question. What is your understanding of Air Force plans for spending for contract services over the next 5 years?

Answer. The Air Force will continue to make tough decisions on spending cuts. Air Force leaders must balance impacts to mission capability with the need for reducing spending. I believe additional emphasis on market research is critical for us to fully understand the industrial base and that we effectively use competition as a forcing function to reduce the services spend, while not sacrificing mission accomplishment.

Question. What is your view on the feasibility and advisability of further reductions in spending for contract services over the next 5 years?

Answer. Budget cuts must be made carefully and with full understanding of the accepted risks and impacts to mission capability. I believe further reductions are necessary, but should be applied tactically as a result of the analysis of risks to mission capability and effectiveness.

LEGISLATIVE FELLOWS PROGRAM

Question. Each year, the Services assign mid-career officers to the offices of Members of Congress under the Legislative Fellows Program. Upon completion of their legislative fellowships, officers are supposed to be assigned to follow-on positions in their services in which they effectively use the experience and knowledge they gained during their fellowships.

What is your assessment of the value of the Legislative Fellows Program to the Air Force and to the career development of the officers involved?

Answer. I strongly support the Legislative Fellows program and very much appreciate the continued support we get from Members of Congress for the program. It provides mid-career officers, civilians, and now senior noncommissioned officers, a valuable learning experience. The program exposes top-tier Air Force officers, civilians and senior noncommissioned officers to the inner workings of the legislative process. Additionally, the relationships they form with civilian leaders and their staffs in Congress benefit both the fellow and the Air Force by enhancing open dialogue and communication between the Air Force and Congress.

Question. What is your assessment of the Air Force's utilization of officers who have served as legislative fellows?

Answer. My understanding is that the Air Force makes every effort to assign them to follow-on positions which use their legislative experience. Most fellows who are not immediately assigned to a legislative-related position are selected for command and use their legislative experience in that capacity and later in their career. If confirmed, I will continue to emphasize appropriate follow-on assignments which maximize the skills developed during their time on the Hill.

MANAGEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SENIOR EXECUTIVE SERVICE (SES)

Question. The transformation of the Armed Forces has brought with it an increasing realization of the importance of efficient and forward thinking management by senior executives.

What is your vision for the management and development of the Air Force senior executive workforce, especially in the critically important areas of acquisition, financial management, and the scientific and technical fields?

Answer. I believe that the members of the Senior Executive Service are an integral and critical component to the continued success of these vital career fields. As I understand it, the Air Force manages their Senior Executive Service workforce through a comprehensive and strategic corporate approach. The Air Force's deliberate lifecycle management of their executive cadre facilitates their recruitment, development, compensation, succession planning and retention. From what I have seen, the Air Force is particularly effective at making sure its senior civilian leaders have a healthy balance of experience inside and outside of the Air Force headquarters. If confirmed, I will continue to support this approach.

Question. Over the last 10 years, the Air Force budget has almost doubled, but the number of senior executives in the Department of the Air Force has remained almost unchanged.

Do you believe that the Air Force has the number of senior executives it needs, with the proper skills to manage the Department into the future?

Answer. I have not yet had the opportunity to review the number of Air Force senior executives and their associated proficiency levels in critical competencies. If confirmed, I will look into the issue.

REMOTELY PILOTED AIRCRAFT PILOT PROMOTION AND EDUCATION

Question. S. 3254, the Senate Armed Services Committee's version of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, as reported out by the committee, included a provision that would require a report from the Secretary of the Air Force and the Chief of Staff on the promotion rates and educational and training opportunities for pilots of remotely piloted aircraft (RPA). The report would need to explain the causes for the persistently lower rates of promotion and education over the last 5 years, the impact of these trends, and the Air Force's plans to take corrective action.

Are you familiar with the adverse trends in RPA pilot promotion and education rates?

Answer. Yes, I am familiar with these issues and understand the Air Force has initiatives in place to improve the health of the RPA career field as they continue to aggressively monitor progress. The Air Force has addressed the below Air Force average promotions (11–19 percent behind the Air Force average) and completion of Advanced Academic Degrees and Professional Military Education (PME) by improving in-residence opportunities and promotion board packages that address the RPA community's unique challenges.

Question. Do you share the committee's concerns about these trends?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will keep RPA a key focus area as we continue to grow this capability that is instrumental in our current and future success as the world's dominant air power.

Question. How would you expect to contribute to fixing this problem?

Answer. If confirmed, I will keep my finger on the pulse of the RPA community through functional, operational and resource management leadership. I will ensure current plans in place, aimed at leveling promotion and educational opportunities through targeted messaging, improved resourcing, and focused retention strategies, have the desired impacts and take swift action if they prove to be ineffective. With such a critically important career field, the Air Force must get it right at the beginning and build not just a population that is effective now, but one that is competitive, sustainable, and razor-sharp in the execution of their duties in the years ahead.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Under Secretary of the Air Force?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate Committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

EGLIN TEST MISSION

1. Senator NELSON. Mr. Fanning, in 2011, the Air Force announced a reorganization of the Air Force Materiel Command (AFMC) and aimed to reduce overhead costs and redundant layers of staff. The NDAA for fiscal year 2013 included an amendment which required AFMC to submit an assessment of the efficiencies and effectiveness associated with this reorganization. Will you commit to keeping a close eye on the recent efficiencies initiatives at AFMC started by General Wolfenbarger, as well as to visit Eglin Air Force Base to see the test mission first hand?

Mr. FANNING. Yes. If confirmed as the Under Secretary of the Air Force, one of my primary focus areas will be to ensure the Air Force is structured properly, with the ability to respond to the warfighters' needs as quickly and efficiently as possible. Given the current fiscal realities the Department faces now and in the future, we must make every effort to streamline and eliminate redundant layers of overhead, at all levels. This is precisely the intent of the Air Force Materiel Command (AFMC) reorganization.

The reorganization eliminated over 1,000 civilian positions, and is expected to generate at least $100 million in annual savings, while concurrently reshaping the Command to align each major mission area under one center commander. Additionally, AFMC's efforts reduced the number of direct reports from 12 to 5. Since it was implemented on 1 October 2012, it is well on its way to full operational capability later this year.

With regard to visiting Eglin Air Force Base, I absolutely commit to visiting the base as soon as my schedule allows. I am anxious to see the test mission and the other aspects of the Air Force mission resident at this location.

KC–46A TANKER

2. Senator NELSON. Mr. Fanning, on January 9, 2013, the Air Force released the initial round of basing for the new tanker, the KC–46A. The top four bases under consideration are located in the center of the country, as well as the west coast. U.S. Southern Command (SOUTHCOM) leads the counterdrug mission and, every year, drug interdiction on the high seas accounts for the removal of 200 tons of cocaine from the U.S. supply, which is 10 times that which is removed by U.S. law enforcement. I do not believe SOUTHCOM was consulted when considering the first round of basing for the KC–46A and deserves consideration. Would you commit to looking at the requirements of SOUTHCOM for the next round of basing decisions for the KC–46?

Mr. FANNING. Yes. As I understand it, the combatant commands (COCOMs) identify their air refueling requirements to the Air Force through various Joint strategic planning efforts. In turn, the Air Force's strategic basing process provides a methodology whereby basing decisions are consistent with Air Force operational requirements which are designed to meet the combatant commanders' needs. If confirmed, I will ensure that these requirements, including those of SOUTHCOM, are considered as part of the basing decisions.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

SEXUAL ASSAULT

3. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Fanning, DOD under former Secretary Panetta's leadership, implemented a number of initiatives to try to curb sexual assaults in the military—a problem he stated could be six times greater than reported—and we have seen both military and civilian leaders acknowledge that sexual assault is a problem that affects the recruitment, retention, and readiness of our Armed Forces. This committee has taken up the issue of sexual violence in the military and has implemented some reforms in the National Defense Authorization Act, most recently in fiscal year 2013.

In the advance policy questions you were asked: what are the barriers that discourage or prevent victims from coming forward and what additional steps would you take to remove barriers to reporting sexual assaults? You responded, "Shame, fear, stigma, and concern for potential revictimization continue to be the primary reasons victims do not come forward. To remove these barriers, victims must have confidence in the system and in their leadership to do the right thing. Air Force senior leaders, commanders, and senior enlisted are personally involved and their leadership is instrumental to removing these barriers and ensuring victims receive the care and support they deserve." You also said, "Another important factor is holding perpetrators accountable." Yet last week, an officer convicted only 4 months ago of aggravated sexual assault by a jury of officers had all the charges dismissed by the convening authority, Lieutenant General Craig Franklin, and he has been reinstated.

Lieutenant General Franklin's decision to dismiss the charges sends a message to every member of the Air Force that if they are a survivor of sexual assault they might not find justice in the military justice system. If confirmed, how will you, as a senior civilian leader in the Air Force, help restore confidence to the members of the Air Force after this incident?

Mr. FANNING. Sexual assault is a crime and a matter of serious and continuing concern; eliminating sexual assault in the military is a high priority for the Air Force leadership. If confirmed, I will work closely with Air Force leaders, as well as outside experts, to ensure our sexual assault prevention and response programs are the best available—we have a responsibility to all airmen to make this so. This will be a priority of mine, and something I would speak out about at every appropriate opportunity.

I continue to believe shame, fear, stigma, and concern for potential re-victimization are the primary reasons victims do not come forward and that to remove these barriers, Air Force leadership must be personally involved. Creating an environment where all Airmen understand this crime has no place in the Air Force is a vital step in building confidence in the military justice system. In December 2012, the Chief of Staff met with all Air Force wing commanders and stressed the importance of their leadership in tackling this problem. This was followed by an Air Force-wide inspection conducted to assess and adjust the command climate across the Air Force.

Further, victims must be encouraged to report this crime and be fully supported when they do. The Air Force's newly established Special Victim's Counsel Program is an example of the importance Air Force leaders place on victim support. By providing victims of sexual assault with their own specially trained, independent military attorney, victims now have someone to specifically help them navigate the investigatory and adjudicatory phases of a case. I believe this will have a profound impact on reducing barriers victims currently face.

If confirmed, I would closely monitor Air Force effects to ensure they were making the necessary progress and to look for additional measures we could take to accelerate progress.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ANGUS S. KING, JR.

AIR FORCE TANKER PROGRAM

4. Senator KING. Mr. Fanning, if you are confirmed and once you assume your duties as Under Secretary of the Air Force, I would like for you to provide information on the Air Force's plans for sustaining its air refueling capabilities in the future. I would like to see included in this information an explanation for how the initial 179 KC–46A aircraft will be fielded, and the follow-on plans for replacing the remainder of the KC–135 fleet. I would also like the Air Force's assessment of the role the 101st Aerial Refueling Wing (ARW) at Bangor, ME, will play in the future, and the earliest the 101st ARW could be in line to field new aircraft, including the KC–46A.

Mr. FANNING. If confirmed, it will be an early priority of mine to better understand the Air Force's Strategic Basing process so as to have more fidelity into the initial KC–46A basing actions. I commit to providing answers to these questions at the earliest opportunity.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

EFFICIENCIES

5. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, for years DOD has embarked on several efficiency campaigns. Both Secretaries Gates and Panetta have included efficiency initiatives as part of the President's budget submission. Do you believe DOD has adequate tools to track efficiencies?

Mr. FANNING. Yes. Efficiency initiatives are routinely tracked by the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) Comptroller and DCMO, who report then to the Deputy Secretary of Defense in his role as Chief Management Officer of the Department of Defense (DOD). In my role as DUSN/DCMO, I have had responsibility for Department of the Navy efficiency initiatives. Working closely on these efforts with the Army and Air Force has led me to believe that the Air Force has a strong process in place and adequately resources their tracking mechanism. If confirmed, I will take a closer look to make sure my initial impressions are justified.

The work we are doing across the Services in the area of achieving clean audit, as well as the work directed by the OSD Comptroller on Standard Lines of Accounting, will certainly help improve the quality of data we have to understand, control and reduce the cost of business operations.

6. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, how successful has DOD been in realizing the efficiencies already assumed in previous budget requests?

Mr. FANNING. From my assessment, DOD overall has been largely successful in realizing the efficiencies already assumed in previous budget requests. Specifically in the Air Force, a $33 billion efficiency objective was set in the initial round of efficiency targets. The Air Force is currently managing and tracking $43 billion in efficiencies from fiscal year 2012 to fiscal year 2017. The first year of Service-established targets was 2012 and the Air Force recorded savings of over $6 billion against a target of $4.8 billion. Included in the 2012 efficiency savings are reductions of ~16.5 thousand civilian positions with ~19.9 thousand removed by 2016. However, some of the more difficult efficiencies were booked in the out years and will require continued and concerted leadership attention to achieve.

7. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, what lessons have you learned in the assumptions used in taking efficiencies?

Mr. FANNING. There have been many lessons learned from the efficiencies. First and foremost, many of the assumptions made in taking efficiencies failed fully to take into account the priorities of external stakeholders, to include local communities and congressional priorities.

Second, in reducing the size of organizations, we often assume that the targeted organizations will identify mission to cut. We have learned that it is very hard for organizations themselves to identify this mission. It requires sustained leadership involvement to direct what mission is no longer a priority, and to work with relevant stakeholders to eliminate the requirement for that mission.

Finally, leadership must stay involved long after the efficiencies are booked. It requires oversight to ensure that cuts do not grow back and that the hard work of actually achieving the efficiencies is not replaced by components offering offsets in their place.

ACQUISITION REFORM

8. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, for the past several years, the Chiefs of the individual Services have repeatedly stated requirements creep is one of the major factors creating increased costs and delays in the acquisition of weapon systems. Specifically, additional capability requirements continue to be added during the development of weapons systems. Among other difficulties created by additional requirements is the redesign, and even rebuilding, of weapons systems. These concerns continue despite the fact the Joint Requirement Oversight Council must approve of any requirements changes. Therefore, what additional steps is DOD using to ensure requirements creep is reduced and to reform the Joint Capabilities Integration Development System?

Mr. FANNING. The Air Force has implemented several acquisition and requirements initiatives focused on controlling both requirements creep and program costs. As a result, the Air Force implemented a deliberate effort to reduce the number of mandatory key performance parameters (KPPs), limit requirements objectives, better translate capability requirements into system specifications, and improve oversight of cost and schedule drivers at key program reviews.

The data shows that the number of KPPs has trended down since 2009. KPPs averaged 6.1 per program in 2009 and 4.6 per program in 2012. To further control potential program cost growth and requirements creep, the Air Force implemented Headquarters Air Force guidance that limits use of objective values in all Air Force requirements documents.

Requirements creep oftentimes occurs during the translation of operational capability requirements into derived system level requirements or specifications. To ensure system requirements documents (SRD) are accurate, the Air Force directed requirements sponsors to work with the program offices and provide formal coordination on generated SRD. The Air Force is also conducting an earlier and more robust cross-functional review of operational and derived requirements to inform the acquisition strategy prior to release of the final Request for Proposals.

Finally, the Air Force Configuration Steering Board (CSB) process is undergoing enhancements to ensure senior leadership reviews requirements cost drivers and affordability impacts at CSB reviews. Although CSB reviews are not part of the formal requirements process, they include mandatory representation from requirements and acquisition stakeholders to stimulate informed discussions on how requirements impact program cost and schedule.

CIVILIAN FURLOUGHS UNDER SEQUESTRATION

9. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, under sequestration, DOD will furlough civilian personnel for 22 days through the end of this fiscal year. Employees will suffer an 8 percent pay cut, and many of them will have a hard time making ends meet. We know that 86 percent of appropriated fund employees reside outside of the Washington, DC area. Most States will be affected by the furloughs. In Oklahoma, almost 24,000 civilian employees will be furloughed under sequestration. Many of them are Air Force civilians. DOD estimates it will cost those employees in my State approximately $129 million. If sequestration occurs, what will the Air Force do to minimize the impact on civilian employees?

Mr. FANNING. Due to the reality of sequestration, the Air Force immediately took actions to significantly slow spending in order to operate within mandated budget limitations. As a last resort, DOD elected to implement furlough. By scheduling furlough days in a discontinuous manner, the 14 days are spread throughout the remainder of the fiscal year to mitigate the financial impact to the civilian workforce. In spreading the furlough to roughly 1 day a week, civilians are ensured of earning at least 80 percent of their pre-deduction pay during the furlough period, which reduces the impact on valuable medical coverage, life insurance, and long-term care insurance coverage.

The Air Force also ensured any sequestration actions taken were not permanent and potentially reversible in the event the crisis suddenly ends. Implementing furlough in a discontinuous manner allows flexibility if the budget impasse is resolved, in which case the Air Force could immediately cease with any remaining furloughs in fiscal year 2013.

10. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, does the Air Force have stress reduction programs in place to help civilian employees get through these difficult times?

Mr. FANNING. The Air Force is fully committed to supporting civilian employees during these difficult times, and we have several programs at their disposal. To the maximum extent possible, Air Force medical mental health professionals will be available to provide stress management and reduction programs to our civilian airmen on a space-available basis. Additionally, Air Force Airman and Family Readiness Centers provide wellness programs for Airmen, to include civilians and their family members. Each Air Force base has an Employee Assistance Program with capacity to help our employees through this difficult time. Air Force civilian employees may also request to receive assistance from the Federal Employee Education and Assistance Fund. Finally, many civilian employees are members of the Guard or Reserve or are retired servicemembers, and may be eligible to request additional support from the Air Force Aid Society.

If confirmed, I will remain committed to providing every possible avenue for support to civilian Airmen affected by furlough and will share those options with them as quickly as possible. However, I also realize support programs may not fully compensate them for the lost income from 22 days of without pay. Therefore, the Air Force must encourage civilian employees to plan now for the potential reduction of income. Official notification of any furloughs would come through their chain of command.

AGING FLEET OF AIRCRAFT

11. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, our Air Force has been continuously engaged in combat operations for over 2 decades. It is operating the oldest fleet of aircraft in its history:

- Air Force bombers—35 years old on average;
- Air Force fighters—28 years old on average;
- Surveillance aircraft—over 30 years old on average; and
- Transport and tanker aircraft—over 40 years old on average with tankers projected to be 70–80 years old before they are retired.

Given the projected defense budgets, that fleet will continue to age. What are your concerns about this aging fleet and decreasing budgets?

Mr. FANNING. Given the outlook for future defense budgets, the biggest concerns associated with the Air Force's aging aircraft are keeping them operationally viable given advanced capabilities already demonstrated by potential adversaries and the increasing costs associated with maintaining them. Both of these absorb available funding that could otherwise be used to fund programs with more direct readiness impact, such as flying hours and training ranges. These factors, coupled with over 2 decades of ongoing operations and the resulting reduced training opportunities, have led to a steady decline in full spectrum mission readiness. The ability of the Air Force to continue to modernize and recapitalize capabilities is critical to maintaining its ability to meet Defense Strategic Guidance, particularly in highly contested environments.

12. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, what is the impact of sustaining aging equipment on our ability to procure new equipment?

Mr. FANNING. Every year the Air Force must carefully balance its funding between sustaining aging equipment and investing in new equipment. This period of fiscal constraint makes the attempt to balance sustainment and investment even more difficult. As the Air Force defers investments in new equipment, and as sustainment costs for older equipment increase, the competition for equipment recapitalization resources intensifies.

13. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, do you think we have reached the point with any of our current equipment that the business case analysis recommends we procure new equipment but, due to a lack of funds, we are forced to sustain the existing equipment?

Mr. FANNING. Yes, I believe that for some of our equipment, we may have reached the point where the business case analysis justifies replacement, but funding constraints force us to sustain the legacy system in lieu of modernizing. Where this is the case, we run the risk of a "death spiral" where operating and support costs continue to rise, crowding out opportunities to modernize. However, recapitalization decisions are complex and new equipment does not always cost less to sustain. Therefore, every recapitalization decision should be carefully evaluated using sound business case analysis that fully considers life cycle cost (investment, operations, and support) and capability.

14. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Fanning, what impact will the Air Force's inability to develop and procure new aircraft have on its readiness 10 years from now?

Mr. FANNING. The Air Force's legacy fleet will continue to become more expensive to maintain as it approaches and exceeds programmed life expectancy, likely causing reduced aircraft availability for both training and operational use. Further, many of the aircraft in the Air Force inventory today have reached the point where further technological upgrades will provide only minimal improvement against current threats and leave them ill-equipped for future combat environments.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

F–35 JOINT STRIKE FIGHTER

15. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Fanning, the F–35 Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) has experienced several delays in its acquisition process. The F–16, one of the more successful air platforms, was fraught with engineering delays as well. DOD has spent massive amounts of funding on the program and it is an essential piece for our military dominance in the future. As we approach the next phase of defense strategy with the shift to the Asia-Pacific and increased tensions in historical hot spots, it is imperative that we maintain air superiority throughout this transition. To do so, the F–35 JSF program's success is vital. Is the Air Force committed to seeing this project to fruition?

Mr. FANNING. The F–35 represents the future of the Air Force fighter fleet. It will provide critical capabilities required to accomplish Air Force missions in the threat environment of the future, and enables true joint and coalition operations. As Secretary Donley stated in his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, the Air Force remains fully committed to the F–35 Program.

16. Senator CHAMBLISS. Mr. Fanning, as Under Secretary, what will you do to ensure the program is successful and timely in its acquisition and production?

Mr. FANNING. The Joint Program Office (JPO) has made important progress in identifying program efficiencies and pursuing cost avoidance efforts, and the Air Force has stated that it will continue to fully fund the program to the cost estimate, and is evaluating the most effective production ramp profile to maximize learning curve savings.

If confirmed, I will support these initiatives and more deeply involve myself in the work necessary to support the JPO's efforts to reduce operations and sustainment costs over the lifecycle of the program.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE S. LEE

BIOFUELS

17. Senator LEE. Mr. Fanning, in 2012, the Navy undertook the expensive "Great Green Fleet" demonstration, purchasing 450,000 gallons of biofuel at $26 a gallon for a total of $12 million spent on fuel for just one demonstration. The Air Force similarly spent $639,000 on 11,000 gallons of biofuels for a demonstration in 2012, costing the taxpayer $59 per gallon. With the prospect of sequestration and a much tighter defense budget in coming years, do you believe that the military should continue such large-scale demonstrations using biofuels? Please provide a yes or no answer, and if answering yes, please provide a justification as to why programs involving biofuels should be prioritized over other research and development programs.

Mr. FANNING. Yes. It is my understanding that the Air Force investments in biofuels is limited to certifying fuels that are in the pipeline or are planned to be in the pipeline, but that there are no plans to purchase in large quantities until it is cost effective. AF biofuels purchases are not designed to create a market for those fuels, but to better understand what alternatives work with existing AF platforms.

The Air Force should continue testing and certifying any alternative aviation fuels that have the potential to be produced cost-competitively by private industry and that meet Air Force specifications. Alternative fuels provide options for global mobility—rather than being tied to a specific fuel, the Air Force can use what is available. The Air Force is in the process of converting its primary jet fuel used in the continental United States from JP–8, the current military specification, to the more readily available commercial Jet A fuel. Since the cost of Jet A is less than JP–8, the Air Force estimates potential savings of $40 million annually in fuel procurement costs (Jet A with additives costs two cents ($0.02) a gallon less than JP–8). As part of this conversion, however, the Air Force will need to ensure none of the alternative fuels identified in the commercial specification will negatively impact flying operations. The purpose of purchasing 11,000 gallons of alcohol-to-jet fuel was to test and certify the Air Force fleet to ensure it could operate safely and effectively on such a fuel blend, which is anticipated to have high commercial viability.

FUTURE ACQUISITION PROCESS

18. Senator LEE. Mr. Fanning, with the prospect of sequester cuts to DOD this year and continuing cuts through the next 9 fiscal years, we must change the way that acquisitions are conducted in order to be more efficient and cost effective. Necessary acquisitions, such as our next generation fighter jet, have been plagued by delays and budget overruns. What lessons have been learned so far from the F–35 program that you will implement in future acquisitions?

Mr. FANNING. The F–35 program has provided several lessons applicable to future programs. First, while introducing a minor amount of concurrency to a program can streamline the transition from development to production, reduce overall costs and increase efficiency, starting production of the end item too early in the process can significantly increase the risk to the government in the form of additional costs and excessive rework. In today's highly technical world, early focus on software development, to include appropriate controls and oversight, must be enacted. Software efforts should be fully resourced and appropriate controls levied against the contractor to ensure the use of industry best practices. DOD and the Air Force recognize the importance of detailed cost estimates which improve the government's ability to negotiate contracts with the appropriate levels of risk and benefit for both the government and the contractor. The F–35 program also demonstrates the value of strong government oversight of military contracts. The Air Force is starting to see stabilized and/or improved performance in a number of areas, to include improved program manager assessments, technical oversight, cost, workforce capabilities, contracting and funding execution.

ASIA-PACIFIC SHIFT

19. Senator LEE. Mr. Fanning, please explain how the Air Force is planning for the military's shift towards the Asia-Pacific region. Include in your answer what this shift will mean for existing domestic Air Force bases and what these bases and their communities can be doing to prepare for the shift.

Mr. FANNING. The Air Force is taking a broad approach to rebalancing to the Asia-Pacific, seeking wider distribution of forces, expanded agreements with partners, and increased partner interoperability.

Implementation of OSD's Asia-Pacific rebalance will not result in a substantial increase of U.S. Air Force permanent presence in the Pacific Command Area of Responsibility. However, in an era of overall force posture reductions, the rebalance protects forces in the Asia-Pacific, resulting in a small percentage increase of our total overseas presence.

Domestic Air Force bases and their communities will not experience a significant change in personnel or force structure as a result of the shift to the Asia-Pacific. However, rotational capabilities will continue to support the Secretary of Defense's strategy to rebalance its resources toward the Asia-Pacific region.

FINANCE EXPERIENCE

20. Senator LEE. Mr. Fanning, part of your job as Under Secretary of the Air Force would be serving as Chief Management Officer of the Air Force. This is an important position, as it will handle much of the day-to-day business of the Air Force, including managing finances. What experience do you have that qualifies you to handle this portion of the job? Please include specific examples of increasing efficiency and cutting costs from your time as Deputy Under Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. FANNING. I do feel I am strongly qualified to fill the role as Chief Management Officer (CMO) in the USAF. I entered my current position as the Deputy Under Secretary and Deputy Chief Management Officer of the Navy (DUSN/DCMO) shortly after the Department of the Navy's first confirmed dual-roll Under Secretary of the Navy (USN)/Chief Management Officer (CMO). This provided me the opportunity, working with him, congressional staff, OSD, and the other Services, to best understand the intent of CMO legislation and implement it in the most effective manner.

One of the first things I noticed was that the Department of the Navy's strategy was heavily influenced by a technology-centric philosophy—essentially implementing large business systems to drive transformation in the Department. Since transformation is best accomplished by improving the business and then laying in the appropriate technology—not the other way around, we changed the strategy. Moreover, I demand that before any dollar was spent there must be a compelling business case for that expenditure. In the simplest terms I always ask two questions: why and so what? Why are you doing this; what are you hoping to achieve, and so what? Why does that matter? Will you save money; will you increase performance in some critical area that someone cares about; or some other goal?

This is the leadership strategy I would employ in the Department of the Air Force if confirmed by the Senate. I bring to this position a facts-based, cost-conscious, and business-centric transformation philosophy. I also believe that in order to successfully transform at the highest level, you have to build relationships and trust. I have always found the best way to achieve outcomes is to give clear guidance and direction but allow individuals to come up with new and innovative ideas by empowering them. I also believe credibility is vital at this level and the success we have achieved in the Navy will serve me well. For example, in 2009 the Navy was handed the remnants of the Defense Integrated Military Human Resources System and told to implement it in the Navy. I immediately requested an independent assessment, and quickly concluded that we should stop inserting technology until we had first clearly defined the business problems. We then spent a year deconstructing our business processes, baselining our cost of doing business and prioritizing the highest impact business problems. Because of this approach, today the DoN is able to target specific problems holistic to the personnel and pay business—taking into account policy, processes and execution—before throwing technology into the equation. This approach resulted in the DoN reprograming roughly $300 million to the Navy while modernizing its personnel and pay systems in the right way.

In terms of efficiencies, I spearheaded the Navy portion of the Secretary Gates efficiency effort. Two of my staff members served as part of Secretary Gates' core efficiency team. My office orchestrated the Navy's response by identifying and executing $35 billion in efficiencies. The Navy DCMO efforts were recently highlighted in the GAO report 'Opportunities Exist to Improve Information Used in Monitoring Status of Efficiency Initiatives', GAO–13–105R, December 4, 2012, which praised the progress of Navy efficiency initiatives using our newly emplaced internal governance structure. It further highlighted that for all of the initiatives selected, the "Office of the Navy Deputy Chief Management Officer (DCMO) coordinated with the appropriate Navy offices ensuring implementation of efficiency initiatives went as planned" and at the right level.

As DCMO, I frequently met with my Air Force, Army, and OSD counterparts on the broad issues facing the DOD. I have played a key role in the full spectrum of management of department from streamlining business processes and certifying business IT systems to helping lead our Department on its path to audit readiness.

F–35 COST OVERRUNS

21. Senator LEE. Mr. Fanning, delays and cost overruns with the F–35 have caused some of our partner nations, most recently Canada and Australia, to reassess their acquisition of the jets. What effects will a reduction of purchases outside of the United States have on the program and the cost of the jet?

Mr. FANNING. The F–35 delivers joint and partner nation air power essential to our mutual security strategy, and is a capability needed to defeat 21st century threats. The F–35 program was established on the concept of economies of scale for purchases. If an International Partner or U.S. Service reduces the number of F–35 aircraft they plan to purchase, the unit cost of each F–35 will increase. The amount of the cost increase depends on how many jets are reduced and in which years.

22. Senator LEE. Mr. Fanning, how are DOD and the Air Force working with our partner nations to address their concerns and maintain their participation in the program?

Mr. FANNING. DOD and Air Force are in close coordination with all eight of the System Development and Demonstration (SDD) Partner nations in the F–35 program. In addition to the daily interaction between liaison officers and DOD staffs working at the JSF Program Office in Crystal City, there is regular interaction between Lt. Gen. Christopher Bogdan, the JSF Program Executive Officer and senior leaders from each of the eight nations. The JSF governance structure addresses requirements and sustainment issues at different levels of leadership and allows partner concerns to be addressed in an open forum. The most recent engagement with senior leaders of F–35 program participants was the 20 March 2013 Joint Executive Steering Board, where Lieutenant General Christopher Bogdan briefed our partners that "affordability is the #1 concern" in the F–35 program and provided a status of development, production, and sustainment issues. There is a high level of transparency in communicating F–35 program status information to the partners.

[The nomination reference of Mr. Eric K. Fanning follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 4, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Eric K. Fanning, of the District of Columbia, to be Under Secretary of the Air Force, vice Erin C. Conaton, resigned.

[The biographical sketch of Mr. Eric K. Fanning, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF ERIC K. FANNING

Education:

Dartmouth College
- 1986–1990
- Bachelor of Arts in History awarded June 1990

Employment record:

Department of the Navy
- Deputy Under Secretary/Deputy Chief Management Officer
- July 2009–present

Department of Defense
- Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for White House Liaison
- April 2009–July 2009

Commission on the Prevention of WMD Proliferation and Terrorism
- Deputy Director
- May 2008–January 2009

Communication Management Group (CMG)
- Managing Director
- May 2007–May 2008

Business Executives for National Security (BENS)
- Senior Vice President for Strategic Development
- December 2001–May 2007
- Washington Regional Director
- March 2001–December 2001

1800HomeCare.com
- Senior Vice President, Operations and Strategy
- 1999–2000

Robinson Lerer and Montgomery Communication (RLM)
- Senior Associate
- 1998–1999

CBS National News
- Associate Producer, Foreign and National Desks New York City
- 1997–1998

The White House
- Associate Director of Political Affairs
- 1996

Department of Defense
- Special Assistant, Immediate Office of the Secretary of Defense
- 1993–1996

U.S. House of Representatives
- Research Assistant, House Armed Services Committee
- 1991–1993

[The Committee on Armed Services requires all individuals nominated from civilian life by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial and other information of the nominee. The form executed by Mr. Eric K. Fanning in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Eric Kenneth Fanning.

2. Position to which nominated:
Under Secretary of the Air Force.

3. Date of nomination:
February 4, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
July 2, 1968; Kalamazoo, MI.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Single.

7. Names and ages of children:
N/A.

8. Education: List secondary and higher education institutions, dates attended, degree received, and date degree granted.

Secondary:

Cranbook, Bloomfield Hills, MI, 1982–1984.
Centerville High School, Centerville, OH, 1984–1986 (high school diploma)

Higher Education:

Dartmouth College, B.A., 1986–1990.

9. Employment record: List all jobs held since college or in the last 10 years, whichever is less, including the title or description of job, name of employer, location of work, and dates of employment.
Bio attached (attachment 1).

Bio
Eric K. Fanning

Education:

- Dartmouth College
  - 1986 - 1990
  - Bachelor of Arts in History awarded June 1990

Employment Record:

- Department of the Navy
  - Deputy Under Secretary/Deputy Chief Management Officer
  - July, 2009 – present

- Department of Defense
  - Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for White House Liaison
  - April, 2009 – July, 2009

- Commission on the Prevention of WMD Proliferation and Terrorism
  - Deputy Director
  - May, 2008 – Jan, 2009

- Communication Management Group (CMG)
  - Managing Director
  - May, 2007 – May, 2008

- Business Executives for National Security (BENS)
  - Senior Vice President for Strategic Development
  - December, 2001 – May, 2007
  - Washington Regional Director
  - March, 2001 – December, 2001

- 1800HomeCare.com
  - Senior Vice President, Operations and Strategy
  - 1999 – 2000

- Robinson Lerer and Montgomery Communication (RLM)
  - Senior Associate
  - 1998 - 1999

- CBS National News
  - Associate Producer, Foreign and National Desks New York City
  - 1997 - 1998

- The White House

- Associate Director of Political Affairs
- 1996

- Department of Defense
  - Special Assistant, Immediate Office of the Secretary of Defense
  - 1993 - 1996

- United States House of Representatives
  - Research Assistant, House Armed Services Committee
  - 1991 - 1993

10. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed above.

None.

11. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.

None.

12. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.

None.

13. Political affiliations and activities:

(a) List all offices with a political party which you have held or any public office for which you have been a candidate.

None.

(b) List all memberships and offices held in and services rendered to all political parties or election committees during the last 5 years.

None.

(c) Itemize all political contributions to any individual, campaign organization, political party, political action committee, or similar entity of $100 or more for the past 5 years.

The nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.

14. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, military medals and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements.

None since college.

15. Published writings: List the titles, publishers, and dates of books, articles, reports, or other published materials which you have written.

"The Infusion of Efficiencies into DON Culture and Processes"—article published in Armed Forces Comptroller Journal, Summer 2011.

16. Speeches: Provide the committee with two copies of any formal speeches you have delivered during the last 5 years which you have copies of and are on topics relevant to the position for which you have been nominated.

Multiple speeches in current position, all relating to defense management and small business. None have transcripts. None were formally written.

17.Commitments regarding nomination, confirmation, and service:

(a) Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Yes.

(b) Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

No.

(c) If confirmed, will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Yes.

(d) Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Yes.

(e) Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?
Yes.
(f) Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?
Yes.
(g) Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?
Yes.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–F of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–F are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

ERIC K. FANNING.

This 25th day of February, 2013.

[The nomination of Mr. Eric K. Fanning was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on March 20, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on April 18, 2013.]

NOMINATION OF GEN. PHILIP M. BREEDLOVE, USAF, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND TO BE COMMANDER, U.S. EUROPEAN COMMAND AND SUPREME ALLIED COMMANDER, EUROPE

THURSDAY, APRIL 11, 2013

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC.

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:35 a.m. in room SD–G50, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Senator Carl Levin (chairman) presiding.

Committee members present: Senators Levin, Donnelly, Kaine, King, Inhofe, McCain, and Ayotte.

Committee staff members present: Peter K. Levine, staff director; and Leah C. Brewer, nominations and hearings clerk.

Majority staff members present: Joseph M. Bryan, professional staff member; Richard W. Fieldhouse, professional staff member; Michael J. Kuiken, professional staff member; Gerald J. Leeling, general counsel; and William G.P. Monahan, counsel.

Minority staff members present: John A. Bonsell, minority staff director; Steven M. Barney, minority counsel; and Thomas W. Goffus, professional staff member.

Staff assistants present: Jennifer R. Knowles, John L. Principato, and Lauren M. Gillis.

Committee members' assistants present: Jeff Fatora, assistant to Senator Nelson; Marta McLellan Ross, assistant to Senator Donnelly; Karen Courington, assistant to Senator Kaine; Jim Catella, assistant to Senator King; Paul C. Hutton IV, assistant to Senator McCain; Lenwood Landrum, assistant to Senator Sessions; Todd Harmer, assistant to Senator Chambliss; Brad Bowman, assistant to Senator Ayotte; and Craig Abele, assistant to Senator Graham.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody. The committee meets this morning to consider the nomination of General Philip Breedlove, U.S. Air Force, to be Commander of U.S. European Command (EUCOM) and Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR). General Breedlove is familiar with the European area of responsibility as he currently serves as Commander, U.S. Air Forces in Europe (USAFE). He is also familiar with the challenges of wearing more than one hat, as he currently is also Commander, U.S. Air Forces, Africa.

General, we thank you for your 3½ decades of military service and for your willingness to answer the call to serve once again. We thank your wife Cindy, who is also here with you this morning. Your family, as you know better than anybody, their support and their sacrifices make it possible for you to succeed. Please feel free when we call on you for your opening statement to introduce your wife and any of your family or friends that are with you here today.

The next EUCOM Commander and SACEUR, will face significant challenges within a constrained budget environment. We received the President's budget yesterday and, like the budgets passed by the Senate and the House, it does not address the possibility of a $52 billion sequester next year. If we don't take action to avoid this second sequester, cuts to defense spending will have a real impact on our strategy and programs in the coming years. Despite these cuts, the United States remains committed to our longstanding trans-Atlantic relationship with our European allies and to our mutual defense obligations under Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

General, we'd be interested in your thoughts on the impact of the current sequester and the possibility of a second sequester in fiscal year 2014 on EUCOM's ability to carry out its mission.

Last year the Defense Department announced reductions in the U.S. force posture in Europe, including the removal over the next couple years of two of the four Army brigade combat teams deployed in Europe. In addition, two U.S. Air Force squadrons under General Breedlove's command in Europe were designated for deactivation.

As the United States continues to rebalance its military posture globally, I hope you'd share your thoughts on the ongoing rebalance and what additional revisions, if any, to the U.S. footprint in Europe you would recommend if confirmed.

Nearly all of our North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) allies have undergone budget cuts of their own in recent years, raising concerns about what the capabilities of the alliance will be when the next crisis arises. Yet, after 10 years of fighting together in Afghanistan, the level of NATO cohesion is high and is unprecedented. One of the major challenges in the coming years will be capturing the lessons learned from these coalition operations and maintaining current levels of interoperability within the alliance.

The NATO mission in Afghanistan is entering a critical phase in the coming months, with the transition to Afghan security forces taking the lead on security throughout the country later this spring and coalition forces shifting to an advisory mission between now and the end of the International Security Assistance Force mission by the end of 2014.

The next NATO SACEUR will play a critical role in ensuring the smooth implementation of NATO's "in together, out together" policy for the Afghanistan mission and in shaping the post-2014 mission in Afghanistan which was discussed at the NATO defense ministers meeting in February.

While Syria is not in EUCOM's area, its impact is felt by key allies in the EUCOM region, including Turkey and Israel. As the civil war in Syria rages on, President Assad and his increasingly small inner circle are resorting to the use of Scud missiles, air strikes, and other indiscriminate capabilities that terrorize innocent Syrians and increase further the flow of refugees out of Syria.

Last year the alliance agreed to deploy Patriot missile batteries to defend Turkey against potential action by Assad. This action by NATO is commendable, but it's not enough. The United States needs to build a coalition to ramp up the military pressure on the Assad regime, and I hope our allies in NATO will join this effort. The Arab League has already stripped the Assad regime of its seat at the Arab League and invited the Syrian opposition as the legitimate representative of the Syrian people.

General, if confirmed as Supreme Allied Commander for all NATO military operations, you will be confronted with these issues and we look forward to hearing from you on this matter today as well.

At the Lisbon summit in 2010, NATO agreed to develop missile defense capability to defend NATO European territory, population, and military forces. This is essential to protect our forward-deployed forces, allies, and partners against the existing and emerging regional missile threat from Iran. To achieve that commitment, NATO agreed to develop and finance a command and control system and the United States is contributing Phases 1 through 3 of the European Phased Adaptive Approach (EPAA) to missile defense, which remain on track to protect NATO Europe by 2018, with its defense sites in Romania and Poland.

Secretary Hagel recently stated that our commitment to NATO missile defense, "remains ironclad". He also announced that the United States no longer plans to deploy Phase 4 of the EPAA, because Phase 4 was designed to protect the United States, not Europe, and we can achieve enhanced protection of the United States from a potential Iranian long-range missile sooner by deploying 14 additional ground-based interceptors in Alaska. General Breedlove, we're interested to know your views on that issue.

As part of its 2010 Lisbon agreement, NATO also invited Russia to cooperate on missile defense. Although NATO and Russia have had different views on missile defense, there are numerous successful areas of U.S.-Russian and NATO-Russian military cooperation and the NATO-Russia Council continues to have active discussions on missile defense cooperation, including a joint theater missile defense exercise program.

The United States and NATO believe that cooperation on missile defense can enhance the security of both NATO and Russia and such cooperation could also send a vitally important signal to Iran that we are united in opposition to any Iranian efforts to acquire nuclear weapons and long-range missiles.

Other challenges facing the next EUCOM Commander and SACEUR include continuing and strengthening bilateral and NATO efforts: to counter transnational threats from terrorism; to prevent illicit trafficking, including the flow of narcotics from South Asia and elsewhere through Southeastern Europe; to counter cyber threats, including to the NATO Cooperative Cyber Defense Center of Excellence in Estonia; to counter piracy; and to maintain strategic assets, the key transit facilities for global operations, particularly in support of U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) and U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM).

We all look forward to your testimony today, General, on these and other issues, and again we thank you for your continuing willingness to serve our Nation.

Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We are faced with a little bit of a problem this morning in that at 10:30 we have a Committee on Environment and Public Works meeting and there are five members on the Republican side alone that will be going back and forth, as I've already explained to General Breedlove. So we'll be moving around a little bit.

I enjoyed very much meeting your beautiful wife and two daughters. I guess Dave is there somewhere; is that right? Yes. I didn't mean to sell you short. I just kind of walked by you to the beauty. [Laughter.] Anyway, it's nice to have your family here with you.

As I look at Iran, North Korea, and al Qaeda, as you and I talked in my office, and Mali and the conflict in the Central African Republic, and 70,000 dead in Syria, I can't understand how the President thinks that, "The tide of war is receding." On my recent trip to Korea we visited the demilitarized zone, which as you know from your time in Korea is anything but demilitarized. On my visit to North Africa we discussed the problems there, and none would indicate that the tide of war is receding. If this is what receding looks like, I'd hate to see what a threat looks like.

Through my extensive travel in Europe, Africa, and the Middle East and Asia, the critical importance of U.S. engagement and leadership abroad is readily apparent and the security dividends of our investment in NATO include the multinational operations in Afghanistan and Libya and counter-piracy missions in the Horn of Africa. I do want to cover that in my questions to you because it's probably even more extensive than people realize. It's clear that the future operations we conduct in Africa and the Middle East will be from Europe and with Europe.

I don't remember a time when the world was more dangerous than it is now. I can remember people saying that in the past, but it's for real now. Yet due in part to the wrong perception that the tide of the war is receding, we are poised to cut our defense budget by, if you take what has already been done and what we're looking at in sequestration, about a trillion dollars. I agree with our former Secretary of Defense it's devastating to our defense. While our military commanders have done a phenomenal job with the hand that they are dealt, we owe them a better hand.

Unfortunately, the President released a budget yesterday that's symbolic of his last 4 years in office. It highlights his failure to address the unprecedented resource challenges facing our military. His proposal continues his unfortunate history of saddling the men and women of our military with disproportionate and illogical budget cuts that would undermine their readiness and their capabilities.

As you and I talked about in my office, four of the six U.S. fighter squadrons stationed in Europe have been grounded, and our tanker and airlift squadrons will revert from full mission capable to a greatly reduced status of basic mission capable. The lack of resources will make EUCOM's support of AFRICOM even more difficult. We'll have a chance to talk about that and I've expressed to you my concern there.

Over the long term, I'm greatly concerned that we'll squander our investment of our national blood and treasure in Afghanistan by precipitously drawing down the troops' capability similar to what we saw in Africa.

Now, when you're confirmed, General Breedlove, you'll be charged with guiding the most successful alliance in history through a difficult fiscal environment and be responsible for ensuring that our efforts in Afghanistan over the last decade will not have been in vain. I can't think of anyone who is more up to this very difficult task than you are, and so I'm looking forward to the successes that we'll see through your leadership in this new position.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Senator Inhofe follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I join you in welcoming General Breedlove, who has amassed an impressive record of service. General, I thank you for your continued willingness to serve the country. Please ensure the brave men and women you lead know how grateful we are for their sacrifice, and that of their families, on behalf of our national security.

General Breedlove, we no longer have the luxury of operating in a bipolar world as we did during the Cold War—when you were cutting your teeth as a second lieutenant and when the threats to the Homeland were clear. Now, more than ever, the threats in the areas of responsibility around the globe are interconnected. What happens in Europe, the Middle East, the Asia-Pacific and Africa has the potential to directly impact the security of the U.S. Homeland.

I have a hard time squaring the reality of an aggressive Iran, a bellicose Kim Jong Un, a war against al Qaeda in Mali (AQIM), armed conflict in the Central African Republic, continuing frozen conflicts in Azerbaijan, and 70,000 dead in Syria, with the President's statement that "the tide of war is receding." On my trip to Korea in January, we visited the DMZ, which as you know from your extensive time in Korea, is anything but demilitarized. It was obvious when we visited Taiwan that based on the number of missiles pointing at us from China, the Chinese don't think that the "tide of war is receding." On our visit to Northern Africa, we discussed AQIM, Boco Haram, and al Shabaab—none of which would tell you that the "tide of war is receding." If the "tide of war is receding," I'd hate to see what it looks like when the President decides it is coming in.

Iran is determined to develop a nuclear weapon, despite growing international pressure and the damage sanctions are doing to its economy. Public intelligence reports tell us that they could have a ballistic missile capable of reaching the east coast of the United States by 2015. Although I'm encouraged that the President reversed his earlier misguided decision and is now seeking to bolster our homeland missile defense system through fourteen additional ground-based-interceptors on the west coast, I remain deeply concerned about our ability to defend against the growing threat from Iran. Restoration of the original planned number of missiles on the west coast helps but is late to need and does not go far enough. We need the additional protection that an east coast site would provide.

Throughout my extensive travels to Africa, the Middle East, and Asia, it has been readily apparent how critically important it is for the United States to remain engaged and a leader abroad. The return on that investment abroad is exemplified by the troop contributions of over 50 nations from around the globe to the International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) has served as an invaluable partner and critical platform to integrate the contributions of troops and military capabilities to bolster operations in Afghanistan, while at the same time operations in Afghanistan have transformed the expeditionary capabilities of NATO. The security dividends of our investment in NATO include combined operations in Afghanistan, Libya, and counter piracy missions off the Horn of Africa. It is clear that whatever future operations we conduct in North Africa and the Middle East will be from Europe, and with Europe.

While the threats that our witness is tasked with confronting are growing in scope and complexity, the resources available to deal with them are decreasing. I don't remember a time when the world has been more dangerous and the threats more complex. Yet, due in part to the misperception that the tide of war is receding, we are poised to cut our defense budget by a trillion dollars over the next 10 years. The misguided policy of the President is the relentless pursuit of disarmament. As we diminish our defense industrial base, China and Russia increase theirs; nurturing militant adventurism that ultimately our military commanders must address. While our military commanders on the ground have done a phenomenal job with the hand that they were dealt; we owe them a better hand.

I remain concerned that we have a strategy-resource disconnect that puts military lives and our national interests at risk. As we speak, four of six U.S. fighter squadrons stationed in Europe have been grounded and our tanker and airlift squadrons will revert from full mission capable to a greatly reduced status of basic mission capable. This lack of resources will make U.S. European Command support to U.S. Africa Command even more difficult and further reduce our ability to react to contingencies similar to Benghazi. Over the longer term, I am also greatly concerned that we'll squander our investment of national blood and treasure in Afghanistan by a precipitous draw down of troops and capabilities similar to what we saw in Iraq.

If confirmed, General Breedlove, you will be charged with stewardship of the most successful alliance in history and be responsible for ensuring that our efforts in Afghanistan have not been in vain. As we saw very clearly in Libya last year, our strategic partnership and strategic access in Europe is the linchpin for our engagement in some of the most volatile regions in the world today. What I'm getting at here General is that there will be no shortage of challenges facing you and the men and women you will lead. The threats are growing, and the tools available to address them are declining.

I look to you to provide the committee with your assessment of how the ongoing budget crisis will impact your ability to effectively address national security challenges and whether the current strategies that you are operating under are still executable given the budget realities.

Thank you again for appearing before us today and I look forward to your testimony.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

General.

STATEMENT OF GEN. PHILIP M. BREEDLOVE, USAF, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND TO BE COMMANDER, U.S. EUROPEAN COMMAND, AND SUPREME ALLIED COMMANDER, EUROPE

General BREEDLOVE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Inhofe, and distinguished members of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

I would like to introduce my family, sir. I'd like to introduce first my wife, Cindy. She's been beside me for 34 years. She's moved our household 21 times, 9 of those times across the oceans, and she completely raised the 3 wonderful children who have already been acknowledged, Samantha, Rebecca, and Daniel. I know that I would not be here today without her and my family.

I'm honored to have my oldest daughter, Samantha, here. She's a world-class triathlete in my mind. Her husband Kevin serves in the Army National Guard and has accomplished two 1-year tours in Iraq.

I'm also honored to have with me my daughter, Rebecca, and my son-in-law, Clay, both of whom proudly serve their Nation as lieutenants in the U.S. Air Force. Clay is a third generation Air Force officer. His father, Master Sergeant Mike Hardy, is also here with him today.

My son Daniel is here and is a freshman in college and he makes me proud every day with what he does.

Chairman LEVIN. Is he going to the University of Michigan, I hope?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, no, sir. I'm off to a bad start. [Laughter.]

Senator DONNELLY. We have some other suggestions for that as well.

General BREEDLOVE. My mother-in-law, Ms. Lib Thompson, is here today with us as well. Her husband, Don Thompson, now deceased, served in the Marine Corps and they have both supported Cindy and I throughout our Air Force career.

Ms. Regina Hagerty is also here in support. She has been a part of our family for over 28 years, since her husband was my most influential commander in my early years.

Finally, I'm proud to have Chief Master Sergeant Craig Adams here. He is the most important half of my command team at USAFE.

It's a tremendous honor for me to be here today and I'm humbled to have been nominated by our Commander in Chief for the position of Commander of U.S. European Command and Supreme Allied Commander, Europe. Allow me to publicly thank Secretary Hagel and General Dempsey for their recommendation and for their trust and confidence. I'd also like to say thank you to Admiral Jim Stavridis for his 36 years of service to our country. His leadership of our joint and coalition forces as our longest serving combatant commander has truly been inspiring.

The nations of Europe make up the majority of an alliance key to our collective defense strategy. They have been our most reliable allies for over 70 years. These partnerships are irreplaceable. We cannot rebalance or pivot towards Asia without Europe.

I have served in Europe for a third of my career and if confirmed this will be my eighth assignment. I have worked hand in hand with our partner nations to advance U.S. and alliance objectives. While it's a tremendous honor to be nominated to this position, I believe leadership is a responsibility that must be earned through action, a daunting task for anyone selected to lead the great men and women responsible for a coalition that has ensured the trans-Atlantic security of our Nation and its allies.

If confirmed, I fully acknowledge the significance of our mission in Europe and your expectations of me as a commanding general. Cindy and I pledge to give nothing less than our all to live up to decades-long standards of excellence. Our soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines, and coastguardsmen who selflessly serve deserve nothing less than everything I have to offer.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and the committee, for allowing me to appear before you today and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, General.

Our timing system worked very well yesterday, so we'll continue. We thank Senator Inhofe for that suggestion to use this highly advanced technology, which has been here for probably 20 years without use by this committee. [Laughter.]

General, last month Senator McCain and I sent a letter to the President urging him to work with NATO and our regional partners to pursue additional options in Syria, including the following options: to degrade the Assad regime's air power with precision air strikes or the possible use of Patriot missile batteries; to target Syrian aircraft and missiles; to create with Turkey's initiative, a safe zone within Syria, with a limited no-fly zone; to provide additional assistance to vetted opposition groups.

Can you give us your personal assessment of these options? Are they viable and are they desirable in your professional military opinion?

General BREEDLOVE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the question. We have six batteries of Patriots in Turkey at this time and they are reacting to and under the command of my NATO element, Headquarters Allied Air Command (AIRCOM) NATO. They are voluntary national contributions to an Article 4 request by Turkey to participate in the defense of a stalwart ally.

Two of those batteries are U.S. batteries and four are NATO. In order to be able to use any of those batteries in a safe zone protection of Syria, of course, we would have to engage Turkey and NATO about the four additional batteries. As you and I have discussed, sir, clearly the U.S. batteries could be used in a role to project into Syria. They have the capability to do it. Their range is somewhat limited, as we have discussed, at doing that, but they have full capability to do that. If Turkey and the United States were to look at doing this in a bilateral fashion or if we could convince our NATO partners to come alongside of us to also be a part of that, then we could do that.

The fact of the matter of being able to project power into Syria is physically possible. There is both good and bad at creating this impression into Syria. I think that it enables some of the things that we discussed that you are concerned about as far as a safe zone in northern Syria. What it would do is ask us then to reorient the defense away from what they are defending now, and I guess that's the down side of reorienting where those Patriots are.

Creating a no-fly zone. I think General Mattis in his last testimony to this committee put it pretty much the way I see it: A safe zone could create opportunity to engage with the opposition, but creating a safe zone in northern Syria would have to be much more than Patriots. It would probably require fixed wing air and other capabilities that we would have to bring to the problem.

As I know you and I have talked and your staff have talked, creating a no-fly zone first starts with having to take down the integrated air defense system of the enemy, which would be something that would have to be done kinetically. I know that CENTCOM has thought through those issues and their recommendation at this point is they don't see a military value in that.

Chairman LEVIN. Excuse me. CENTCOM has said they don't see a military value in taking down air defenses of Syria—I'm sorry.

General BREEDLOVE. I'm sorry, Senator. Let me say that a different way. What they have said is they don't believe that there are good military options or outcomes by creating a no-fly zone.

Chairman LEVIN. Over a safe zone?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Who have they said that to?

General BREEDLOVE. I think, Senator, that was General Mattis in this committee. Maybe I have that wrong.

Chairman LEVIN. Yes, I don't think so. But we'll review that testimony. Senator McCain I know has been very actively involved in this issue.

Senator MCCAIN. Let me. Could I?

Chairman LEVIN. Yes.

Senator MCCAIN. With your indulgence, sir, General Mattis said, "The United States and our allies could identify and destroy quite a fair amount of Assad's operational aircraft on the ground using precision strike and standoff weaponry," General. So your statement is in direct contradiction to what General Mattis said in testimony and has told me.

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, I sit corrected. You have it exactly right, what General Mattis said in your testimony.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay, thank you for that important clarification. The stakes here are very significant.

Yesterday an administration spokesman, senior administration official, said that, "The President has directed his national security team to identify additional measures so that we can increase assistance." I would hope that would happen quickly, and I know Senator McCain and other members of this committee have spoken on this subject as well.

I'll leave the subject of Syria, I'll leave it at this point, in order to be able to ask some additional questions. But we do hope, General, that when you're confirmed that you will take back to our NATO allies the feeling of many members of this committee, who will all speak for themselves, and hopefully by then an administration position that we be much more forward-leaning in terms of putting additional military pressure on Assad, which would really require NATO support, and it obviously would require Turkey to decide that it is willing to create a safe zone in northern Syria, providing it has NATO support. We would hope that you would be able and ought to make this case to NATO as we've just outlined.

On the missile defense issue, on European missile defense, is it your assessment that our European allies are supportive of our new missile defense policy in Europe?

General BREEDLOVE. Mr. Chairman, thank you again for that question. I have talked to numerous of the major allies that are a part of AIRCOM since AIRCOM, which is my NATO current hat, is in charge of the missile defense, which is in its nascent form now, our initial capability. As I understand the feedback from all of my NATO counterparts at this point, as long as we remain steadfast in our support to Phases 1 through 3, which was the portion of the missile defense that was about Europe, as long as we are unfaltering in our support to proceed apace with those first three phases, our NATO partners are comfortable with the announcement.

Chairman LEVIN. That is our new policy, is that correct?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. In your response to prehearing questions you said that we should continue to seek zones of cooperation with Russia and that we should continue to believe that cooperation with Russia on missile defense could enhance the security of both NATO and Russia. Can you describe ways in which you believe that missile defense cooperation and transparency with Russia could enhance our security, including whether such cooperation could send a powerful signal to Iran that we oppose jointly, NATO and Russia oppose Iran acquiring nuclear weapons and long-range missiles?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I agree with the opening statement that was made, and that is that we have to find ways to cooperate with Russia. I think in the opening statement it made reference to the signal to Iran. What a powerful signal to Iran if the U.S. and Russia were cooperating on missile technology and missile defense.

I think we do need to press hard to move forward with that. I've started in my current job connecting to senior Russian leaders and actually have hosted at my headquarters there their commander of long-range aviation as a first step to get to the senior leadership. I'm committed, if confirmed, to continue that pursuit to bring Russia alongside of us in these important endeavors.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your drawing attention to the family. I think a lot of people don't understand the sacrifices that are made. To me, Cindy, when I hear something like you've been married for 34 years and moved 25 times or whatever it was, it's inconceivable to me. My wife and I have been married 54 years and we've never moved. Same house that we were originally in. It's hard to see that. But that's a lifestyle that you've become accustomed to and you've made great sacrifices.

I'm not going to do it, but for the record, because of your current position, not the position for which you will be confirmed, I hope, I am concerned about where we are in our Phase 1, 2, 3, and 4, and the fact that cancellation of the fourth phase in terms of the capability of our SM–3s, the 1A, the 2B, 2As, and what we don't have. I'd like to get, for the record, from your past experience where you really think that puts us today. You and I talked about this in the office, but I'd like to have it down so that we can have that in writing.

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I have that for the record.

Senator INHOFE. All right, sir. That's good.

[The information referred to follows:]

After announcement of the change to European Phased Adaptive Approach (EPAA) by Secretary Hagel, it is clear that the U.S. contribution to defense of NATO Europe will be unaffected. Phases 1–3 of the EPAA will still provide defense of Europe, and Phase 3 in particular will allow coverage of all European NATO populations and territory to the extent technically feasible. The indefinite hold on Phase IV does not affect deployment of Phases 1–3.

The goal of EPAA Phase 4 was defense of the United States against an intercontinental ballistic missile attack from the Middle East. We will now meet that goal sooner by additional ground-based interceptors deployed in the United States, which will also enhance protection of the United States against the growing threat from North Korea.

- The U.S. European Command has already deployed a radar to Turkey and Aegis Ballistic Missile Defense ships to the Mediterranean Sea as part of Phase 1.
- The United States stated commitment to Phases 1–3 includes the development of Aegis Ashore sites in Romania (2015 timeframe) for Phase 2 and in Poland (2018 timeframe) for Phase 3.

• As Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (Dr.) Miller stated at a press conference, "We will still go forward, as planned, with Phases 1–3. Phase 3 for the European Phase-Adaptive Approach will involve deploying about 24 SM–3 IIA interceptors, SM–3 interceptors including the IIA in Poland. Same timeline, same footprint of U.S. forces to support that."

Senator INHOFE. Now, you mentioned in my office and I mentioned in my opening statement that four of the six U.S. fighter squadrons stationed in Europe have been grounded—and our tanker and airlift squadrons will revert from full missile capability to a greatly reduced status for basic mission capability—how long does it take to make that up?

I'm thinking more because of my personal background in what's happening to our fighter squadrons stationed in Europe, because you have a problem. You're going to have to get them back up ready. What do you do with them during this period of time? You have four of them that are down there and you also have the pilots. There's only so much you can do on simulation. What do you do with them and how long will it take you to get back and the kind of comparable cost should we see fit to address this in our National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2014?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, it is a great question and we have been thinking about this ever since we have begun to contemplate that we would have ground forces. As I have explained to some, the forces actually degrade over time. Our youngest pilots after about 30 days lose their qualifications. Our older pilots after about 45 days, they lose their qualifications.

Once they lose their landing qualifications and other combat skill qualifications, then we essentially have to put them through a requalification process. If we were to receive funding to be able to start flying them very shortly after they're grounded, that would be a shorter process. If we had to wait all the way to the end of the fiscal year to get budget authority for flying hours in the next fiscal year and they are grounded for say 3½ months, then it would be much longer.

We've looked at that, sir, and I think for the fighter aviation a rough number is 2 months, a little more than 2 months to get the squadron back on track. For the lift squadron, when they lose some of their exquisite capabilities like paradrop, precision drop, supporting the Army in their parachute training, etcetera, those are harder to regain simply because we have to get the training opportunities to do it. It's not like you can just fly sorties the next day. We have to marry with the Army and other things. That could take significantly longer, and that concerns me, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. I think that as we go into our development of our NDAA and we start our discussions, we want to get from you some more specifics, because should we do what I consider to be the responsible thing, we need to know the costs and what we have sacrificed in this interim period of time.

Just one real question I normally do ask. It's becoming less relevant, but it still is relevant. That is on the sequestration. If we were, as I suggested some 7 weeks ago, able to take the same top line and give the commanders in the field more flexibility, would that—I have talked to all the Service Chiefs. I have them on record here. But would you agree with them that it would be far less devastating if we could have some flexibility at the discretion of the Service Chiefs?

General BREEDLOVE. I do, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. One of the areas that I've been very much concerned with is, of course, in AFRICOM. You'll have that responsibility. It's an awesome responsibility because of your shrinked resources and the problems that are happening there. Now, we're used to problems in Africa. We've never, prior to September 11, really addressed them to any real degree.

Everyone is aware of what happened in Somalia. They're aware of piracy on the east coast. But, as you and I talked, I'm reminded when I go over there that, with the new finds of the oil and the resources in West Africa, we have a new problem that's developing there and that's piracy in West Africa.

Now, just when you look at the fact that you are up in Stuttgart and you have to get your resources down to that huge continent of Africa, how are you going to handle that? It's hard enough as it is today, but as this expands, and with the resources you have—and I'm talking about maybe lift resources. Maybe this is something we need to reevaluate.

How can you handle that with these new problems coming in, that vast continent of Africa?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir. I think that my last several assignments in USAFE where we supported Africa before AFRICOM and now as the Africa commander, I have learned the definition of geography and what geography means, time, distance, and heading. I often show a picture, a map of Africa, where you can literally put almost exactly four continental United States in the continent of Africa. I understand now as an operational commander just how hard access is to Africa even if it's unopposed. Time, distance, and heading becomes a real problem.

Being able to have forces forward deployed in the southern tier of USAFE so that they can reach into Africa is incredibly important. Our basing in these southern states—Spain, Italy, and others—are critical to us. I believe that we are now in northern Africa looking to see where are there lily pads inside of Africa that we can establish relationships with nations whereby when we need to we can move forces forward, to cut that time, distance, and heading problem down.

Senator INHOFE. I think that's important because that's a moving target. Not long ago no one was really concerned about Mali and Chad and some of that area in there. However, we are. When we look at the five African brigades that we originally talked about building, not that we're on schedule for doing it, which would be another question for the record, it concerns me that we are already to the point where you have to have these resources, you have to have them developed.

Initially when we, as you well know and most of the people at this table know, when we established AFRICOM, it would have been better to have that headquarters down more centrally located, maybe even in Africa, maybe in Ethiopia. But we know the political problems down there that made that impossible.

With the reduction in the resources that are already there and the escalating problems already in eastern Africa, but now in West Africa, that's going to be one that's going to be a huge problem for you. I'd like to have you be sure to let us know as we go into the development for 2014 just what those problems are so we can help you to address those problems when that time comes.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

For everyone's information, the vote is now scheduled at 11:00 o'clock.

Senator Donnelly.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General, thank you for your service, and to all of your family. I noted that you graduated from college the same year I did. I consider you as young as I am, and it's wonderful to see your family here with you today.

You will help in your new position coordinating our reduction in forces from Afghanistan. As we look at that process moving forward, what do you consider as the most significant challenges for the Afghan army, for the police, for their government, as we move forward in this process?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, it's a great question. As we look at what are the sizes that are being contemplated for the long-term force structure and what are the capabilities that are being contemplated, it is center in our discussion. I think first and foremost we need to continue the pressure on making sure the professionalism of the military meets the requirements of the Nation. I think that, quite frankly, we are doing pretty good there in the armed forces piece and we have some work to do in the Afghan police piece.

But we need to make the military creditable, capable, and responsive and appear creditable to the Nation of Afghanistan and the people that they would protect. I would offer that their recent performance in the military realm has been quite respectable. Almost 90 percent of the nation now is back to the Afghanis. They have led now some very large formation attacks and complex military maneuvers, which are fairly encouraging in this matter.

Senator DONNELLY. Do you have, as we move forward on this, almost a set of metrics as we head closer toward the end of 2014, that at this point we hope to be here, at this point we hope to be here?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, the short answer is no, I do not. But I know that Joe Dunford, who is a long-time friend, we have served together many times, I know that he is working on that. If confirmed, my pledge is to get there to talk to Joe and then go down and see Lloyd Austin immediately thereafter, to do just that: How can we develop metrics and thoughts that will inform this Congress and inform our leadership on the way to go ahead?

Senator DONNELLY. What do you see as the biggest challenge in this process of transition?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, my initial response now, not having been there, will be colored by the color of my uniform. As I talk to the other NATO nations and as I have talked to the commanders there in my past trips as an Air Force officer, they are very concerned about enablers. They are very concerned about being able to do the intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance that we do, to be able to do the personnel recovery that we do, to do the medevac that we do, inter- and intra-theater airlift.

These are all things that they are not capable of doing and that NATO has been providing by and large during the time, and I think those are things that we need to be concerned about.

Senator DONNELLY. Admiral Stavridis had told us a few weeks ago that the remaining bases in EUCOM were forward operating bases needed for access and that we could conceivably draw down further. I met with the Army this week and they briefed us on their plans. Their plans, they told me, were to reduce the infrastructure in the region by 51 percent between now and 2016. How do we match those goals and the previous testimony that we heard?

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, let me just talk to what I've been doing as the air commander there and what I've watched my fellow commanders around do the same thing. When I took command about 9 months ago, I immediately started looking at what is the enduring mission of USAFE as it supports Africa and Europe and the Middle East, the Eastern Med, and Africa?

I do believe that we have more infrastructure that we can draw down in the Air Force. I have heard my fellow component commanders speak to the same. I know very much less about what Bruce Clingan is looking at in the Navy, but I do know that the Army thinks that they can bring down further.

I think it's in all of our best interests to do that, because these bases cost money and the infrastructure that we can draw down saves money for flying aircraft.

Senator DONNELLY. One of the things I just want to try to get your commitment for, the Indiana National Guard, we're extraordinarily proud of them. They have ongoing relationships with European state partners, and I just want to make sure that we can get your commitment that the longstanding relationships between National Guard units and the European state partnership countries will remain with the Guard as we move forward.

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, I can absolutely assure you in that respect. For EUCOM, 21 state partnership programs servicing 22 nations. As I talked to the staff in preparation for this hearing, they tell me that literally one-quarter of our interaction with our partners are done by the state partnership program.

[The information referred to follows:]

During the hearing, I referred to 21 state partnership programs servicing 22 nations in the U.S. European Command area of responsibility. I misspoke and should have said there are 23 state partnership programs.

General BREEDLOVE. Specifically in the Air Command, I could not run by air operations center either in peacetime or in conflict without the support of two Guard units that bring people and expertise to my area of command.

Senator DONNELLY. As we look at Syria, obviously we're concerned with all the border areas, but one of the border areas that we're concerned about conflict threatening to boil over is in Israel. We are wondering the coordination between EUCOM and the Israeli Defense Forces, as well as coordination with our other friends and allies in the area. What kind of coordination is occurring now and what do you plan moving forward in this extremely challenging situation?

General BREEDLOVE. The coordination level now is higher than I've ever seen it. I have been participating in working with Israel since I was a colonel in Europe. I have flown in Juniper Falcon from Nevatim Air Base twice in my life during large exercises with Israel.

At the senior staff level, in preparation for last year's Austere Challenge 12, which you have heard billed as the largest missile defense exercise ever, we could not have been more tightly lashed to Israel in how we plan to do missile defense of that area should we need to.

I think that it is very strong. It continues to grow stronger and it should as we bring ourselves closer and closer together, to dealing with a neighborhood that has been altered, I think, by the Arab Spring.

Senator DONNELLY. Right. That's with our other allies, too, I presume.

I'm almost out of time, so I want to ask you one last question. As you look at this region, as you look at your new potential command, what is your greatest concern as you look, as you move ahead? What keeps you up at night, other than your children?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I think my first focus is going to be getting the transition in Afghanistan right. I need to get over there, engage with the commanders, come back and engage with the leadership here in Congress and our Nation, and make sure that we have force sizing, drawdown schedules, and what we leave behind in residual capability right. I have to focus on that.

I'm running over a little bit, but, sir, I think it's really important that as we begin this drawdown in Afghanistan that we don't take a peace dividend and, as was mentioned in the opening comments, back way off of the gains that we have made with our European allies in interoperability and their investment in defense and in participating in Afghanistan.

Senator DONNELLY. General, thank you. To your family, thank you very much for all your service.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Donnelly.

Senator McCain.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, General, for you and your family's service. You mentioned all the different duty stations and I'm sure that your time at Luke Air Force was by far the most enjoyable of all of those.

General, I mentioned to you in my office both Admiral Stavridis and General Mattis have been very candid with this committee, which is one of the questions that's asked of you on your confirmation. I hope you will follow in their footsteps, and I would remind you again on the issue of Syria. Admiral Stavridis testified before this committee that Patriot missile batteries could be deployed from their current positions closer to the border with Syria, where they could help defend civilian populations in Syria and serve as a powerful deterrent to Syrian pilots. Do you agree with that?

General BREEDLOVE. I do, Senator.

Senator MCCAIN. Can Patriot missiles shoot down Scud missiles?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir. In fact that's their primary duty as they're aligned right now.

Senator MCCAIN. Can they shoot down aircraft?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir, they can.

Senator MCCAIN. General Mattis also testified that a fair amount of Assad's operational aircraft could be destroyed on the ground using standoff weaponry. Do you agree with that statement?

General BREEDLOVE. I do, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. So we really aren't putting pilots at risk and there's not a requirement to take out the air defenses around Damascus in order to assure the security of a no-fly zone. I think we all know that if pilots think they're going to fly into areas where their risk is incredibly high, as it would be with the Patriot missile and other capabilities, they would not do that.

Both former Secretary of Defense Panetta and General Dempsey, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, both testified before this committee that they had supported supplying weapons to the rebels. Have you reached a conclusion on that? In Syria?

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, I think that if we could assure that the weapons were going to the right people and that we would not have to face them in the future, that it would be helpful to removing the regime.

Senator MCCAIN. I thank you for that answer. Obviously, the best way to assure that would be if there were a safe zone, such as Benghazi was in Libya, for the resistance to organize and control the flow of weapons. I think we all know, and I know you agree, that the situation has worsened over time, to the point where the jihadists are playing a greater and greater role in Syria, which obviously post-Assad, which will happen some day, is going to be incredibly complicated.

Do you believe that, as opposed to 2 years ago, that Lebanon and Jordan are more or less stable than they were before the last 2 years?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I would say they are less stable, not because their intent is not good, but there is so much instability with the Arab Spring and, sir, a pretty large refugee problem at this point.

Senator MCCAIN. Of course you are aware that the Russians continue their flow of weapons into Bashar Assad's forces; and even now, later reports that the Iranians are not only providing weapons, but they're training, actually training people in Iran and sending them back into Syria. Have you heard those reports?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I have not, but I do know that in general we would not categorize Russia's support to us as helpful in this area now. I am not privy to those reports yet.

Senator MCCAIN. I think it's good to give them flack jackets. I don't think there's any way that can really seriously affect the equation on the ground. I—well, my opinion is well known.

General Mattis recommended 13,600 U.S. troops and about half as many international troops in post-2014 Afghanistan to do counterterrorism and train and assist missions. Have you had a chance to look at that assessment of General Mattis'?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I have looked at General Mattis' testimony and other thoughts on 13,600. I think that it relates back to a comment I made earlier, Senator, that I think that our eventual number in Afghanistan is yet to be determined, but influencing that will be do we remain at 352,000 in the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF) or do we come down to what was proposed at the Chicago summit of 230,000 and when that happens. If we keep the ANSF high through 2018, it should give us more flexibility on numbers. If we don't keep the ANSF number high, then that would probably cause input.

Senator MCCAIN. One of the things that is a little frustrating to some of us is we're sort of seeing a repeat of the Iraq scenario, in that we delay and delay and delay on these decisions. Meanwhile it puts Karzai and our friends in the region in an uncertain position. I hope that as soon as you are confirmed that you would in the deliberations urge a decision soon on the post-2014. We're into 2013. We need to have a firm decision as to what our troop strengths are going to be, what our presence, and what their role is going to be. I greatly fear the same kind of unraveling that we are seeing in Iraq today.

Finally, you made a very strong statement to me in my office when we had the pleasure of our visit about sequestration. You mentioned that certain squadrons are having to stand down, that there are certainly decisions having to be made that are basically no-win decisions.

When I asked you about the effect, especially since you have a couple of young members of your family here, the effect of sequestration on the decisions that these young officers, junior officers and mid-level officers, are going to be making about whether to remain in the Air Force and in the military, what's your personal view of that particular situation?

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, it's a great question and I'm happy to have an opportunity to comment. As I took command, the chief and I, we got out and talked to our troops. What I will do is just report to you things that I'm hearing from the troops. This concerns them greatly. It concerns them, will we have the wherewithal to do what we do? Will we be able to continue educational benefits that we thought were a part of our business? Will we be able to train and fight at the level that we expected to train and fight at?

I would just say that, from the number of questions that the chief and I got as we have circulated the battlefield forward and in Europe, that this is a concern on the mind of our troops. I am concerned that it will impact the long-term retention, health, and welfare of our troops.

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, General.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator McCain.

Senator King.

Senator KING. First, General, thank you very much for your service, and I am delighted to have you here. I, too, was struck by the number of times you moved. I, as a young man, worked on a moving truck for Allied Van Lines and we used to say that four moves equals a fire. You've been through it.

As NATO reflects—and you mentioned this a bit in your testimony—on the experience in Afghanistan, what are the major learnings from that experience and how do you see that reflecting itself in future activities?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, there are a couple of very positives that I think we should take from this experience. First of all, NATO in general and some of the partners has become much more interoperable. Much more of the troops have come up to the same level of standards. We use an acronym "TTP" for "tactics, techniques, and procedures". We have standardized tactics, techniques, and procedures. We have brought their special forces very close to the level of ours. Their joint tactical air controllers (JTAC) on the ground, are acting almost interchangeably with our U.S. JTACs.

I think the most positive gain out of a horrific situation is that our alliance has really begun to be much more jelled in its ability to employ interactively and mixed together because of the skill and capability of all.

Sir, I would tell you that's also my number one concern. You asked about my concerns. That is that if we come out of Afghanistan we cannot allow what we have gained to fall back because it was bought with precious time and effort of our people. I think it's going to be important for me, if confirmed, to keep pressure on not only defense investment, but to keep pressure on our ability to train together and keep the standard of excellence high so that we can remain interchangeable.

I believe one of the reasons that Libya went so well with NATO in the lead is because we have become so much more like each other in the way we do business.

Senator KING. I think that clearly is an important lesson.

Just to be clear on the record, you've talked several times about the grounding of the, I think, it's four squadrons you said in Europe. Is that because of the sequester?

Senator KING. Sir, that's because of the budget effects of sequester, that's correct. It's not just Europe. These squadrons are grounded in the United States. In your States we have squadrons grounded.

The lift and tanking squadrons are equally as affected. As was mentioned earlier, the effect of going from a fully mission capable air crew in a lift aircraft to an air crew that can simply do air-land, load, reload, it is a big effect on our military capability in a time, as has been captured by the chairman, a very volatile time.

Senator KING. You listed earlier all the qualifications that were being limited and the mission abilities that were being limited.

I think it's important to emphasize that the sequester is not a 1-year deal. At least it's not according to current law. If nothing happens, it keeps going. This condition that you are in, unless it's alleviated in some way, would continue and, in fact, accelerate.

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir. I think that in my specific command as we service not only Africa but Europe, but our mission in Africa is growing now, which is a strain as well on our budget.

Senator KING. I heard recently on the news a member, not of this body, but a member of our Government, characterized the sequester as a "home run". I hope this gentleman will talk to you about the effect on our readiness, on our retention, and on our military.

Another question, changing the subject, under your area of responsibility comes both Turkey and Israel. What's your assessment of the current relationship between Turkey and Israel, and are we headed for a better relationship? What are you hearing from your counterparts?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, a month ago I probably would have had a negative report. There has been some work done by our senior leadership and Israel has come forward and talked to some of the problems that they've had with Turkey in the past. I now am cautiously optimistic. I think that this relationship is headed in the right direction. If confirmed, I will continue to try to foster that relationship.

In my current capacity, I do today, because these are two incredible allies—Turkey is absolutely critical to us. Their geopolitical position, their moderate voice in this world—there are so many things about Turkey that are absolutely dear to us. We cannot have two of our most important allies in an adversarial state.

Senator KING. Thank you.

One final question. As we've been focused so much on the Middle East and on Afghanistan, attention has been shifted from the Balkans, which was a major area of concern a decade ago. What's the situation there? Are we comfortable with the circumstances and is there any need for concern or new attention to that region?

General BREEDLOVE. Sir, I would tell you that I am not comfortable with the Balkans. Progress has been made. We have brought the troops down to just about 5,000 now, of which about 800 are United States. We need to bring that down lower. But I have heard the situation in northern Kosovo described as stagnant. We were making progress and now we have slowed down in that progress. That worries me because I think that our Nations are a little weary of that situation and want to move on. What I don't think we can do is totally take our eyes off of a situation that if not watched could possibly go in a direction we don't want it to go.

I think that there are good things happening. There are great things happening in the training of the Kosovo Defense Force. But we need to keep our eye on the ball.

Senator KING. Thank you very much, General, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator King.

Senator Ayotte.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank you, General Breedlove and all of your family, for being here and for your service to our country.

I wanted to ask you about our relationship with Russia, and in particular looking at the advance questions, you described Russia will remain the primary actor of regional concern through 2020. Why do you believe that Russia is the primary actor of regional concern?

General BREEDLOVE. Thank you, Senator. I think that I would try to put that in some context, and that is that Russia remains a very important influence with many of the nations on its periphery and nations that have been leaning more west than east and have become good allies—not allies, but have been great partners with us in places like Afghanistan and others.

But these nations are clearly still tied to Russia for such things as energy needs, transportation, and others. There's lots of tentacles that go back and forth. Russia's ability to either help us or hinder us as we work with these nations I think is still very great.

I do and I have been quoted often saying that I think we would be better off if we quit treating Russia or thinking of Russia as an enemy and try to bring them into a partnership as we deal with Europe and other places around the world. Russia has been very helpful with us in counter-piracy and other things outside of the European theater. I think that Russia still has deep influence in Europe. We need to try to find out how to work with them, as opposed to at them.

Senator AYOTTE. General, one of the things I wanted to get your view on is you said we need to stop treating Russia as an enemy. That strikes me as in line with when the administration, the Obama administration, came into office, the whole reset of the Russian relations. Yet if you look at the Russians' actions both in the United Nations and also on numerous issues, we have not gotten the reaction that we had hoped. In fact, if you think about issues like the adoption issue that obviously all of us have heard from our constituents on, which is just outrageous, to use children to advance a policy objective like that or to somehow think that they're going to punish the United States.

I hear and I understand what you're saying, but we're not, in my view, getting the reaction that we would hope in turn from the behavior of the Russians. What is your view on that, and what are the differences that remain between us and how in your view are we going to improve our relationship with Russia in a way that protects our interests and those of our allies?

General BREEDLOVE. Ma'am, I could not agree with your assessment more. In fact, I've described the reset as sort of on pause. We had made some progress. There were some political changes in Russia and we are now sort of very much slowed down.

I think that we have to continue to reach out. I do agree with your concern that this not become a one-way street and that we just give, give, give. I think that the principle of reciprocity is how we need to think about our work with Russia. But I don't think that we should stop. We need to keep working with them.

As I mentioned, ma'am, before you were here, I have reached out to several very senior levels in their air force to establish dialogue so that we can begin to get some normalization of conversation and then do some military-to-military work. If confirmed, I will continue the effort as the SACEUR and as the Commander in Europe.

Senator AYOTTE. I would agree with you on the reciprocity issue very much, because I feel like it has been a one-way street at the moment. The Russians, for example, if you look at conflicts like Syria, could have a major influential role, and yet they are actually fueling that conflict with their arms provisions. It's outrageous really. I think in many instances they have as much the blood of some of the Syrians that are being murdered on their hands as the Assad regime. I can't imagine why Russia would want to stand for that.

One of the things that concerns me as well is the arms control agreements that we have with Russia. Do you understand whether, or if you can give us some insight, whether the Putin Government is in full compliance with all existing arms control agreements that we hold with them right now?

General BREEDLOVE. Ma'am, I could not comment on that at this time. But I will get back to you on that with a position and an answer.

Senator AYOTTE. I would appreciate that, because the administration, of course, has made some announcements in the press that there is some thought of further reducing our nuclear arsenal in some types of negotiations with the Russians. I think it's very important for us to understand what their posture is on existing arms agreements right now.

[The information referred to follows:]

Since U.S. European Command does not participate in the verification process for arms control treaties, I would refer you to the President's annual report, submitted through the Department of State, on "Adherence to and Compliance with Arms Control, Nonproliferation, and Disarmament Agreements and Commitments" required by section 403 of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, as amended (title 22, U.S.C., section 2593a).

Senator AYOTTE. I would also express the hope, to the extent you weigh in on these issues, that they would, the administration, would seek to go through Congress on these types of issues, particularly with what we see happening in the world right now. You have in your area of responsibility, of course, Israel, with Iran marching toward a nuclear weapon, what we have happening in North Korea. I think this is a very important issue for Congress to weigh into, rather than just a unilateral agreement between Russia and the administration.

Certainly in your role, if you're asked for advice, I hope that you will recommend that Congress be given the role, its constitutional role in this?

General BREEDLOVE. I will, Senator.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay, I appreciate that, General.

You talked about your area of responsibility with Israel and the relationship that you have had based on your experience with the Israeli military. Do you believe it's important that Israel maintain its qualitative military edge over any potential adversary in the region?

General BREEDLOVE. I do, Senator, and that is one of the primary duties of EUCOM, to continue to make sure that that is upheld.

Senator AYOTTE. Why is that critical in light of the position we are in right now?

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, I think that it's pretty clear to all that Israel is in a tough place and the neighborhood is unsettled. I think that the Arab Spring has further unsettled the area, and the strategic depth that we talk about Israel having or lacking is only getting less. We need to make sure that Israel is able to respond capably with the weapons that enable them.

Senator AYOTTE. When you're confirmed for this position, what do you think that you could do to further deepen our relationship with Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, I think that, building on the success of Austere Challenge 12, we made a huge leap forward in our ability to interact in missile defense. We have been doing exercises such as Juniper Falcon and others that I've participated in, and Juniper Stallion, which I flew in, where we bring the interoperability of our conventional forces closer together.

I believe we need to be very straightforward in our ability to interact with and come to those same TTPs we talked about before, make sure that our interoperability is high and our ability to support Israel is ready.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, General. I appreciate your being here today and look forward to supporting your nomination.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Kaine.

Senator KAINE. Thank you.

General Breedlove, what a treat to have you here, and to see your family and hear you talk about them with such pride is something that makes an impact on all of us. I have three youngsters, one a newly minted second lieutenant like one of your own and two artists. They all grew up eating the same food and breathing the same air, but they've all gone in very different directions, but we're proud of all of them.

I want to start where Senator McCain finished with you, which is as you look at these budgetary uncertainties, sequester, we can talk about Air Command units standing down. We can talk about the effect on logistical operations, refueling, and airlift capacity. We can talk about a lot of things in the here and now, but there is a concern about tomorrow as well.

As I talk to my son and his colleagues and others—recently I was at University of Virginia talking to a Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) group and one of the youngsters training to be an officer there said: I sign up voluntarily, knowing that I'm potentially going to face hostile fire, and I'm willing to do that. I'm willing to make a career decision that involves doing that. But I kind of have to wrestle with whether I want to make a career decision to do that if the support for me from Congress, budgetary support, is so uncertain.

That was kind of a chilling thought of anything that I've heard about sequester as I've traveled around the Commonwealth of Virginia, and I've heard a lot about it because we're so connected to the military. The thing that probably has struck me the most is what it is as a young person being willing to face hostile fire, but having to ask yourself the question of should I do it if I'm not sure whether Congress is going to be there with the right kind of budget support for the work that we do.

You testified about that a good bit already, but I'm really struck by that and it's a sobering thought for all of us. I wonder if you have any additional comment on that from what you've heard from your own troops?

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, you have it exactly right. Our troops, including my daughter and her husband, are concerned about these things and we've had these conversations. As I took over U.S. Air Force Europe and Air Force-Africa 9 months ago, the chief and I set a mantra: mission, airmen, families. We have to be able to keep the mission going. That is driving everything we do. But the way we get the mission done is through our airmen, and we have to set the airmen so that they can focus on their mission.

If the families are not set, the airmen are not going to be set. These are inextricably tied.

If confirmed, going forward in Europe, one of the concerns that I've talked about to my fellow commanders in Europe are the three things that my wife talks about every time we move: schools, housing, and access to medical care. If confirmed, Senator, that will be one of the first focus items I have across the broader EUCOM Command, because, as I said in the "Mission, Airmen, Families," if we can keep the family, which is at the base, squared away, then the airmen can focus on the mission, and that's where we have to be. In the case of EUCOM, then it would be our soldiers, sailors, airmen, marines, and coastguardsmen that we would be enabling.

Senator KAINE. Excellent, excellent.

Let me jump around a bit. What an awesome thing to be up for nomination to be SACEUR. Some pretty amazing people have had that title. That has to be—well, it's a good thing, but it's a humbling thing, too.

Talk to me a little bit about that role, and in particular NATO lessons learned from Libya? You describe them in a positive way. We did well because we've gotten to be so much like one another in the way we approach these challenges. I'd like you to talk a little bit about that, what you meant by that, but then how you see that relationship going forward. To the extent that sequester and other budgetary uncertainty potentially jeopardize some of what we might be able to do in that NATO combined operation, I'd love to hear your thoughts.

General BREEDLOVE. Thank you, Senator. Very shortly, I would also say that, if confirmed, I would find myself sitting behind the desk that Eisenhower sat behind. I would tell you that my father from the State of Georgia would roll over in his grave at that thought, and some of my grammar school and high school teachers probably as well.

Sir, as far as Libya and NATO, as in almost every case, there are good things that we learned and there are bad things that we learned. I highlighted a couple of the good things previously and those are that we have trained so much together and now we have fought beside each other in Afghanistan and other places for some time. What has happened is it has enabled us to be much more seamless across being able to employ the NATO force and being able to interchange NATO people, having a Belgian officer be your deputy commander and having a French officer be your chief of operations and having a German officer being your intelligence officer, and expecting that we would be able to execute at a very high level because of that interoperability. I think that's very important.

Not to highlight the bad, but there are some bad things. What we did learn is that the depth of some of our partner nations and especially their sustainment to the fight is not very deep. We have work to do in weapons and the amount of weapons. We have work to do in very critical enablers that are going to be required for any force—air-to-air refueling capability and others.

I think probably the most glaring thing we need to work on as an alliance is intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance. You can be very proud of your joint force. There is no one that does it like us. What we don't want to do is be the only supplier of that superb capability. We want to bring others along.

If confirmed, Senator, those are going to be center in the heart of the shot pattern for what I'll do in NATO.

Senator KAINE. One of the expectations that I would have as a Senator from Virginia, obviously, is the Allied Command Transformation is in Norfolk and so the working relationship with General Palomeros is something we would care deeply about as well.

The Aegis ballistic missile defense system also has a Virginia tie to Dahlgren, where much of the research and work is done. That's a critical part of EUCOM's ability to address the ballistic missile defense issues. Could you give us just a quick update on the Phased Adaptive Approach?

General BREEDLOVE. Thank you, Senator. Yes, sir. Right now, as I mentioned earlier, the announcement that Phases 1, 2, and 3 are firmly on track is a good one. The investments required to start Phase 2 are on track for putting in that first Aegis Ashore, as we call it. I believe that right now on Phases 1, 2, and 3 I have positive reports on how we're proceeding.

Senator KAINE. Finally, I'll just comment that I agree with comments you've made earlier. I think the U.S.-Turkey relationship is one of the most strategically important right now, both because of the region, but also because of Turkey's important role in NATO. I was heartened to hear your comments and heartened to hear other reports that suggest that the Turkey-Israel relationship, which has been quite frosty—for a long time the military-to-military connection has been quite positive, but it's been quite frosty—seems to be getting better.

Your testimony about Israel is also welcome. I'm going to be with Ambassador Oren, the Israeli Ambassador to the United States, tonight, introducing him to a large group of people in Richmond. He will be happy to hear of the importance you accord that relationship in your testimony.

Thank you for your service and I look forward to supporting you.

General BREEDLOVE. Thank you, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Kaine.

I just have one question. Senator Inhofe has a question or two that he'll ask in round two, and then we'll be able, I think, to leave here in time to get over to vote at 11 a.m.

General, you and I have spoken in my office about what are called residual value payments. We recently completed a committee report regarding the expenditures which we've made in certain facilities overseas that are being returned to a host nation and the improvement in those investments and the payments which are made by those host nations for those improvements.

Under our law, those payments must be directed towards offsetting operation and maintenance costs and they must be directed according to law towards military construction projects which are identified in the Future Years Defense Plan, and they have to be used for Department priorities that are specified.

Will you take a look at this issue and read this report when it comes out, because there's been some real significant problems in terms of the use of those payments, which are identified in our report. So you can get back to us after you have read that. Will you do that?

General BREEDLOVE. I will, sir. I did some work with this last night. I'm much smarter now about it. I understand that our staffs have cooperated to get this report out and I do commit to you to get to that report early if confirmed and get back to you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I wasn't going to ask another question until Senator Kaine asked a question. In fact, I'd say the only answer that you gave during the course of this hearing that I would disagree with is your answer to Senator Kaine. We all know and I don't think anyone questions now that our intelligence assessment, going way back to 2007, that Iran would have the capability along with a delivery system by 2015—that's been consistent. I've often said that it's probably going to be earlier than that, judging from the miscalculation our intelligence made way back in 1998 on North Korea's ability to fire a multi-stage rocket, when they were off by 5 years.

Anyway, I think that we can say that 2015's a critical time. Then, of course, I disagree with the changes that took place 4 years ago in terms of the ground-based interceptor in Poland. But assuming that we are where we are right now—and you talk about Phase 1, Phase 2, and Phase 3. I understand that in the SM–3 Block 1A, we're already there, then 2015 for the 1B.

But then the SM–3 Block 2A, which would be necessary for the protection of our NATO allies, is not scheduled until 2018. We have a 3-year period that concerns me. I'd like to have you tell me how you think you'd like to address that 3-year period, if that concerns you, if that increases risk, and of course risk means lives.

General BREEDLOVE. Senator, you're absolutely right about my answer. My answer was not about the timing in relation to the threat, let me make that clear. What I was trying to answer Senator Kaine, was that the program and the schedule to accomplish the things that we are doing——

Senator INHOFE. Is on course?

General BREEDLOVE.—is on course.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, I understand. But I'm suggesting the course is wrong.

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir. I understand that question completely now, and there are concerns about getting the appropriate coverage at the appropriate time. I think that one of the things we are having to do right now is talk to our fellow European nations about their contribution to EPAA and their bringing some capability to the task early.

I am encouraged by the fact that we have our Dutch friends upgrading four of their cruisers to Aegis-class capability to help us in this battle. I am also encouraged by the fact that several of the nations, France, Germany, and others, are looking at voluntary national contribution of not only their short-range capability, but some of their radars.

I don't want to take too much of your time, but I do see positive movement in the nations leaning forward now to be a contributing part both kinetically and as basing nations in this effort.

Senator INHOFE. I know this is not directly in your new position, but you're the expert in this and I appreciate your background and knowledge. I would think that if you're looking for that 3-year gap to be filled by more assertive progress from our NATO allies, they're the ones that are at risk. Is there any reason they would not do everything they can to help fill that 3-year gap?

Now, obviously the chairman wouldn't want me to get into the third site discussion and I'm not going to do that. But on this one, I would think that they would be the ones that would want to go out of their way and do what is necessary, specifically looking at that 3-year gap.

General BREEDLOVE. I agree with you, Senator, and I think Admiral Stavridis has said in the past that the store is open, we're ready for your contributions. If confirmed, I will continue the pressure that he's already started on our allied nations to help us bring that capability to the table.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Kaine, you all set?

Senator KAINE. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. We have standard questions which we ask of our military nominees, which I'll ask you now, in order to make sure that this committee and other committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information. Here are the questions:

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, Senator.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

General BREEDLOVE. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

General BREEDLOVE. I have not.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

General BREEDLOVE. I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

General BREEDLOVE. I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

General BREEDLOVE. They will.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

General BREEDLOVE. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

General BREEDLOVE. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Yes, Senator Inhofe?

Senator INHOFE. Just one comment. Of the questions the chairman asked you, the most difficult one is the second one. You have answered that correctly, but that's the most difficult one because you still have a Commander in Chief. We understand the line of command. Yet there are some things that we'll need to know, particularly with the upcoming activity we'll have, for your honest answer, and we'll be looking forward to that.

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Those are the answers we received today even before you were confirmed. So we know you'll continue in that same vein after you're confirmed, which we would hope and expect will be very promptly.

We thank you. We thank your family and those many folks who have come here today to support you.

We will stand adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 10:59 a.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, USAF, by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and the chain of command by clearly delineating the combatant commanders' responsibilities and authorities and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions or the Special Operations reforms?

Answer. Successful operations around the world from Iraq and Afghanistan to Libya demonstrated the importance of Goldwater-Nichols. I learned the importance and value of joint training early in my career as an air liaison officer working with the Army in 1985. I am convinced the success of all of our operations over the past years is directly attributable to the joint training and doctrine that came out of Goldwater-Nichols. I do not see the need for modifications at this time.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I do not see the need for modifications at this time.

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Commander, U.S. European Command (EUCOM) and NATO's Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR)?

Answer. The Commander of the U.S. European Command is responsible for giving authoritative direction to subordinate commands and forces necessary to carry out all U.S. military operations and activities across the 51 independent states in the European Command Area of Responsibility (AOR) in pursuit of U.S. national military objectives. This AOR includes all of Europe (including Turkey), the Caucasus Region, and Israel. The commander is also responsible for the health, welfare and security of the approximately 64,000 servicemembers forward deployed within that AOR.

The NATO North Atlantic Council and Military Committee assigns specific roles and duties to SACEUR. These include:

- Overall command of all NATO military operations regardless of geographic boundaries.

• Strategic planning to include military planning for the full range of Alliance missions and contributions to crisis management and effective defense of NATO territory and forces.
• Identifying and requesting forces for the full range of Alliance missions.
• Strategic Analysis: In conjunction with Supreme Allied Commander for Transformation, supports NATO's Defense Planning Process and conducts strategic level analysis to identify and prioritize type and scale of NATO's critical capability shortfalls.
• Operational Leadership: Executes military measures within the capability of the command to preserve or restore the security of NATO nations.
• Transformation: Cooperates with the Supreme Allied Commander for Transformation (SAC–T) on integrating transformation efforts.
• Crisis Management. Continually monitors and analyses the international environment to anticipate crises, and where appropriate, take active steps to prevent them from becoming larger conflicts.
• Strategic engagement and partnership building: Develops and participates in military-to-military contacts and other cooperation activities with NATO partners around the globe.
• In conjunction with Supreme Allied Commander for Transformation, conducts combined and joint training and exercises. This role will be critical to the implementation of the NATO connected forces initiative designed to maintain interoperable forces in the post ISAF environment.

The responsibilities of the Commander EUCOM and the SACEUR are complementary. The fact that they have traditionally been vested in one officer facilitates near-seamless coordination between the U.S. and NATO military command structures.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. As Commander, U.S. Forces in Europe, Commander, U.S. Air Forces Africa, and Commander, NATO Allied Air Command, in addition to my six previous assignments in Europe, I have had the privilege of working closely with our joint forces, NATO Allies, and coalition partners. During these assignments, I have had the opportunity to meet with several Ministers and Chiefs of Defense in Europe, providing me a unique opportunity to develop lasting relationships. Recent operations in Europe and Africa have continued to reinforce my belief in the criticality of these partnerships and inspired confidence in future of U.S. and European relations. If confirmed, I believe my knowledge of the region and familiarity with the Alliance, coupled with these personal relationships, will enhance my ability to perform command duties for both EUCOM and Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe (SHAPE), and contribute to our Nations' shared security objectives.

Question. Do you believe that there are any steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform the duties of the Commander, EUCOM, or NATO SACEUR?

Answer. If confirmed, I will engage with key officials and personnel within the executive and legislative branches of the U.S. Government to uphold and advance the national policies and interests of the United States in the European theater. To this end, I will also engage with the governments and militaries of our allies to understand the magnitude and interdependent issues within the region. I will seek the cooperation of the Alliance leadership to work together to engage on vital regional issues. I will also continuously improve my understanding of the history and culture of the region.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense and from the Secretary of Defense to the combatant commands. Other sections of law and traditional practice, however, establish important relationships outside the chain of command. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Commander, EUCOM/NATO SACEUR, to the following:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Secretary of Defense exercises authority over the Armed Forces of the United States through the EUCOM Commander for those forces assigned to the EUCOM AOR. The EUCOM Commander exercises command authority over assigned forces and is directly responsible to the Secretary of Defense for the performance of assigned missions and the preparedness of the Command.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Deputy Secretary of Defense is delegated full power and authority to act for the Secretary of Defense and to exercise the powers of the Secretary on any and all matters for which the Secretary is authorized to act pursuant to law. The EUCOM Commander coordinates and exchanges information with the Deputy Secretary on matters delegated by the Secretary. The Commander directly communicates with the Deputy Secretary on a regular basis.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

Answer. A direct command relationship between the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the EUCOM Commander does not exist. However, the EUCOM Commander regularly interacts, coordinates and exchanges information with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy on policy issues relating to NATO, European, and Eurasian affairs. The Commander directly communicates with the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy on a regular basis.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence.

Answer. There is not a direct command relationship between the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence and the EUCOM Commander. However, the EUCOM Commander regularly interacts with, coordinates and exchanges information with the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence on intelligence related matters.

Question. The Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

Answer. There is not a direct command relationship between the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs and the EUCOM Commander. The EUCOM Commander and the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs work together on coordinating international security policy and strategy.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Chairman functions under the authority, direction and control of the President and Secretary of Defense. The Chairman transmits communications between the President and Secretary of Defense and the EUCOM Commander, as well as oversees the activities of the EUCOM Commander as directed by the Secretary of Defense. As the principal military advisor to the President and the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman is a key conduit between the combatant commander, interagency, and Service Chiefs.

The EUCOM Commander keeps the Chairman informed on significant issues regarding NATO and the EUCOM AOR. The Commander directly communicates with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on a regular basis.

Question. The Secretaries of the Military Departments.

Answer. The Secretaries of Military Departments are responsible for administration and support of forces that are assigned or attached to the EUCOM Commander. The Secretaries fulfill their responsibilities by exercising administrative control (ADCON) through the Service Component Commands assigned to EUCOM.

Question. The other combatant commanders, in particular Commander, U.S. Central Command and Commander, U.S. Africa Command.

Answer. Formal relationships between the EUCOM Commander and the geographic and functional combatant commanders derive from command authority established by title 10, U.S.C., section 164. Combatant commanders closely coordinate as necessary to accomplish all assigned missions.

Question. The NATO Secretary General.

Answer. The NATO Secretary General is appointed by the 28 Alliance Heads of State and Government. He chairs the North Atlantic Council, the principal decisionmaking body of the Alliance. The SACEUR carries out roles and missions assigned by the North Atlantic Council, and directly communicates with the Secretary General on a regular basis.

Question. Commander, International Security Assistance Force.

Answer. The EUCOM Commander has no formal relationship with Commander, ISAF; however, Commander, ISAF, is "dual-hatted": 1. As the Commander U.S. Forces in Afghanistan he reports to Commander, U.S. CENTCOM (national command and control); 2. The Supreme Allied Commander, Europe exercises command authority over the Commander, ISAF, via the Commander, Joint Forces Command Brunssum, in the Netherlands (operational command and control).

Question. The Supreme Allied Commander for Transformation.

Answer. Both NATO's Strategic Commanders, SACEUR and Supreme Allied Commander Transformation (SAC–T), carry out roles and missions assigned to them by the North Atlantic Council. SACEUR and SAC–T work together to ensure the transformation of NATO's military capabilities and interoperability that support Allied Command Operations.

Question. The North Atlantic Council.

Answer. The North Atlantic Council is the principal policy and decisionmaking body of NATO. SACEUR carries out roles and missions assigned by the North Atlantic Council.

Question. The U.S. Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council.

Answer. There is not a direct command relationship between the U.S. Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council and either the EUCOM Commander or the SACEUR. The North Atlantic Council provides direction to NATO military authorities and the U.S. Permanent Representative is 1 of 28 members of the North Atlantic Council. The EUCOM Commander works with the U.S. Permanent Representative on matters of mutual interest, such as EUCOM military operations and security cooperation activities that support U.S. objectives and military contributions to NATO.

MAJOR CHALLENGES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges and problems you would confront if confirmed as the next Commander, EUCOM, and SACEUR?

Answer. If confirmed, one of the biggest challenges I will face is managing the evolution of NATO, specifically past its operational focus in Afghanistan. The Alliance has evolved from a Cold War construct to one with ambitious aspirations and capabilities after integrating former Warsaw Pact and Eastern European Soviet Republics and building an out of area expeditionary capability. As EUCOM Commander, my challenge is to work diligently to support the broader U.S. Government effort to ensure that the Alliance makes the right choices to maintain its capability, capacity, and credibility.

The second challenge is the impact of the sequestration reductions and the continuation of those reductions in the out years. Sequestration negatively affects both theater operations and EUCOM's ability to support the U.S. Defense Strategy by further reducing an already declining budget. This includes an increased risk to access, degradation of the security cooperation relationships forged over numerous years, and reduced partner participation in operations.

The third challenge is the potential for a long-term continuation of the Arab Spring and its impact to Israel's shrinking strategic depth. Currently Iranian's malign influence in the politics of Syria and Lebanon are a constant concern. Of specific concern for Israel, aside from Iran's nuclear ambitions, are security considerations relative to Syrian chemical weapons and high end conventional weapons, the decline in influence of Egypt's military and the resulting instability in the Sinai and the strength of Lebanese Hezbollah. This instability will remain throughout the region for some time. Our challenge is to lead the military effort to assure Israel of U.S. resolve to guarantee its security.

The fourth challenge I see is the security impact of the European economic crisis. The result of the financial crises upon European militaries is magnified as national Gross Domestic Products (GDP) have fallen, and the percentage of GDP dedicated to defense spending has been cut as governments struggle to deal with reduced revenue and increasing deficits.

The fifth challenge I see is the growing asymmetric terrorist threat in Europe from al Qaeda and other Islamist extremist groups with extensive ties to Western Europe. Europe is an important venue for recruitment, financing, and attacking U.S. and western interests. The effects of the financial crisis and austerity measures on countries with historical terrorism and anarchism could spark new forms of politically and economically-driven terrorism.

The sixth challenge I see is dealing with Russia, which remains an aspirational superpower but is hindered by endemic deficiencies. Russia will remain the primary actor of regional concern through 2020 by virtue of its geographic position, natural resource wealth, military forces, and desire for regional influence. However, a number of systemic deficiencies, such as mounting internal stressors—politico-economic, socio-cultural, and demographic—will continue to challenge its aspirations. The U.S. and NATO will need to continue to assure our allies and partners, who live in the Russian self-declared "sphere of privileged influence," of our resolve.

The seventh challenge I see is the continued risk of conflict in the Caucasus and Balkans. Chronic ethnic enmity, virulent Islamism/Islamist influence coupled with socio-economic privations, and the general intractability of grievances plague the Caucasus and Balkans to varying degrees. Our challenge is to carefully encourage our European Allies and partners to continue their commitments to regional security, while encouraging the development of security capabilities that do not exacerbate local tensions.

Another important issue is improving our comprehensive readiness to face 21st century challenges, specifically the threat of malicious cyber activity. Our primary focus here should be assisting our allies and partners in the defense of their critical information systems, and to develop and mature their cyber defense capabilities, programs, and processes.

The last significant challenge I see is maintaining our force laydown in today's austere environment. While combat forces receive the bulk of attention during force restructuring, the capabilities garnered from critical enablers (i.e., medical, police, intelligence, logistics) are equally as important. The challenge we have is balancing our strategic pivot to the East while highlighting the critical role our European force structure plays in assuring Allies and guaranteeing continued U.S. access to a critical region of the world. This access will remain important to U.S.-led global operations across multiple theaters, and cannot be guaranteed if we abdicate our European footprint.

Question. If confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges and problems?

Answer. Despite budget reductions, EUCOM must be at the forefront of revitalizing and supporting NATO, highlighting the critical role the U.S. partnership plays to ensure the Alliance's credibility, particularly with regard to our Article 5 commitments. A significant component of this effort will be our role in a renewed commitment to the NATO Response Force. This commitment will ensure our NATO allies continue to meet high standards for interoperability and readiness. We can also incorporate NATO Smart Defense initiatives into our planning process, to guide our engagement and help ensure that NATO forces maintain a credible mix of expeditionary forces.

Next, we must recognize the unique opportunity the economic downturn presents to help European nations examine defense and force structure inefficiencies. Stark fiscal realities leave political room for serious force structure and capability changes consistent with the vision of Smart Defense. We must also continue to coordinate our efforts across a broad spectrum of actors, specifically with the interagency and other geographic and functional commands. This cooperation can be expanded, as we leverage NATO training and standardization as a global benchmark for interoperability.

As a command, we must continue to invest in interagency cooperation and collaboration to reinforce a whole-of-government approach to numerous challenges. We must also look for ways to enhance security cooperation planning by working with those allies who conduct security cooperation consistent with our interests.

Next, we will emphasize civilian-military opportunities for nation engagement, particularly in the areas of disaster preparedness and foreign consequence management by leveraging private entities. This will encourage regional approaches to collaboration within areas like the Balkans and Caucasus in order to bolster stability.

We must also emphasize technology and innovation to provide a backstop to decreasing resources, while diminishing our vulnerabilities to new asymmetric threats. The growing cyber threat must be addressed, while seeking ways to mitigate the loss of valuable border protections within the European theater. These physical border protections in many cases no longer exist. Technological solutions to tracking illicit materials, such as biological, chemical and radiological agents, must be found.

Finally, we must continue to seek zones of cooperation with Russia. Successful avenues to date have included the Arctic Council, health and bio-surveillance arenas, combating terrorism, and counter-piracy. We must encourage Russia to play a more constructive role in European and global security and foreign policy.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT STRATEGIC GUIDANCE

Question. The January 2012 Department of Defense (DOD) Strategic Guidance, entitled "Sustaining U.S. Global Leadership: Priorities for 21st Century Defense," discusses the importance of Europe as "our principal partner in seeking global and economic security." At the same time, the DOD Strategic Guidance calls for a rebalancing of U.S. military posture toward the Asia-Pacific and Middle East regions.

Do you agree with the strategy outlined in the January 2012 DOD Strategic Guidance?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. In your view what will be the major impact of that strategy on EUCOM and what changes, if any, would EUCOM need to make to implement that strategy?

Answer. The January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance mentions Europe and NATO prominently, and with good reason. As it says on page 2, "Europe is home to some of America's most stalwart allies and partners, many of whom have sacrificed alongside U.S. forces in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere." Europe is primarily a security producer, rather than a consumer, and EUCOM's strategy must endeavor to bolster this ability and commitment to providing security. To this end, one of EUCOM's key priorities is sustaining the U.S. relationship with its highly capable allies, as well as the sustainment of those allies who have recently developed capabilities and interoperability with U.S. forces. EUCOM will also look to grow its links to NATO, bolstering the viability of this vital Alliance, which will serve to ensure that European nations continue to approach global security issues through the NATO Alliance, and ensure that European and U.S. viewpoints are weighed together in the decisionmaking process. By bringing attention to the deep and valuable contributions of the Euro-Atlantic Alliance to U.S. national security and global security efforts, EUCOM supports the unique and valuable role that these contributions make, and the strategic access and global reach they provide.

In order to implement this strategy, EUCOM must look to develop low-cost, innovative ways to emphasize force interoperability, while encouraging European allies to conserve resources by adopting the NATO "Smart Defense" program. One of these new methods will be the reinvigorated U.S. contribution to the NATO Response Force (NRF), which will mitigate force structure reductions in Europe by sustaining and improving interoperability. Over the long term, the NRF will be a vital asset for post-ISAF interoperability and NATO's Connected Forces Initiative. The NRF will also serve as a valuable tool for evaluating the status of European forces. As the most likely companions in any security effort, from humanitarian assistance to full-spectrum conflict, the United States must have confidence in the interoperability and readiness of European forces.

The planned reduction of NATO forces supporting ISAF, combined with U.S. reinvigoration in the NRF, provides a unique opportunity for EUCOM to support NATO's Connected Forces Initiative and make adjustments to both commands' exercise programs, committing to exercising high-end capabilities and training. Conducting exercises that test these high-end capabilities, once common, have reduced markedly in the face of operational commitments. Exercises that bring together several NATO nations, focused on advanced training objectives that exercise a joint force across a broad spectrum of threats, will ensure NATO force relevance and flexibility. After 10 years of combat deployments against an asymmetric enemy, NATO will need to dedicate itself to flexible training that emphasizes underutilized skill sets (for example, naval and air warfare), while incorporating lessons learned from recent conflicts. Additionally, a small EUCOM investment in some of these exercises provides the opportunity for newer (i.e. Eastern European) members of the Alliance, as well as other NATO partners, to pair with more mature Allies, continuing to burden-share security cooperation while raising the overall quality of NATO forces.

In response to shared environments of fiscal austerity, NATO has embraced the idea of collective resource pooling through the Smart Defense initiative. Alignment of EUCOM engagement with NATO capability targets will ensure U.S. bilateral efforts complement NATO's multilateral efforts. Through this improved cooperation, EUCOM can reinforce NATO's efforts to maintain a credible mix of expeditionary forces available for burden-sharing in conflicts that would otherwise be shouldered by U.S. forces alone. Supporting an initiative such as Smart Defense should not come at the expense of jeopardizing NATO's Article 5 commitments and defense spending requirements. EUCOM must ensure waste or unnecessary capabilities are trimmed and strengths are retained. EUCOM should engage with the Smart Defense structure to ensure a holistic approach to future NATO capability requirements.

Finally, EUCOM has an opportunity to enhance its security cooperation planning by reaching out to Allies who are themselves conducting some level of security cooperation in the theater. EUCOM can work together with these nations to openly discuss mutual goals and plans and gain efficiencies from knowing what engagements other nations are performing in various regions, what effects are desired in these regions, and what partnering possibilities exist for theater-wide security cooperation. Fiscal reality drives this consideration, but so does strategic sense. Such cooperation can help to smooth future operational interaction and pair high-end allies with developing nations to establish theater relationships that will bolster European security and reduce U.S. resource commitments.

NATO COMMITMENTS ON AFGHANISTAN TRANSITION

Question. At the NATO Summit in Chicago in May, NATO members committed to promoting a stable and secure Afghanistan and to "preventing Afghanistan from ever again becoming a safe haven for terrorists that threaten Afghanistan, the region, and the world." NATO members also reaffirmed their commitment to the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) mission in Afghanistan through 2014, when the transition to Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF) having the security lead throughout Afghanistan will be completed and the NATO combat mission will end.

Do you agree with the goals and transition plan for the ISAF mission endorsed at the NATO Chicago Summit?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. What are the major challenges you foresee, if confirmed as the next Commander, EUCOM and SACEUR, in implementing the transition plan for Afghanistan?

Answer. Over the next 20 months, we must fully recruit, field and ensure the sustainment of the ANSF while we shift the main effort for security lead to the Afghans in 2013. We must prepare for the Afghan Presidential election, while redeploying thousands of ISAF forces and restructuring our basing posture so that we are ready for the post-2014 mission.

Question. How would you address these challenges, if confirmed?

Answer. I would continue the work in progress, and ensure that redeployment mechanisms and routes are feasible and practical for ISAF forces.

BUILDING AND SUSTAINING THE AFGHAN NATIONAL SECURITY FORCES

Question. The NATO Training Mission in Afghanistan (NTM–A) is responsible for building the ANSF to an end strength of 352,000 by this fall, consisting of 195,000 Afghan National Army soldiers and 157,000 Afghan National Police personnel.

What is your assessment of the NATO Training Mission in Afghanistan, and what changes, if any, would you recommend for the NTM–A, if confirmed?

Answer. The NATO Training Mission in Afghanistan or NTM–A is truly a success story. It has changed over time as the ANSF capability has developed, and will continue to do so.

Question. In your assessment, are the current target end strengths for the ANA and ANP sufficient for Afghan security forces to assume full responsibility for security and stability in Afghanistan by 2014?

Answer. Yes, they are. The target strengths are important, but so are the quality, capabilities, and competence of the force. Improving these aspects will be a significant part of the Security Force Assistance Teams work from now until the end of 2014, and beyond in the post-2014 mission.

Question. At the NATO Chicago Summit, the ISAF participating countries called for future reductions in the size of the ANSF after 2014 to be "conditions-based." At the same time, the ISAF participating countries discussed a "preliminary model" for the future size of the ANSF of around 230,000, with an estimated annual cost of $4.1 billion, which would be subject to regular review in light of security developments.

Do you agree that any reductions in the ANSF after 2014 from an end strength of 352,000 need to be conditions-based in light of the security situation in Afghanistan at the time the reductions would occur?

Answer. The size and balance of capabilities across the ANSF after 2014 will ultimately be a decision for the sovereign Government of Afghanistan. The financial contributions by the current ISAF nations and other countries need to be channeled through a transparent and accountable mechanism that is open to audit by those contributing Nations.

Question. What should be NATO's role in assessing the security conditions in Afghanistan for purposes of determining future force requirements for the ANSF after 2014?

Answer. The future force requirements for the ANSF after 2014 will be a decision for the sovereign Government of Afghanistan, with assistance and advice from the post-2014 NATO led International Training, Advisory, and Assistance Mission.

NATO TRAINING MISSION IN AFGHANISTAN POST-2014

Question. In your view, what should be the objectives and priorities for a possible NATO training mission in Afghanistan post-2014?

Answer. The objectives and priorities were agreed by NATO Nations and partners in the North Atlantic Council (NAC) Initiating Directive at the Defense Ministerial meeting last October and reaffirmed in the February Defense Ministerial meeting. The NATO-led post-2014 engagement will train, advise, and assist the Afghan National Security Forces in line with the NATO–Afghanistan Enduring Partnership declaration.

Question. If confirmed, what recommendations, if any, would you have for modifying the NATO training mission in Afghanistan after 2014?

Answer. There is still much work to be completed on the post-2014 mission. In particular, the Concept of Operations is currently being developed for endorsement by the Military Committee and subsequent approval by the North Atlantic Council. Once this is approved, the Operation Plan will be developed.

INSIDER THREAT IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. The recent rise in the number of attacks by individuals in Afghan uniform on U.S. and coalition soldiers, so-called "green-on-blue" attacks, has raised concerns about the safety of our soldiers and the success of the transition plans in Afghanistan. ISAF and Afghan military leaders have announced a number of new or expanded precautions to address the insider threat, including increased Afghan counterintelligence efforts to identify Taliban infiltrators, additional cultural sensitivity training, and expanding the "Guardian Angel" program to protect against the insider threat in meetings between coalition and Afghan forces.

To what do you attribute the recent increase in the number of green-on-blue attacks?

Answer. These attacks are an insurgent tactic, just like the threat of Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs).

Question. What is your assessment of the measures that have been taken to address the insider threat?

Answer. We have analyzed these attacks, and developed tactics, techniques, and procedures to counter them. The measures we have taken to mitigate these attacks in conjunction with the Afghans are working. (20 incidents July–September 12, 10 incidents October–December 13, 3 incidents January–March 13)

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps, if any, would you recommend?

Answer. It is important to recognize that the number of insider attacks has decreased since the summer of last year (20 incidents July–September, 10 incidents October–December, 3 incidents January–March). The measures taken across the force are having a positive impact, and I want to ensure we continue to aggressively implement those measures while maintaining the strong personal bonds that have proven effective at the tactical level.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of these insider attacks on morale among U.S. and allied forces in theater?

Answer. These attacks do have the potential to damage trust between collation and Afghan forces, however close cooperation and our strong relationship with the ANSF have been invaluable to tackling this common threat.

Question. In light of the insider threat, do you believe ISAF should reconsider its plan to embed small units of U.S. and coalition military personnel with Afghan military units to advise and assist those units as the Afghan forces transition to the security lead?

Answer. No. The plan is correct and will ensure the ANSF continue to advance their military capability. The security of U.S. and coalition military personnel is improved by building close personal relationships with the ANSF they advise and assist.

EUCOM'S STRATEGIC MISSIONS

Question. In your view, what are the key strategic missions of U.S. European Command?

Answer. We derive our key strategic missions from the Command's formal mission statement: "U.S. European Command conducts military operations, international military engagement, and interagency partnering to enhance transatlantic security and defend the United States forward." Given this mission statement, as well as the Guidance for Employment of the Force issued by the Office of the Secretary of Defense, EUCOM's key strategic missions are:

- Posture EUCOM forces to execute high-priority contingency operations;
- Sustain the trust, relationships and interoperability forged over the past decade with our Allies and partners; aligning our efforts with NATO Targets and Partnership Goals;
- Contribute EUCOM forces and enable European force generation to support an effective and responsible transition in Afghanistan, ensuring Afghanistan's security while assuring our NATO allies and partner nations of the U.S. commitment;
- Nurture strategic relationships and maintain the necessary force posture to enable continued access—thereby ensuring United States freedom of action and global reach;
- Prevent violent extremist organizations (VEOs) from establishing footholds in Europe or obtaining or using weapons of mass destruction; through close coordination with the other global and functional combatant commands, minimize the seams that these VEO's often operate in;
- Advance NATO European Ballistic Missile Defense through an integrated approach built on balanced contributions;

- Ensure secure cyber access to enable our other missions and improve collaborative information sharing across all security levels;
- Combat transnational organized crime to reduce the effects of trafficking and the monies available to fund illicit activities;
- Support continued defense reform and prevent the escalation of local crises into regional conflicts, particularly in the Balkans and Caucasus.

Considering these missions in the context of near-term challenges, EUCOM derives the following Command priorities:

- Ensure readiness to execute EUCOM's high-priority contingency operations;
- Preserve our strategic partnerships to include;
  - Sustain our relationship with high-end allies ensuring a strong NATO Alliance;
  - Preserve the recently developed partner capability and interoperability;
  - Maintain regional stability and security;
- Enable a successful ISAF transition;
- Counter transnational threats, focusing on missile defense, weapons of mass destruction, counter-terrorism, illicit trafficking, counter-piracy and threats from cyberspace;
- Maintain United States' strategic access across Europe in support of global operations;
- Focus on four key countries:
  - Israel, to maintain a strong partnership;
  - Russia, to encourage areas of cooperation;
  - Turkey, to reinvigorate our relationship;
  - Poland, to enhance the realization of its potential.

U.S. FORCE STRUCTURE IN EUROPE

Question. The January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance stated that there is a strategic opportunity to "rebalance the U.S. military investment in Europe." Currently there are approximately 70,000 U.S. military personnel stationed in the European area of responsibility. In January, the Department of Defense announced additional reductions in U.S. forces in Europe, including the drawdown of two of the four Army Brigade Combat Teams (BCTs) stationed in Europe by the end of 2013 and the inactivation of one A–10 squadron from Germany in 2013. In addition, U.S. Army Europe has plans to consolidate and reduce its footprint from 16 garrisons today to 7 garrisons by 2017.

In answer to questions in advance of the hearing in July on his nomination to be Chief of Staff of the Air Force, then-U.S. Air Forces Europe Commander General Mark Welsh said that he would support further consideration of reductions and consolidation opportunities in the Air Force posture in Europe.

Do you support the reductions in U.S. force posture in Europe announced earlier this year?

Answer. Yes. The risk posed by the force reductions announced in 2012 is manageable, and can be reasonably mitigated by employing rotational forces, to include a CONUS-based brigade fully dedicated to NATO, as well as implementing the posture initiatives described below. Our successful efforts to revitalize the transatlantic link, our unwavering commitment to the defense of Europe, and 65 years of transatlantic cooperation have lowered threat levels on the continent, and continue to serve the United States as a vital geostrategic platform to support our enduring global security requirements. Combined with the drawdown of operations in Afghanistan, this creates a strategic opportunity to modernize the U.S. military investment in Europe, moving from a focus on current conflicts toward a focus on future capabilities. While maintaining our enduring relationships and security commitments, our force structure in Europe is evolving to meet a broad range of 21st century challenges, including missile defense, cyber security, counterterrorism, and countering weapons of mass destruction. To that end, as announced previously, the plan is to enhance EUCOM's ability to address ballistic missile threats by forward stationing four Aegis-Ballistic Missile Defense (BMD) capable ships in Spain and establishing land-based SM–3 BMD sites in Romania and Poland, which adds to the capabilities already provided by the AN/TPY–2 radar in Turkey. Additionally, we will enhance the responsiveness of Special Operations Forces in the region (increasing our overall air and ground capabilities in Europe). We also recently established an aviation detachment in Poland, enhancing their fixed wing training opportunities.

Question. Do you believe that additional reductions in U.S. forces stationed in Europe, including the Army and the Air Force, should be considered consistent with EUCOM's key strategic missions?

Answer. We must ensure that our posture adapts and evolves in ways that respond to, and anticipate, changes in the international security environment. The persistence of conflict, the diffusion of power around the world, the proliferation of nuclear and other weapons technologies, and rising pressures on the freedom of the global commons pose new security challenges that require innovative adjustments to our defense posture. To this end, we will seek a new cooperative architecture, one that generates opportunities to work together with allies and partners on shared regional and global security opportunities and challenges. We'll continue to align our posture to achieve our national strategy goals and objectives.

Question. If confirmed, would you agree to undertake a review of the U.S. force posture in Europe to determine whether additional reductions are appropriate?

Answer. Yes. EUCOM is currently supporting an internal DOD European infrastructure consolidation analysis. I look forward to reviewing the recommendations of this effort and working with the Department and Congress to ensure our military presence in Europe continues to effectively and efficiently support our national strategy.

USE OF ROTATIONAL FORCES IN EUROPE

Question. The January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance stresses the importance of a U.S. rotational presence for building partner capacity and promoting interoperability.

What role do you foresee for U.S-based forces in maintaining a rotational presence in Europe and promoting interoperability with our NATO and other European partners?

Answer. EUCOM leverages the Global Force Management system to meet force requirements in order to build partner capacity and promote interoperability with allies and partners that cannot be addressed by our assigned forces. This includes employing U.S.-based Navy and Marine Corps forces for NATO exercises and our annual Black Sea Rotational Force program of training and military-to-military activities with allies and partners in the Black Sea/Caucasus region. The reinvigoration of U.S. participation in the NATO Response Force and rotation of U.S.-based battalion task forces to Europe will create additional opportunities to build partner capacity and promote interoperability that complement the activities of U.S. Army Europe. These efforts, by our assigned and rotational forces, are critical to preserving the gains in interoperability and ally/partner nation expeditionary capability that have been forged over the past decade of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

U.S. COMMITMENT UNDER ARTICLE V OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Question. A cornerstone of the NATO alliance is the principle of collective self-defense as codified in Article V of the North Atlantic Treaty.

In your view, how important to U.S. strategic interests is the U.S. commitment to its obligations under Article V?

Answer. The United States is unquestionably committed to its Article 5 obligations. The formal, demonstrated, and sustained commitment to Article 5 collective defense by the United States has provided the backbone for the most successful Alliance in history. For the past 64 years, this commitment has contributed to an unprecedented period of peace and prosperity in Europe and North America. But the strategic value of the U.S. commitment is not a win/lose proposition. Both sides of the Atlantic have benefited from America's unwavering commitment. While Europeans have enjoyed the benefit of a powerful security guarantee, the United States has gained a voice in European security affairs and an economically strong trading partner resulting in a Transatlantic Alliance that represents 50 percent of the world's Gross Domestic Product (GDP). Moreover, it is our allies' commitment to NATO which has enabled interoperable European and Canadian forces to deploy alongside the United States in Afghanistan, to stay the course in Kosovo, to take the lead in Libya (enabled by the United States), and to conduct maritime missions in the Mediterranean as well as counter-piracy in the Indian Ocean. Today, NATO remains the world's premier security organization and an essential component of the transatlantic security bridge. It provides a forum for political and military combined action, and is exhibiting an increasingly global perspective. It has become a hub to cooperate with like-minded partners such as Australia, South Korea, Singapore, New Zealand, and Japan. All of this is made possible because of how seriously the United States takes its Article 5 obligations. In my view, the U.S. commitment to Article 5 is a strategic imperative.

RUSSIA

Question. U.S. European Command has responsibility for the Russian Federation in its area of responsibility.

How do you see the NATO-Russia relationship evolving in the future?

Answer. Our goal for building NATO-Russia relations is to find ways we can collaborate to address areas where our interests intersect in the complex security environment of the 21st century. We continue to believe that NATO-Russian cooperation can enhance the security of the United States, our allies in Europe, and Russia. However, differences remain, and we look to the NATO-Russia Council as a forum to discuss both our differences as well as our shared interests. The NATO-Russia Council has achieved much through political dialogue over the last few years. There remains a robust military to military cooperation program between NATO and Russia. If confirmed, I look forward to working with my Russian counterparts and furthering these important relationships.

Question. What do you believe are appropriate objectives for U.S.-Russian security relations, and what do you believe are the areas of common interest between the United States and Russia in the security sphere?

Answer. We continue to seek cooperation with Russia in zones of mutual interest and benefit, particularly in the military-to-military areas of combating terrorism, counter-piracy, peacekeeping in unstable regions, and maritime interoperability. Additionally, we look for ways to support interagency efforts in areas beyond direct Russian Defense Ministry oversight, particularly in counternarcotics, humanitarian assistance/disaster response, and support to capacity-building for Afghanistan security forces through 2014 and beyond, such as the Afghanistan Helicopter Maintenance Trust Fund.

EUROPEAN PHASED ADAPTIVE APPROACH TO MISSILE DEFENSE

Question. In September 2009, President Obama announced that he had accepted the unanimous recommendation of the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to implement the European Phased Adaptive Approach to missile defense, designed to provide capability against the existing and emerging missile threat from Iran. Phase 1 was successfully deployed by the end of 2011, including an Aegis Ballistic Missile Defense-capable ship on patrol in the Mediterranean, an early-warning missile defense radar in Turkey, and a command and control center in Germany. Future phases will include Standard Missile-3 interceptors based at sea and on land in Romania and Poland.

Do you agree that the European Phased Adaptive Approach (EPAA) will provide the capability needed to protect U.S. forces in Europe and our NATO European allies against existing and emerging Iranian missile threats?

Answer. Yes. EPAA Phases 1–3 are designed to address the increasing missile threat. The United States remains firmly committed to Phases 1–3 which is the United States' contribution to NATO missile defense. In the words of Secretary Hagel: "Let me emphasize the strong and continued commitment of the United States to NATO missile defense. That commitment remains ironclad." EUCOM has already deployed Phase 1 capability including a radar to Turkey, which is now under NATO Command and Control, and Aegis Ballistic Missile Defense-capable ships to the Mediterranean.

The United States' commitment to Phases 2 and 3 includes the development of missile defense sites in Romania (2015) as part of Phase 2 and in Poland (2018) as part of Phase 3. Both deployments remain on schedule and on budget, and coordinated with both countries. Construction on the Romanian site is scheduled to begin this year in addition to equipment purchases for the Phase 3 site in Poland. The goal of Phase 4 of the EPAA was to defend the United States against an ICBM attack from the Middle East. Though we are no longer planning for Phase 4, we will achieve its intended effect sooner by additional GBIs deployed in Alaska, which will also enhance protection of the United States against the growing threat from North Korea.

Question. Do you believe that it is important to develop the Standard Missile-3, Block IIB interceptor in order to have the capability to defend against potential future long-range Iranian missiles that could reach all of Europe as well as the United States?

Answer. We support the Secretary of Defense's decision and we believe the solution that has been described is the most technologically sound decision at this time.

MISSILE DEFENSE COOPERATION WITH RUSSIA

Question. The United States and NATO are seeking options to cooperate with Russia on missile defense against common missile threats from nations such as Iran. President Obama has announced that such cooperation would not limit U.S. or NATO missile defense capabilities.

Do you agree that such cooperation could enhance the security of the United States, NATO, and Russia against common missile threats from nations such as Iran?

Answer. Yes. Constructive cooperation with Russia in fields of mutual interest, such as missile defense, is a EUCOM goal. If confirmed, I would look to continue supporting U.S. interagency efforts to increase cooperation and transparency with Russia. Cooperation with Russia demonstrates our transparency and develops trust between nations. In turn this trust underpins and enhances our security.

Question. Do you believe that such cooperation could send a powerful signal to Iran and help in our efforts to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons and long-range ballistic missiles?

Answer. Yes. Strategic cooperation between Russia and NATO has many benefits that strengthen our security. We have seen how coordination with Russia on topics of mutual interest can send powerful messages. However, our work at EUCOM is closely aligned with the progress of the NATO-Russia Council in defining and aligning our interests in missile defense.

Question. In response to a committee question to General Martin Dempsey, then-nominee to be Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Dempsey stated that missile defense cooperation with Russia "could result in tangible benefits to the United States, Europe, and Russia in the form of a more robust common defense against missile threats, which could strengthen strategic stability and transparency. U.S. cooperation with Russia along the lines of shared early warning of missile launches, technical exchanges, operational cooperation and planning, and joint exercises would be mutually beneficial."

Do you agree with General Dempsey's assessment?

Answer. Yes. Both the U.S. and NATO Russia Council are working on constructive engagements with Russia on Missile Defense, to include joint technical studies and exercises when Russia is ready.

NATO MISSILE DEFENSE CONTRIBUTIONS

Question. The United States is deploying the EPAA as its contribution to NATO missile defense capability. As part of its decision to develop such a capability, NATO has agreed to develop and pay for a missile defense command and control network, the active Layered Theater Ballistic Missile Defense system. Various NATO nations, including Turkey, Poland, Romania, Germany, and Spain, have agreed to host elements of NATO missile defense, and they and others are making additional national contributions to NATO missile defense.

Do you agree that this current NATO approach to missile defense contributions is reasonable and appropriate?

Answer. Yes, I do. If confirmed, I am looking forward to continuing to emphasize the efforts already underway, as well as increasing allied coordination and cooperation during my time as EUCOM Commander in order to facilitate and enable additional allied contributions to the Ballistic Missile Defense (BMD) mission.

EUCOM is observing that the NATO response to the ballistic missile threat is increasing, and we are actively working with our allies to explore additional capabilities that complement and are interoperable with the United States' EPAA contribution to NATO. For instance, EUCOM just hosted (in September 2012) an Allied BMD Upgrade Conference in Berlin, Germany, with eight allies (the Netherlands, Germany, Denmark, Norway, Spain, France, United Kingdom, Italy) that already possess advanced land-based and maritime air defense assets that could be upgraded for BMD capability. I look forward to continuing and expanding such engagement activities with our allies.

Additionally, EUCOM has aligned our exercise program to provide increased opportunities to work with our NATO allies on the non-technical aspects of interoperability, including the ability to execute missile defense.

I think it is also important to keep in mind that the Chicago Summit called for "voluntary national contributions to NATO missile defense". Several of the allies are already stepping up in this regard, to include: our basing allies (Spain, Romania, Poland, Turkey, Germany); allies that possess lower tier BMD capabilities, such as the Netherlands and Germany (with their Patriot PAC–3 systems); as well as allies that are considering or already upgrading existing maritime and land-based air defense systems to provide upper tier surveillance and interceptor capacity to the Alliance. For example, the Netherlands recently announced the signing of a contract to upgrade all four of their Air Defense Command Frigates for BMD surveillance capability that could be used to cue U.S. Aegis BMD ships or other allied BMD assets, and provide air defense escort for U.S. BMD ships. Poland and Turkey are considering the purchase of lower tier BMD systems, such as the Patriot PAC–3. In short, many allies are already providing support to various aspects of the BMD mission in Europe, and could potentially provide additional contributions across the full spectrum of the missile defense mission, including: basing; passive defense; active defense; theater missile warning; command and control; attack operations; and consequence management. All of these are important contributions to NATO's ballistic missile defense mission.

NATO-RUSSIA COUNCIL

Question. The NATO-Russia Council (NRC) has served as an important venue for discussions and cooperation between NATO and Russia, including missile defense cooperation such as the Theater Missile Defense exercise program. Recent NATO communiqués have expressed support for expanded cooperation through the NATO-Russia Council, including on missile defense.

Do you believe the NATO-Russia Council has potential as a forum for NATO-Russian cooperation, including cooperation on missile defense?

Answer. Yes, I do.

The NATO-Russia Council Work Program provides for multiple agreed areas of cooperation with Russia, including not only missile defense, but also the Afghanistan Helicopter Maintenance Trust Fund, counter-narcotics training for South and Central Asia, combating terrorism, crisis management, logistics, maritime search and rescue, counter-piracy, and others. Although missile defense remains a point of contention between NATO and Russia, discussions on possible cooperation continue. NATO has held active discussions with Russia through the NATO-Russia Council Missile Defense Working group. We continue to believe that cooperation with Russia on missile defense can enhance the security of both NATO and Russia.

Question. Do you support continuation of the Theater Missile Defense exercise program within the NATO-Russia Council?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Both the U.S. and NATO–Russia Council are working on constructive engagements with Russia on Theater Missile Defense, to include cooperative technical studies and exercises when Russia is ready. The effectiveness of these efforts will ultimately depend on Russia's willingness to engage.

EUCOM ROLE IN COORDINATING MISSILE DEFENSE WITH ISRAEL

Question. U.S. European Command has Israel in its area of responsibility (AOR) and, among other missions, has the mission of coordinating and integrating U.S. missile defense capabilities and operations with those of Israel. To this end, EUCOM has sponsored a number of previous missile defense exercises with Israel. In addition, the United States has deployed a EUCOM missile defense radar (known as an AN/TPY–2 radar) to enhance defense against missiles from Iran.

Do you agree that this EUCOM mission of coordination and integration of U.S. and Israeli missile defense capabilities and operations is a critical component of our security posture in the EUCOM AOR?

Answer. Yes, I do. Cooperation between the United States and Israel is important to the security of the Middle East, and reflects a common understanding of the global security environment. Periodic missile defense exercises such as Exercise Austere Challenge 12 provided an excellent opportunity to train our military forces to respond to a regional crisis. This training is essential to building and maintaining defense interoperability and ensures Israel's qualitative military edge.

Question. If confirmed, would you continue to make this mission a high priority as Commander of EUCOM?

Answer. Yes. EUCOM has a robust program to support co-development, integration, and exercises focused on the missile defense of Israel. If confirmed, the defense of Israel will continue to remain a EUCOM high-priority mission under my command.

NATO-LED KOSOVO FORCE

Question. Approximately 5,600 troops from 30 contributing nations, including nearly 900 U.S. troops, are deployed as part of the NATO-led Kosovo Force (KFOR). KFOR's mission is to assist in maintaining a safe and secure environment in Kosovo consistent with United Nations Security Council Resolution 1244 and to support the development of the Kosovo Security Force (KSF). NATO has sought to gradually draw down the KFOR presence as the security situation has improved.

What do you see as the major challenges in Kosovo, including in connection with the establishment of the Kosovo Security Force?

Answer. The principle challenge facing Kosovo is solidifying the gains of independence and continuing to build the institutions of a modern democratic state. Much progress has been made, but more work remains. A key to allow Kosovo the space to undertake key reforms is the quest for and implementation of an acceptable political agreement with Belgrade that will resolve the longstanding impasse over northern Kosovo. Setting the stage for successful negotiations and peaceful resolution remains the top priority. Resolution of this impasse is critical for Kosovo's and the region's long-term stability.

Subsequently, the Kosovo Security Force (KSF) has matured, under its limited mandate, into a professional, multi-ethnic, civil response focused, security organization. However, the KSF does not yet possess the capabilities to replace KFOR as Kosovo's enduring security and defense organization. Our goal is to start building these additional capabilities with the KSF early next year after Kosovo legislative restrictions are lifted this summer. It is essential that NATO is an active partner in shaping the future KSF with U.S. support, so that the future KSF contributes to, not detracts from, regional security and is not viewed as a threat to its neighbors. Some allies who do not recognize Kosovo's independence are slow to support increasing competencies of the KSF which could pose additional challenges in the future.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps, if any, would you recommend to enhance the ability of KFOR to carry out and complete its mission in Kosovo?

Answer. KFOR must act within its mandate and mission and we must not allow KFOR's role to include the realm of law enforcement, yet this is the predominate capability required to maintain peace in Kosovo. KFOR's most effective role is to deter violence through a strong presence, and to respond as a third provider to unrest that exceeds Kosovo Police and European Union Rule of Law Mission in Kosovo (EULEX) capabilities. Within this context, our best approach includes: (1) strong support for continued dialogue; (2) urging Europe to maintain or increase their contributions to EULEX and encourage EULEX to robustly fulfill its mandate; (3) urging allies to fully meet force commitments to KFOR to present a strong and unified KFOR presence; and (4) maintain the U.S. plan to provide a timely military response after NATO response forces become committed in the event of crisis.

NATO ENLARGEMENT

Question. What are your views on whether NATO would benefit from further rounds of enlargement?

Answer. The policy on enlargement is set out in Article 10 of the North Atlantic Treaty. NATO has an "Open Door" policy of further enlargement that was agreed to by the Alliance Heads of States and Government at the Lisbon Summit in 2010 and reaffirmed at the Chicago Summit this year. The decision of which Nations are offered, and when they join, is political and will be ultimately decided by the 28 member states of NATO.

Question. What criteria should the United States apply in evaluating candidates for future NATO enlargement?

Answer. The criteria are well established in the Membership Action Plan mechanism, which I support. It supports stable, democratic, and reform-driven Nations who wish to contribute to security.

Question. In your view, is there a limit on the extent to which NATO can be enlarged and still be an effective military organization capable of making decisions and acting in a timely fashion?

Answer. NATO has gone through several rounds of enlargement, and has continued to prove itself effective.

GEORGIA

Question. In your view, how should the United States and NATO proceed on the issue of NATO membership for Georgia?

Answer. This is a political issue and outside the role and responsibilities of SACEUR. As I stated previously, Article 10 of the Washington Treaty, and the agreed Open Door policy for further NATO enlargement, allow for stable, democratic and reform-driven Nations to be considered for NATO membership.

That said, I believe the U.S. and NATO should continue to reaffirm support for Georgia's territorial integrity, sovereignty, and the Bucharest decision regarding Georgia's eventual NATO membership. Georgia's democratic reform progress, exemplified by the successful October parliamentary elections and transition of leadership between democratic parties, their unwavering and substantive support to ISAF operations, and commitment to the Geneva talks and a peaceful resolution of the South Ossetia and Abkhazia territorial disputes are all very encouraging signs that we commend. Likewise, Georgia continues to demonstrate itself as a strong partner of NATO through its contributions to our ISAF mission, where its two infantry battalions serve with no operational caveats, shoulder to shoulder with U.S. marines, in one of the most dangerous regions of Afghanistan. We will continue to encourage the new Georgian Government in its reform efforts. EUCOM is committed to assisting the new government through close partnership and continued engagement just as we have in the past.

Question. Section 1242 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2012 requires the Secretary of Defense, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, to develop a plan for normalized U.S. defense cooperation with Georgia, including the sale of defensive arms.

What is your assessment of current U.S. defense cooperation with Georgia?

Answer. The United States currently has a vigorous defense cooperation program with Georgia. We conduct hundreds of events annually in a wide-range of areas to include: cyber defense; border security; professional military education development; and counterinsurgency operations training, to name a few. Georgia has one of the most robust Foreign Military Financing programs in EUCOM, with funding at approximately $14 million.

In January 2012, President Obama offered six enhanced engagement areas to President Saakashvili, which will help the Georgians improve their national defense. Those areas are:

1. Operational air surveillance/air defense training and education;
2. Coastal surveillance training and education;
3. Tactical level train-the-trainer instruction for Junior Officers and Non-Commissioned Officers;
4. Brigade command and staff training and education;
5. Defensive combat engineer training and education; and
6. Utility helicopter aviation training support.

EUCOM has already conducted or has planned initial engagements with Georgia in all these areas. We are aggressively using our International Military Education and Training funding to fulfill many of the educational requirements in these areas. These new areas of cooperation, which are in addition to continuing cooperation in defense institution building efforts, focus on Georgia's self-defense capabilities and NATO interoperability.

Question. What opportunities, if any, do you see for enhanced U.S. defense cooperation with Georgia, including defensive arms?

Answer. With regard to defensive equipment, the Obama administration has agreed to consider favorably the sale of air surveillance radars, coastal surveillance acoustic systems, and small arms ammunition.

NATO-EUROPEAN UNION

Question. How would you characterize the NATO–EU relationship today?

Answer. It is a strong partnership. This is reflected in the Strategic Concept from the Lisbon Summit, which determined to strengthen the strategic partnership between NATO and the European Union (EU).

That said, the characterization of the NATO–EU relationship is largely a political issue outside the purview of the role of the SACEUR. However, from a military perspective, the two organizations can be complementary partners in a comprehensive approach addressing complex crisis, and I believe the relationship is improving. NATO and the EU are now coordinating efforts to improve capabilities and the EU is using NATO Defense Planning baseline information to help establish priorities.

Question. In your view, what should be NATO's position with regard to European efforts to strengthen the European Security and Defense Policy and build military capacity within the European Union?

Answer. NATO's position regarding the strengthening of European Security and Defense Policy will be decided at the political level by its 28 member nations. However, from a purely military perspective there is no question that within Europe the military capabilities are derived from a single pool of forces which are made available to either NATO or the EU based on a political decision. Of the 27 EU member nations, 21 are in NATO. The building of the capacity and capability of forces within the EU is also the building of military capacity and capability for NATO. In a resource constrained environment it makes sense to leverage the capabilities of all NATO and EU members to ensure the best return on a limited defense investment.

If confirmed, this is an area in which I would seek to develop complementary activities in coordination with my counterpart, General Jean-Paul Palomeros of Allied Command Transformation, in Norfolk, who is leading the military effort to develop capabilities in NATO.

FRANCE

Question. What is your assessment of the impact of France rejoining the integrated military structure?

Answer. I strongly welcome the significant contributions across the Alliance made by France. France is one of the most militarily capable members of NATO, and is a critical ally of the United States. We believe France's decision to reintegrate into the NATO integrated military structure has been mutually beneficial. The alliance is stronger militarily, the transatlantic link is more solid, and our own bilateral relationship with France is strengthened along with it. We appreciate France's leadership in the alliance—in terms of capabilities, defense investment, and contributions to operations.

UNIFIED COMMAND PLAN CHANGES

Question. It has been reported that Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM), is seeking changes to the Unified Command Plan (UCP) that he believes would allow SOCOM to better support the requirements of the Theater Special Operations Commands (TSOCs). Reportedly, such changes would give the Commander of SOCOM combatant command authority over the TSOCs—including responsibilities for resourcing—and provide for more rapid deployment of Special Operations Forces to and between geographic combatant commands without the requirement for approval by the Secretary of Defense in every case. Operational control of deployed Special Operations Forces would reportedly remain with the respective geographic combatant commander.

Some have expressed concern that such changes could raise problems related to civilian control of the military, infringe upon the traditional authorities of the geographic combatant commanders, and make it more difficult for Ambassadors and geographic combatant commanders to know what military personnel are coming into their areas of responsibility and what they are doing while they are there.

Please provide your assessment of whether such UCP changes are appropriate.

Answer. The UCP changes to SOCOM are designed to provide a greater measure of flexibility in responding to the fluid and global nature of counterterrorism. Along with the approved changes in our assigned forces document called 'Forces for', they provide a level of global perspective to the counter-terror fight that is currently lacking within DOD. By altering the command relationship slightly, SOCOM gains abilities that have been in use in Operation Enduring Freedom since 2005 (under SOCOM 121 authorities). These authorities have allowed for rapid deployment of U.S.-based Special Operations Forces to and between the U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) and U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM) areas of responsibility. They are appropriate, as long as caveats relating to minimum force levels discussed between EUCOM and SOCOM are implemented.

Question. Please address any concerns that such UCP changes may raise, including whether such changes would conflict with civilian control of the military, infringe upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raise concerns with the State Department?

Answer. The UCP and "Forces for" changes do not conflict with civilian control of the military as, fundamentally, the changes require and defer to civilian authority. This is a bedrock principle of the U.S. military's constitutional obligation to fully abide by civilian authority. Additionally, these changes, with the agreed-upon caveat suggested by EUCOM, do not infringe upon the authority of the geographic combatant commanders (GCC) in any way. Forces assigned to a GCC remain under the operational control (OPCON) of that GCC, and therefore require GCC concurrence prior to being assigned outside the theater. This arrangement fundamentally supports geographic combatant commander authority. The same would be true of forces entering the theater. This will allay State Department concerns about the UCP change, as it maintains the current notification and permissions relationship between the GCC and ambassadors, ensuring that foreign policy concerns continue to be addressed in the same manner as before. The caveat mentioned above is that EUCOM requested an identified baseline of Special Operations Forces assigned to the GCC. This would allow EUCOM to make long-term plans for the engagement of partners and allies in theater with confidence that the forces assigned against those engagements are not withdrawn from the theater without an informed discussion of the costs and disruptions that might be incurred.

INTERAGENCY COLLABORATION

Question. The collaboration between U.S. Special Operations Forces, general purpose forces, and other U.S. Government departments and agencies has played a significant role in the success of counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations in recent years. However, much of this collaboration has been ad hoc in nature.

What do you believe are the most important lessons learned from the collaborative interagency efforts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere?

Answer. I believe working in a collaborative manner with representatives from other Federal partners is essential to achieving success for any combatant commander. The value provided by representatives from other agencies cannot and should not be duplicated within the Defense Department. That is why every geographic combatant command now has some organizational entity designed to facilitate collaborative interagency efforts. At EUCOM Headquarters, that organization is the J9-Interagency Partnering Directorate established through the vision and wisdom of ADM Stavridis in November 2009. EUCOM's J9 model has been emulated at other geographic combatant commands, including U.S. Pacific Command; U.S. Southern Command, under the leadership of ADM Stavridis; U.S. Africa Command; and, most recently, U.S. Northern Command. At EUCOM, the J9 Interagency Partnering Directorate hosts 12 Federal agency partners from U.S. Government Departments and Agencies, including: the Departments of State, Justice, Treasury, Homeland Security, Energy; and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). EUCOM utilizes a broad definition of "interagency partnering" to include collaboration with non-governmental, academic and private sector partners.

In another compelling whole-of-government initiative, EUCOM installed a career foreign service officer and senior State Department leader to serve as the "Civilian Deputy to the Commander." The creation of that position, the Command's most senior "interagency representative" was also an initiative developed by Jim Stavridis. The position is presently filled by Ambassador Larry Butler.

In my mind, the key to successful interagency partnering is to properly identify and engage partners early in the planning process in order to capture the expertise these organizations can bring to the effort at hand. Once engaged, we must maintain open and continuous communications with each other throughout operations to fully realize the benefit of everyone's unique experiences, expertise, and contributions.

Question. How do you believe these efforts can be improved?

Answer. Our environment is characterized by decreasing resources and an atmosphere of multiple distributed threats. Given this setting, it makes both fiscal and strategic sense to continue advocating for an interagency, whole-of-government, collaborative approach as a fundamental modus operandi. I believe this is the most effective and efficient method for us to safeguard and advance U.S. and Theater priorities.

Question. If confirmed, what role would you seek to play in encouraging greater interagency collaboration between U.S. Special Operations Forces, general purpose forces, and other U.S. Government departments and agencies?

Answer. If confirmed, I would seek to continue the innovative interagency efforts underway at EUCOM Headquarters through initiatives like the Civilian Deputy Commander, the J9 Interagency Partnering Directorate, and the Joint Interagency Counter-Trafficking Center. These offices help ensure the combatant command continues to engage in early and continuous interagency coordination, planning, and collaboration. They foster a mindset that encourages linking U.S. Government agency representatives to relevant DOD headquarters and component staffs. These efforts have ensured the expertise, capabilities, and priorities of twelve hosted partner agencies are coordinated with critical EUCOM and component planning and execution efforts. If confirmed, I would continue to support this important 21st century way of thinking; strengthening existing relationships among Federal and non-governmental partners and the command. I would also look for opportunities to expand their participation across the Command to capitalize on the capabilities, authorities, and reach-back abilities present in their parent organizations.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS PERSONNEL IN EMBASSIES

Question. U.S. Special Operations Command deploys personnel to work with country teams in a number of priority countries where the United States is not engaged in direct action operations but rather trying to stop the spread of violent extremism. Their mission is to support the priorities of the ambassador and the geographic combatant commander's theater campaign plan against terrorist networks. At times, ambassadors have complained that they have not been adequately informed of activities by Special Operations Forces in their country.

If confirmed, what do you intend to do to make sure the goals of special operations personnel deployed to these countries are aligned closely with those of the ambassadors they are working with?

Answer. If confirmed, I will promote an interagency approach as we assess the deployment of military forces within the EUCOM AOR. U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM) must have flexibility to respond to the fluid and global nature of counterterrorism. However, the ambassadors must be notified of these deployments to ensure foreign policy concerns are addressed adequately.

Question. What is your assessment of the value of these special operations personnel to their respective geographic combatant commands and the country teams they are supporting?

Answer. Special operations forces are an invaluable resource to the geographic combatant commander. From my experience in Afghanistan, these forces provide a unique capability that is indispensable to global counterterrorism efforts.

MARINE SECURITY GUARDS IN EMBASSIES

Question. Due to the attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, which resulted in the death of of a U.S. Ambassador and three other Americans, many are conveying concern about the safety of U.S. diplomatic personnel around the world.

Do you share this concern?

Answer. I do share this committee's concern for the safety of our diplomatic colleagues stationed around the world.

Question. The Marine Security Guard Program was established in 1946, and its mission, to provide internal security at designated embassies of classified information and equipment, remains unchanged to this day.

In light of increasing threats to U.S. diplomatic personnel by terrorists throughout the world, do you believe it is time to re-examine the Program's mission and protocols?

Answer. The Marine Corps Embassy Security Group does not fall under the authority of the combatant commands. EUCOM does not have the expertise to comment on the Marine Security Guard Program's mission and protocols.

Question. If so, should it be broadened to provide additional protection to U.S. diplomatic personnel?

Answer. Although the primary mission of the Marine Security Guard Program is to provide internal security services at designated U.S. diplomatic and consular facilities to prevent the compromise of classified information and equipment vital to the national security of the United States, a secondary mission is to provide protection for U.S. citizens and U.S. Government property located within designated U.S. diplomatic and consular premises during exigent circumstances (urgent temporary circumstances which require immediate aid or action).

Question. In your opinion, what additional steps, if any, should be taken to reduce the risk of attacks on U.S. embassies and consulates and diplomatic personnel by terrorist organizations throughout the world and in the EUCOM area of responsibility, in particular?

Answer. The risk of attack to our diplomatic facilities can never be completely eliminated. Working closely with my Department of State colleagues, I will seek to reduce the risk by leveraging the expertise of our interagency partners in order to strengthen our comprehensive counter-terrorism strategy. In an era of decreasing resources and increased threats, we must utilize a whole-of-government approach to reduce the risk to our diplomatic facilities and personnel in the EUCOM area of responsibility and beyond.

NATO SPECIAL OPERATIONS HEADQUARTERS

Question. The NATO Special Operations Forces Headquarters (NSHQ) was created in 2007 to enhance the capabilities of and promote interoperability between the Special Operations Forces (SOF) of NATO member nations. Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM), has credited the NSHQ with bringing about "a generational leap forward in NATO Allied and Partner SOF capabilities."

What do you see as the value of NSHQ to ISAF operations in Afghanistan?

Answer. Since its establishment in 2007, the NATO Special Operations Force Head Quarters (NSHQ) has quietly made an immense behind the scenes impact on operations in Afghanistan, and more broadly, in the development of a wider Allied and Partner SOF. In an ISAF context, one of the over arching achievements has been the establishment of a coherent framework for Allied and Partner SOF operations under the ISAF mandate that was non-existent prior to the inception of the NSHQ. This crucial framework has not only brought a greater capability to ISAF, but has also served to underpin a more effective and relevant and inter-operable SOF capability through the creation of doctrine, training, and common standards. Moreover, the NSHQ has also been instrumental in supporting increased SOF contributions by Allies and Partners to ISAF operations. Allied and Partner SOF contributions on the ground have increased by some 500 percent since 2007.

The NSHQ has also closed a number of operational gaps identified in Afghanistan by developing and conducting a comprehensive purpose built training and education program at the NATO SOF School. This effort has included combined joint SOF staff operations and procedures, technical exploitation, threat network analysis, imagery analysis, and intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) full motion video employment. Additionally, the NSHQ has enabled NATO Allied and Partner SOF through the reciprocal sharing of classified information leveraging both the NATO SOF communications network and the NSHQ's the Special Operations Forces Fusion Cell (SOFFC) in Kabul that serves more than 2,200 Allied and Partner SOF personnel operating under ISAF. These enhancements include enabling Allied and Partner SOF task forces to receive ISR video feeds in support of partnered advise and assist operations with their Afghan counterparts in the Provincial Response Companies (PRC).

Question. What role do you believe the NSHQ should play in future contingencies involving NATO SOF?

Answer. Operations in Afghanistan have led to significant gains in SOF capabilities and capacities across Allied and Partner SOF. Let me also point out that the benefits realized from the enhancement of SOF within the Alliance by the NSHQ also impact bi-lateral and multilateral SOF operations outside of a NATO context. In response to operational requirements, the NSHQ has successfully established a NATO Allied and Partner SOF community where none existed previously. This human SOF network transcends the Alliance and habitually includes non-NATO SOF partners from Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, Sweden, Finland, Austria, and Switzerland. Looking ahead to future challenges, we need to transfer the synergy, effectiveness, and efficiency acquired as a result of operational drivers in Afghanistan, to counter-piracy, and from NSHQ activities, and orient them towards emerging Alliance security challenges. In many instances SOF will play an instrumental role in mitigating threats. The NSHQ role will be crucial in developing a more responsive and agile series of SOF capabilities including scaled force packages with organic plug and play capabilities. NSHQ coordination and focus will ensure greater utility to the Alliance with an assured full spectrum SOF capability.

Question. How do you believe the NSHQ can most effectively support NATO SOF capabilities and interoperability?

Answer. The NSHQ role, with its specific and focused advocacy of SOF initiatives, is a crucial driver of Alliance SOF capability and interoperability. Moreover, as highlighted at the February NATO Defense Ministers meeting, NATO SOF interoperability will be key to supporting NATO's Connected Forces initiative. It is important to recognize that there is no more efficient or effective means to develop SOF capabilities, capacities, and interoperability than through an enduring Alliance with a dedicated SOF advocate hence the reason the NATO SOF Transformation Initiative was launched following the North Atlantic Council endorsement at the Riga Summit in 2006. As mentioned, the NSHQ has made unprecedented strides in the development of SOF capabilities and capacities across a range of disciplines and functional areas. Significant improvements include the areas of command, control, communications, information sharing, policy making, doctrine and standard operating procedures. A robust SOF community of interest in SOF medicine has enabled the development of this critical capability across the Alliance. A well-documented Alliance and National SOF capability gap is in SOF air which was painfully evident in Afghanistan and in many cases affected our operational tempo. The NSHQ is working to gain similar momentum to promote enhanced capability, capacity and interoperability in the air domain. Success will be the integration of these capabilities that will eventually allow for a more responsive employment of SOF in a NATO context and among national SOF.

Question. What do you believe are the appropriate roles for EUCOM and SOCOM in providing guidance and resources to the NSHQ?

Answer. The NATO Special Operations Headquarters is under the daily operational command of the Supreme Allied Commander Europe, so in terms of guidance, if confirmed, I would oversee all operational issues related to the NSHQ. As Commander, EUCOM, I am delegated authority from the Joint Staff to execute U.S. Lead Agent and framework nation representative responsibilities, including managing NSHQ manpower and strength with support from the Army to manage fiscal resourcing. The Commander of SOCOM is designated as the Lead Component charged with Executive Agent responsibilities within the U.S. Department of Defense. In that capacity, Admiral McRaven exercises SOF custodianship of U.S. framework nation related activities.

MASS ATROCITIES PREVENTION

Question. President Obama identified the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide as a core U.S. national security interest, as well as a core moral interest, in August 2011 under Presidential Study Directive 10.

Among interagency partners, what is EUCOM's role in addressing atrocity threats, and what tools does EUCOM have for preventing or responding to atrocities in its AOR?

Answer. EUCOM has been one of the DOD leaders in the development of an analytical framework to shape the military's role within the interagency community to focus on the unique aspects of preventing and responding to mass atrocities. EUCOM has developed detailed operational level tools to prevent and respond to atrocity threats along three broad lines of effort. These lines of effort include operational integration to transform evolving concepts into practicable/executable tactics, techniques, and procedures; doctrine development to institutionalize already accepted practices; and policy development/refinement to foster interagency integration. A year ago, EUCOM co-hosted a conference with AFRICOM to catalyze a broad discussion on mass atrocity prevention and response operations as well as address the requirements of Presidential Study Directive 10. Attendees included senior representatives from the National Security Staff, Department of State, Office of the Secretary of Defense, Joint Staff, and Dr. Sarah Sewall, Director of the Carr Center for Human Rights Policy at Harvard University.

Question. Has EUCOM developed planning processes toward this effort so that it will be able to respond quickly in emergency situations?

Answer. Yes. EUCOM has a level-two contingency plan for conducting peace operations in the EUCOM area of responsibility with the focus to contain conflict, redress the peace, and intervene to either prevent or respond to mass atrocities. The plan provides the staff with tools to facilitate a rapid response to include: a mass atrocity specific commander's critical information requirement; a joint operations center checklist to alert key leaders and initiate crisis action planning; a playbook that delineates critical events in the interagency response process; and a detailed mass atrocity response operation annex that will enable the command to collaboratively plan and execute a mass atrocity response operation.

COUNTER THREAT FINANCE

Question. A number of officials in DOD and the Intelligence Community have called for investing additional resources in identifying and tracking the flow of money associated with terrorist networks and illicit trafficking.

What are your views on the role of DOD in counter threat finance activities?

Answer. I completely agree. Of course, Treasury has lead and a great deal of expertise. The U.S. Government, and in this case the Department of Defense, must invest the required resources to identify and track the revenue flow derived from illicit activities. These funds, increasing by trillions of dollars, are key enablers in challenging security, creating instability, and undermining good governance on a worldwide scale. Through close interagency partnership with U.S. law enforcement agencies, DOD support to counter threat finance serves a critical role in disrupting narco-trafficking and transnational organized crime.

Question. What do you believe is the appropriate role, if any, of EUCOM in supporting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. Again, acknowledging that Treasury has lead, I believe that EUCOM, and all of the regional combatant commands, have a critical role in supporting counter threat finance (CTF) activities. Illicit trafficking organizations operate on a global scale. As a result, attacking these networks requires a comprehensive, synchronized, interagency, and international effort. Currently, EUCOM has an organic CTF team that works collaboratively with U.S. Government interagency and international partners in support of the National Transnational Organized Crime Strategy (TOC) and U.S. national security objectives.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. Criminal networks are not only expanding their operations, but they are also diversifying their activities, resulting in a convergence of transnational threats that has evolved to become more complex, volatile, and destabilizing. In July 2011, the President released the Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing Department of Defense support to U.S. law enforcement".

What is your understanding of the President's strategy to combat transnational criminal organizations?

Answer. The President's strategy to combat transnational organized crime (TOC) is organized around a single, unifying principle—to build, balance, and integrate the tools of American power to combat transnational organized crime and related threats to our national security, and to urge our partners to do the same. The National TOC strategy will achieve this end state by pursuing five key policy objectives:

1. Protect Americans and our partners from the harm, violence, and exploitation of transnational criminal networks.
2. Help partner countries strengthen governance and transparency, break the corruptive power of transnational criminal networks, and sever state-crime alliances.
3. Break the economic power of transnational criminal networks and protect strategic markets and the U.S. financial system from TOC penetration and abuse.
4. Defeat transnational criminal networks that pose the greatest threat to national security by targeting their infrastructures, depriving them of their enabling means, and preventing the criminal facilitation of terrorist activities.
5. Build international consensus, multilateral cooperation, and public-private partnerships to defeat transnational organized crime.

Question. What is your assessment of the threat to the United States posed by transnational organized crime operating in the EUCOM AOR?

Answer. Transnational organized crime networks use sophisticated business models and operations to perpetuate their illicit activities. They are highly adaptable, bold in their techniques, and ruthless in their execution. These networks are expanding and diversifying their activities at an alarming rate. The result is a convergence of well-funded transnational organized crime networks that can destabilize entire economies, undermine good governance, and create national security threats to our Homeland and our allies. TOC networks with links to narcotics and arms smuggling, trafficking in persons, and a variety of other revenue generating commodities operate throughout the EUCOM AOR. These entities, with their exceptional destabilizing influence, threaten our Theater and national security interests, the security and stability of our allies and partners, and U.S. interests both at home and abroad.

Question. What role does EUCOM play in combating transnational organized crime and in training and equipping partner security forces that have been tasked with combating it?

Answer. In Europe, EUCOM's new Joint Interagency Counter Trafficking Center (JICTC), is focused on facilitating and implementing the National TOC Strategy in conjunction with U.S. interagency organizations and international partners. JICTC's mission is to support U.S. Interagency and Country Team efforts, and collaborate with similar international organizations, to counter transnational illicit trafficking and other associated threats. JICTC also assists partner nations to build self-sufficient counter-trafficking skills, competencies, and capacity to defend the Homeland forward from the rising threats posed by global transnational illicit trafficking. It is important to emphasize that EUCOM does not seek to become the lead U.S. Government agency for combating organized crime. Rather, EUCOM and its JICTC provide support to U.S. agencies to help synchronize their counter-trafficking efforts in a collaborative, whole-of-government approach. JICTC's focus areas include: narcotics trafficking; terrorism; weapons trafficking (illicit weapons, as well as WMD); human trafficking; and threat financing.

DOD COUNTER-NARCOTICS ACTIVITIES

Question. DOD serves as the single lead agency for the detection and monitoring of aerial and maritime foreign shipments of drugs flowing toward the United States. On an annual basis, DOD's counter-narcotics (CN) program expends approximately $1.5 billion to support the Department's CN operations, including to build the capacity of U.S. Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies, and certain foreign governments, and provide intelligence support on CN-related matters and a variety of other unique enabling capabilities. EUCOM's AOR is a receiving market for much of the world's illegal narcotics.

In your view, what is the appropriate role of DOD—and by extension EUCOM—in counterdrug efforts in the EUCOM AOR?

Answer. The appropriate DOD role in counterdrug efforts inside the EUCOM AOR is to contribute directly and meaningfully to the U.S. Interagency development of international, comprehensive, synchronized, and proactive drug control strategies. Additionally, EUCOM must work with U.S. Country Teams to help build the capacity of partner-nations to detect, interdict, and prosecute transnational organized criminals before their activities adversely impact the United States or U.S. interests. Those interests include stemming the illicit revenues raised by the drug trade, revenue which poses a direct threat to U.S. interests and security in Afghanistan and along our Nation's southern borders.

Question. Given that the vast majority of illegal drugs arriving in Europe are not destined for the United States, should DOD invest resources in countering the flow of illegal drugs to or through Europe?

Answer. Yes. There is a clear financial and logistical illicit trafficking nexus in Europe. This nexus, rooted in the drug trade, sustains increasingly global illicit trafficking networks that pose a direct and growing threat to U.S. security and interests, for it is not only drugs that can move across these networks. For an extraordinarily modest investment, EUCOM and its Joint Interagency Counter Trafficking Center (JICTC) are playing a critical role in the forward defense of the United States from this growing 21st century threat. EUCOM's path-breaking work in this arena is playing a vital role in the support, facilitation, and synthesis of a variety of efforts among U.S. Government interagency and international partners to implement the National TOC Strategy, and take some degree of effective action against this multi-billion dollar security challenge. The alternative—providing no funding and eliminating this important work—will allow global illicit traffickers to continue working in and through Europe unchecked, with direct and indirect consequences for U.S. security efforts and interests.

BUILDING PARTNER CAPACITY WITHIN THE EUCOM AREA OF RESPONSIBILITY (AOR)

Question. In the past several years, Congress has provided a number of new authorities requiring the Departments of Defense and State to work collaboratively to provide security assistance to partner nations. These include the global train and equip authority ("section 1206") and the Global Security Contingency Fund.

In your view, what should be our strategic objectives in building the capacities of partner nations?

Answer. In my view, the principal strategic objective of building partner capacity is to be able to share more of the burden of protecting our vital national security interests with our allies and partners. This involves assisting our allies and partners so that they can participate in and/or lead multilateral military operations, contribute to regional stability, counter transnational threats, and provide for their own internal security. At EUCOM, our focus is shifting to preserving the partner nation capabilities that have been developed through a decade of combined operations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Libya, as well as our building partner capacity efforts, to meet the challenges of a post-2014 environment.

Question. How would you define our strategic objectives for building the capacity of partner nations in the European Command area of responsibility and in what ways, if any, do those objectives differ from other geographic combatant commands?

Answer. The strategic objectives for building partner capacity in the EUCOM area of responsibility are defined in the Guidance for Employment of the Force. One of these strategic objectives is that U.S. allies and partners in the theater have the capability and capacity for regional security, to conduct military operations with the United States and NATO, and to contribute to operations worldwide. This objective is of special significance to the European theater because of NATO, and because the majority of countries in the theater are stable democracies with skilled, capable military forces across the joint spectrum. As a result, Europe is far more of a security provider than a security consumer. The foremost examples of this reality are in Afghanistan, where European allies and partners account for 92 percent of the non-U.S. forces in the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF); and in Libya where, within weeks, NATO quickly assumed leadership of the mission and conducted 75 percent of all sorties and 100 percent of maritime operations.

Question. What is the relationship of the global train and equip authority and the Global Security Contingency Fund to other security assistance authorities, such as DOD counternarcotics assistance and foreign military financing?

Answer. Extension of the global train and equip ("section 1206") authority, which is currently set to expire on September 30, 2014, is essential for EUCOM to enable Allies and partners to support NATO's post-ISAF train, advise, and assist mission in Afghanistan. The 1206 authority and the Global Security Contingency Fund complement other security assistance authorities. For example, section 1206 authority has enabled EUCOM to provide pre-deployment training and equipment to allies and partners deploying forces to Afghanistan. Prior to fiscal year 2010, EUCOM's had minimal capability to provide this type of support to our allies and partners due to insufficient authorities and/or funding from other programs.

Question. What should be done to ensure that the global train and equip authority and the Global Security Contingency Fund do not duplicate the efforts of these other assistance programs?

Answer. A number of safeguards are already in place to avoid duplication of effort among the global train and equip authority, the Global Security Contingency Fund (GSCF), and other security assistance programs. First, DOD and State Department guidance on section 1206 and GSCF clearly identifies the purpose and scope of these programs. Second, proposals for these programs are fully coordinated within DOD and with the State Department. Third, under EUCOM's Theater Campaign Plan construct, we develop Country Cooperation Plans and work to align the appropriate resources and authorities to requirements down at the activity level. Fourth, program managers and authorities experts at EUCOM headquarters, the Joint Staff, and the Office of the Secretary of Defense work with our planners to ensure that we are using the right programs in the right circumstances, and are not duplicating efforts across programs.

NATO TRANSFORMATION

Question. What is your assessment of the role of Allied Command Transformation in effecting positive change among NATO member nations?

Answer. NATO Allied Command Transformation (ACT) makes a significant contribution to training, education, doctrine, and concept development across the Alliance.

NATO MEMBERS' SPENDING ON DEFENSE

Question. According to then-Secretary Gates, in 2011 only 5 of 28 NATO members, including the United States, met the Alliance target of spending at least 2 percent of GDP on defense.

What is your assessment of the impact on NATO of the failure of the majority of NATO allies to meet agreed targets for defense spending?

Answer. This is a political issue, and a decision for member states. The Secretary General recognizes the difficulty of delivering defense for the Alliance in times of economic austerity. The Smart Defence program, Connected Forces Initiative, and NATO 2020 aim to fill capability gaps, but are inadequate without sufficient spending on defense by NATO members.

Question. If confirmed, what steps would you take to encourage NATO allies to increase their defense spending and enhance the military capabilities that they can contribute to NATO operations?

Answer. If confirmed, I would see my interaction with NATO members at the strategic military level as a major tenet during my tenure as SACEUR. This interaction would include discussions on how we can improve military capabilities across the Alliance. It should be noted that although many NATO members are not currently meeting their mandated 2 percent of GDP for defense spending, this is not the only measure of a country's military capability. Some countries, such as the Netherlands, are developing specific niche BMD capabilities.

UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION ON THE LAW OF THE SEA

Question. What are your views on U.S. accession to UNCLOS?

Answer. Like former Secretary Clinton, former Secretary Panetta, the Chairman and the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Commandant of the Coast Guard, the Commanders of U.S. Transportation Command, U.S. Northern Command, and U.S. Pacific Command, and the current Commander of U.S. European Command, I support U.S. accession to the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS).

Question. From a national security standpoint, what do you see as the advantages and disadvantages to being a party to UNCLOS?

Answer. As former Secretary Panetta has testified, the Law of the Sea Convention provides a robust legal regime for global operations by U.S. Armed Forces. It codifies navigation and overflight rights and high seas freedoms that are necessary for the mobility of our forces. It is completely in line with, and supports, the U.S. Defense Strategic Guidance. To date, 165 states have ratified the convention, and I believe that it is in our national security interests to do the same. Our current nonparty status constrains our efforts to develop enduring maritime relationships with partner nations. It also inhibits our efforts to expand the Proliferation Security Initiative, and elevates the level of risk for our sailors as they undertake operations to preserve navigation rights and freedoms. In EUCOM's area of Arctic interest, which is significant, the Law of the Sea Convention will strengthen our arguments for freedom of navigation through the Northern Sea Route and provide stronger moral standing for the United States in our extensive cooperative efforts with all of the Arctic states. We need to eliminate seams as much as possible when we operate in difficult circumstances in the maritime environment with our like-minded partners. The Law of the Sea Convention would allow us to do that.

QUALITY OF LIFE PROGRAMS FOR MILITARY FAMILIES

Question. Three of the top quality of life issues in the EUCOM AOR include predictable access to quality health care, including family member dental support; ensuring high-quality dependent education programs provided by the DOD Dependent Schools; and quality living accommodations for military families. Commanders in the EUCOM region have emphasized their support for and reliance on EUCOM resources to provide crucial morale programs, enhance retention, and foster esprit de corps.

What do you see as the most significant long-term challenges for EUCOM in preserving and enhancing the quality of life for assigned personnel while force redeployments to the United States proceed?

Answer. In a resource constrained environment, it is imperative to keep faith with, and maintain an enduring commitment to, our forces and their families, to include those stationed in Europe, by continuing our proven quality of life programs, even as we seek new and innovative ways to provide Force and Family Readiness support to those who choose to serve.

Question. If confirmed, what steps would you take to ensure the adequacy of support services for military families during the transition to ensure that vital support mechanisms, such as Department of Defense Schools, morale, welfare and recreation services, family housing, and commissary and exchange facilities continue to serve military personnel?

Answer. If confirmed, I will actively support the initiatives currently underway to upgrade and improve existing medical, educational, and recreational facilities, while continuing to develop and expand on partnerships with supporting agencies and services who can offer effective and efficient alternatives for the future. EUCOM Force and Family Readiness priorities clearly reflect those outlined in the President's 2011 report "Strengthening our Military Families." If confirmed, I will work with the Services and component commanders to ensure we remain steadfastly committed to those priorities.

SEXUAL ASSAULT PREVENTION AND RESPONSE IN EUCOM

Question. In recent years, the Department of Defense has developed comprehensive policies and procedures to improve the prevention of and response to incidents of sexual assaults, including providing appropriate resources and care for victims of sexual assault. Numerous cases of sexual assault and misconduct involving military personnel continue to be reported. Many victims and their advocates contend that they are victimized twice: first by attackers in their own ranks and then by unresponsive or inadequate investigations and emotional support for the victim.

Secretary Panetta has recently announced several new initiatives to curb sexual assaults in the military and to improve support for victims.

What is your assessment of the Secretary of Defense's recently announced initiatives, and, if confirmed, how would you implement them in EUCOM?

Answer. I support the Former Secretary's recent initiatives to combat sexual assault and think they demonstrate the Department's commitment to eradicating sexual assault from our ranks. These initiatives ensure commanders have the resources they need to investigate and prosecute sexual assault cases, and provide additional support for victims to ensure they are fully protected and receive the care they need. If confirmed, I will continue to ensure commanders have the resources they need to investigate accusations of sexual assault, provide care and support for victims and fairly adjudicate each case. Lastly, I will promote a climate that encourages reporting without fear and holds perpetrators accountable.

Question. What is your understanding of the resources and programs in place in EUCOM to offer victims of sexual assault the medical, psychological, investigative, and legal help that they need?

Answer. I am not aware of any shortfalls or deficiencies in command leadership, personnel, or training to prevent or respond to sexual assault in the EUCOM Area of Responsibility.

It is my understanding the entire EUCOM AOR has resources and programs in place to offer victims of sexual assault the medical, psychological, investigative, and legal help required. If confirmed, I will work with Service Component commanders to ensure they continue to have appropriate resources and support to implement effective sexual assault prevention and response programs. In addition, I will ensure every measure is in place to support victims.

Question. What is your view of steps the command has taken to prevent sexual assaults in EUCOM?

Answer. The EUCOM leadership closely monitors command climate indicators and reports of sexual assault, and responds with effective command messages and directives that foster a zero tolerance environment for sexual assault. If confirmed, I will promote a climate that encourages reporting without fear and holds perpetrators appropriately accountable.

Question. What is your view of the adequacy of the training and resources in EUCOM to investigate and respond to allegations of sexual assault?

Answer. The Services recently enhanced their resources for investigating and responding to allegations of sexual assault. If confirmed, I will review the Command's sexual assault prevention and response program to evaluate its effectiveness and ensure adequate resources are available. I will also work with Service component commanders to ensure we continue to emphasize the importance of training and educating servicemembers on the program, their rights and the command's commitment to safeguard them from predatory behavior in the ranks.

Question. What is your view of the willingness and ability of military leaders to hold assailants accountable for their actions?

Answer. The Department's policy emphasizes the command's role in an effective response. Special training is provided to commanders, investigators, and prosecutors to ensure they are prepared to address incidents of sexual assault. Our policies seek to balance victim care and appropriate command action against offenders in order to build victim confidence to assist in investigations. As military leaders, we must be vigilant to our duties to hold those assailants accountable for their actions. I take this obligation very seriously.

Question. Do you consider the current sexual assault policies and procedures, particularly those on confidential reporting, to be effective?

Answer. Overall, the Department has put considerable effort into developing policies and procedures designed to address sexual assault. In fact, the department faces the same challenges that society faces in dealing with incidents of sexual assault—balancing care to victims with prosecuting offenders. Restricted reporting allows victims who wish to remain anonymous to come forward and obtain the support they need following an assault. I consider these policies and procedures to be effective.

Question. What problems, if any, are you aware of regarding the manner in which the confidential reporting procedures have been put into effect?

Answer. I am not aware of any problems with confidential reporting.

MENTAL HEALTH OF SERVICEMEMBERS AND STRESS ON THE FORCE

Question. The committee is concerned about the stress on military personnel resulting from lengthy and repeated deployments and their access to mental health care to deal with this increased stress. Increased suicide rates are clear reminders that servicemembers, particularly those who have been deployed multiple times, are under tremendous stress and need access to mental health care.

In your view, are there sufficient mental health assets in EUCOM to address the mental health needs of the military personnel and their families?

Answer. Across the EUCOM AOR, I understand there currently exists an identified shortage of mental health providers available to treat servicemembers and their families. The Service components have done much to improve this situation over the past 3 years and continue to push ongoing initiatives to close the gap. If confirmed, I will work with the Service components to ensure any remaining gap in behavioral health services is adequately addressed.

The Army, Navy, and Air Force medical facilities in Europe are actively involved in addressing the behavioral health needs of its beneficiaries. Some of the major efforts include:

Integrated Behavioral Health Consultants in Primary Care: Research has demonstrated that the primary health care setting is optimal for identifying behavioral health difficulties in the general population. This is specifically true for the identification of depression and post-traumatic stress disorder. By integrating behavioral health professionals into the primary care clinics, these issues are quickly identified and receive treatment or appropriate coordination and referral for further care by a specialized behavioral health clinic. These providers are also available to provide behavioral health consultation to the primary health care providers as well as provide behavioral health educational modification interventions for patients with complicated conditions or low compliance with medical treatment. Moreover electronically secure communication to mental health services have been better marketed and implemented.

Community Outreach: USAFE and Army Installation Management Command-Europe adopted toll-free, confidential, anonymous, telephonic crisis hotline access for servicemembers, veterans, and family members in Europe to information, with Veterans Affairs counselors available 24/7 that performed over 500 direct crisis contact interventions in 2012. Other expansion efforts by Army, Navy and Air Force teams have included broadened mental health consultation in DOD Dependent Schools, and nearly 600 separate prevention events in 2012 aimed at 12,100 students that resulted in 230 students being enrolled in counseling sessions. More Military and Family Life Consultants have been hired, and overall closer linkages have been also fostered with Family Advocacy, and additional teamwork have succeeded with community organizations.

Additionally, the Army Medical Department in Europe is actively involved in addressing the behavioral health needs of its soldiers in two ways:

Embedded Behavioral Health (EBH) Teams: The Army directed the implementation of multi-disciplinary EBH for all operational units. This modality assigns an EBH team with each brigade-sized element, and empanels all battalion-sized unit soldiers to the same provider. Further, the EBH team is located within the brigade-sized elements' footprint. The Army Public Health Command conducted a number of evaluations of this model and found that it decreases the stigma associated with seeking behavioral health treatment and improves access to care, continuity of care, Commanders' satisfaction, and treatment outcomes. This initiative will continue to be rolled out through fiscal year 2016 to all operational units in U.S. Army Europe.

Behavioral Health Data Portal (BHDP): The Army directed the use of the BHDP with all Active Duty soldiers receiving treatment in outpatient behavior health clinics. The BHDP is a set of validated survey instruments that soldiers fill out at intake, and at follow-up appointments as appropriate. This initiative powerfully impacts soldier treatment in two important ways. First, the BHDP creates the ability to quantify treatment outcomes across the enterprise. Second, it displays for both the provider and the soldier evidence of improvement or lack of improvement, which can be addressed during treatment sessions. Research demonstrates the positive influence of incorporating evidence of patient progress into treatment.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to address the mental health needs of military personnel and their families in EUCOM?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the component commanders to ensure continued adequate resourcing as well as emphasis on evidence-based mental health treatments proven to improve the mental health of our servicemembers. I will demand that leaders at all levels work to decrease the stigma associated with seeking mental health treatment, and work to increase access to mental health treatment for military personnel and their families.

Question. What is your assessment of suicide prevention programs and resources available to support these programs in EUCOM?

Answer. Through leadership, I will continue to support activities that reduce the stigma associated with seeking behavioral health treatment. A very successful technique is encouraging Senior leaders to reveal, as appropriate, their own positive interaction with behavioral health treatment and acknowledge that behavioral health issues can be a direct outcome of military service. I will emphasize the importance of AOR-wide Exceptional Family Member Program Family (EFMP) travel decisions. The identification and assessment of family members' behavioral health needs prior to PCS to EUCOM remains an important risk mitigation process. The EFMP family travel decision process: (a) supports family members' health overseas; (b) supports the servicemembers' ability to focus on his/her mission; and (c) reduces the likelihood of an "Early Return of Dependents" (ERD) to more robust behavioral health services in CONUS. I will also engage in strong, dynamic Command messaging that emphasizes behavioral health issues are treatable, and that the majority of servicemembers improve when they engage in behavioral health services and stick with treatment until completion.

It is also worth noting that our Army component within EUCOM, U.S. Army Europe, has fewer soldier suicides than Army posts of comparable size in the United States. There are good prevention programs at work within Europe, and I will continue to identify and expand those programs that work, while transitioning away from those that do not.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Commander, U.S. EUCOM and Supreme Allied Commander, Europe?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings, and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes, I do.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes, I do.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JEANNE SHAHEEN

NATO BURDEN-SHARING

1. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) burden-sharing will continue to be a topic of interest for this committee and for the NATO alliance as a whole. While we do see some countries moving further away from their 2 percent commitments, there are some—like Estonia and Poland—who have placed a greater emphasis on defense spending in recent years. In your view, are the Europeans appropriately sharing the burden associated with NATO's ongoing transformation and its approach to 21st century threats?

General BREEDLOVE. We need to continue to encourage allies to meet the agreed commitment of a minimum of 2 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) spending on defense. Defense budgets in most countries have declined at a time when the alliance has undertaken its most demanding and significant mission ever in Afghanistan, and when the need for investment in future capabilities is essential. However, European NATO nations do recognize the global security challenges—we have seen this recently with the French led intervention into Mali as one example. NATO allies have taken steps to address the issues related to falling defense budgets with the announcement at the Chicago Summit in 2012 of a Defense Package and key initiatives such as Smart Defense and the Connected Forces Initiative. Alongside the 2 percent guideline, allies have agreed that at least 20 percent of defense expenditures should be devoted to major equipment spending. While only four other allies have met this goal, investment in major equipment by the non-U.S. allies has held steady at about $50 billion per year for the last decade.

2. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, do you believe the contributions from our European partners in NATO are adequate to implementing the alliance's Strategic Concept, as adopted at the 2010 Summit in Lisbon?

General BREEDLOVE. It is true that individual sovereign governments continue to make inwardly focused decisions on defense spending, in many cases not achieving the self-imposed NATO 2 percent GDP benchmark. However, our European partners still represent the second largest defense spending block (~$280 billion) in the world—after the United States (~$682 billion/year), but ahead of China (~$166 billion/year) and Russia (~$90 billion). Europe is still investing in defense, focused on contributing to NATO and preserving the expeditionary capabilities and interoperability that has been developed over the past decade of combat operations with the United States.

I believe there are three capabilities that will be critical to NATO's success as we face 21st century threats: cyber, Special Forces, and unmanned reconnaissance platforms. NATO is increasingly using Centers of Excellence to develop and refine capabilities, notably the Cyber Center in Estonia. NATO realizes this capability will be the lynchpin for successful future operations and conflicts. The effective use of cyber defense may even lessen the chance of conflict if our allies' systems are more resilient to cyber attacks. Additionally, the NATO Special Operations Headquarters is up and running in their new facility across the street from my Headquarters. NATO nations are using this facility for coordination and in combination with the training facilities that are in place at Chievres Air Field a few kilometers away. Finally, NATO has also done an outstanding job with our AWACS program. The alliance is now pursuing the Alliance Ground Surveillance (AGS) system to enhance the alliance's ability to have persistent situational awareness.

European partners are also looking for more cooperative solutions to security problems. The Baltic Air Policing mission is a great example of the allies pooling resources to meet a requirement. The C–17 Heavy Airlift Wing in Hungary is another example of this cooperation. The alliance's collective approach to Ballistic Missile Defense makes this essential capability an achievable goal.

So, in spite of economic challenges, Europeans are still focused on defense and the support of the alliance, even if each is not currently meeting the 2 percent benchmark. They are demonstrating their commitment in areas such as cyber, Special Operations, intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR), and are showing a greater desire to cooperate using "Smart Defense".

3. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, will you commit to raising the burden-sharing issue and ensuring that it receives the proper attention from our European allies?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. Based on NATO contribution goals and capability targets, most European NATO nations should do more. Non-U.S. NATO allies have considerable aggregate economic strength, with the combined total GDP similar to that of the United States. The problem is that under austerity budgets there is insufficient political will to invest in defense capabilities. I will encourage allies to increase their defense spending so they have the right forces and capabilities required to address the threats of the 21st century. Additionally, I will also ask non-NATO allies to invest in their own armed forces in terms of recruitment, retention, training, and equipping to be able to address the increasingly complex threats we face in common with the professional, highly-trained forces we need.

While I will do all I can to encourage better burden sharing with our European allies, I want to point out progress made thus far on burden sharing. From 2007–2009, nine NATO countries—United Kingdom, France, Spain, Denmark, Norway, Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg, and Greece—exceeded the United States in foreign assistance funding. In 2010, seven European countries—United Kingdom, France, Iceland, Germany, Netherlands, Denmark, and Norway—exceeded the U.S. funding contribution to U.N. peace operations in terms the amount contributed as a percentage of GDP. In 2011, four European NATO Nations (Luxembourg, France, United Kingdom, and Turkey) met or exceeded the 20 percent NATO guideline for defense spending on major equipment. Finally, in 2011, the average of all European NATO nations' spending on major equipment and R&D was 19 percent, as a percentage of defense expenditures. In conclusion, I will do everything in my power to ensure that our allies and partners are ready to meet the challenges of an increasingly complex world.

POLAND

4. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, the U.S. bilateral security relationship with Poland is crucial. We have seen an increased U.S. presence in Poland through military engagements and a new Patriot missile battery rotation. Can you reiterate for us why Poland is so important for the United States and for regional security?

General BREEDLOVE. Poland has consistently supported U.S. foreign policy, contributing troops to operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Poland ranks fourth in total force contributions out of 49 partner nations.

Poland's economy is among the strongest in the EU, with 14.9 percent GDP growth since 2008 compared to -0.6 percent decline EU-wide. A constitutionally mandated defense budget of 1.95 percent GDP ensures Poland's defense expenditures grow in line with its economy. Its economic growth, vibrant democracy, demographic trends, and natural resources all point to a growing role for Poland in the 21st century.

Poland takes seriously its commitment to NATO and has also agreed to host the second U.S. missile defense interceptor site in the 2018 timeframe as part of the U.S. European Phased Adaptive Approach (EPAA) and NATO missile defense.

Poland has announced plans to spend approximately $10 billion to acquire modern integrated air and missile defense systems, which will be interoperable with NATO.

Poland has assumed a leadership position in Central Europe and continues to push for democratization efforts in the Ukraine and Belarus.

Note: The Patriot rotations to Poland ended in November 2012 with the activation of the Aviation Detachment. U.S. European Command (EUCOM) J5 and USAREUR are unaware of any current plans for a new Patriot rotation.

5. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, missile defense cooperation seems to be an important area of cooperation with Poland—and an area for possible further growth. We have completed the Ballistic Missile Defense (BMD) agreement as part of the EPAA. However, Poland also plans to spend millions of dollars on its own theater missile defense needs. In fact, the modernization of Poland's missile defense program has been identified as one of its top three priorities through 2022. This would seem to be a great opportunity for deeper U.S.-Poland cooperation and for the U.S. defense industry. If confirmed as EUCOM Commander, how will EUCOM assist the Polish Government in their effort to enhance their air and missile defense capability?

General BREEDLOVE. EUCOM participates in a bi-lateral Integrated Air and Missile Defense (IAMD) Working Group with the Polish Ministry of Defense. The primary goal of this working group is to assist in identification of Polish operational requirements leading to selection and development of a Polish national IAMD System compatible with EPAA and interoperable with the developing NATO BMD systems.

U.S. policy, as described in the 2010 Ballistic Missile Defense Review, is to continue to strongly encourage additional allied contributions to NATO Missile Defense.

6. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, will you work to ensure that the Polish national air and missile defense system is interoperable with NATO's missile defense system?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. EUCOM continues to advocate for development of a Polish national Integrated Air and Missile Defense system that is both compatible with the EPAA and fully interoperable with the developing NATO BMD systems.

KOSOVO-SERBIA

7. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, over the last year, we have seen some progress on Serbia-Kosovo relations. However, tensions remain high and miscalculation could result in negative consequences and the possibility of further bloodshed. It is critical that we maintain a focus on this important region so as not to lose the gains we've fought so hard for over the last decade and a half. Can you give us your assessment of the security situation in Kosovo and the need to maintain a troop presence in KFOR [the NATO implementation force in Kosovo] in the coming years?

General BREEDLOVE. I am cautiously optimistic that recent political progress can return rule of law to the disputed Northern Kosovo region. However, I expect periods of civil unrest throughout the long and difficult process of restoring Pristina's authority. In Northern Kosovo, the parallel government is closely connected to organized crime, and has much to lose if and when rule of law and border control is reestablished. U.S. presence in KFOR is vital to maintain KFOR credibility with Kosovo institutions and multi-ethnic populations.

GEORGIA

8. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, Georgia was promised future NATO membership at the Bucharest Summit; however, since then, the path forward for Georgia has been uncertain. I believe Georgia still has reforms to undertake before it should be considered a NATO member; however, it is important that we offer a clear path forward for them. What is your view on the important role Georgia has played in the fight in Afghanistan?

General BREEDLOVE. Georgia has been a stalwart supporter of NATO operations in Afghanistan, providing eleven infantry battalions to Regional Command-Southwest since 2010, with each battalion comprising approximately 750 soldiers. Georgia is currently the largest per capita and non-NATO troop contributor to ISAF. In the fall of 2012, Georgia nearly doubled its troop contribution, and now deploys two infantry battalions simultaneously. These Georgian units make up half the infantry force in Helmand Province. They operate without caveats, and have committed these battalions to the ISAF mission through November 2014.

Georgia has suffered 19 soldiers killed and 129 wounded in action. Through it all, reports coming back from Helmand speak of the Georgian's professionalism, bravery, and commitment.

Despite its losses, Georgia stands by the United States and NATO in our efforts in Afghanistan and has already made offers to NATO's post-2014 mission, including combat forces and training and equipment for the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF). The Georgian Government has also pledged $1.5 million for the first 3 years of the transition period to support the ANSF.

9. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, how important is it that we remain engaged with the new government in Georgia—particularly with respect to its NATO membership goals?

General BREEDLOVE. It is very important.

The United States has recognized the first successful democratic and peaceful transition of power in Georgia's history. EUCOM will continue our current enhanced security cooperation engagements with the new government based on mutually agreed priorities just as we have done in the past. The new Georgian military leadership has already demonstrated through words and actions, its continued desire for institutional reform and increased transparency.

Through its contributions to missions in Kosovo, Iraq, and Afghanistan, Georgia has demonstrated its value as a coalition partner and future member of NATO. We will continue to work with the new government on critical capacity building and inter-operability projects. To that end, Georgia has one of the most robust Foreign Military Financing programs in EUCOM.

We also continue to move forward on the six engagement areas President Obama and President Saakashvili agreed to in January 2012, which will help the Georgians improve their national defense capabilities. Those are:

- Operational air surveillance/air defense training and education
- Coastal surveillance training and education
- Tactical level train-the-trainer instruction for NCOs and Junior Officers
- Brigade command and staff training and education
- Defensive combat engineer training and education
- Utility helicopter aviation training support

NATO–RUSSIA MISSILE DEFENSE

10. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, do you anticipate that missile defense could be an area for possible cooperation with the Russians?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. Missile Defense is one of the six areas of cooperation that NATO pursues with the Russian Federation in the framework of the NATO-Russia Council.

Although there was progress made in the joint analysis of mutual regional threats, progress on NATO-Russia missile defense cooperation remains slow and difficult. Positions on the overarching political issues are entrenched and continue to impede development of the two main strands of practical cooperation, the Joint Analysis for a framework for missile defense cooperation and the resumption of Theatre Missile Defense (TMD) cooperation.

11. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, specifically, what kinds of cooperative efforts on missile defense are possible and could result in mutual security benefits for NATO and/or Russia?

General BREEDLOVE. In addition to the efforts mentioned in answer to question #10, the NATO-Russia Council (NRC) Missile Defense Working Group has had initial discussions on the two new initiatives proposed in NATO's Chicago declaration establishing joint missile defense centers and developing a transparency regime. However, Russia has rejected development of proposed joint missile defense centers until the political matters of principle are resolved and has indicated that it prefers to hear a detailed NATO proposal on a possible improvement to transparency before engaging.

NATO-RUSSIA RELATIONS

12. Senator SHAHEEN. General Breedlove, what is your goal—should you be confirmed—with respect to the future of the NATO-Russia relationship?

General BREEDLOVE. Since 1991, Russia has been a partner of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. At times our partnership and cooperation is robust and beneficial to the alliance. In the Balkans, from 1996 to 2003, Russian soldiers conducted joint operations with NATO forces. In 2006 and 2007, Russia deployed ships to the Mediterranean Sea as part of the NATO Operation Active Endeavor, and today we are cooperating in the Gulf of Aden countering piracy. In Afghanistan, we are developing mechanisms for logistic support to the ANSF, while regionally we are cooperating with Russia to develop capacity in the counter narcotics realm. Most recently, during the NATO Foreign Ministerial, the NATO Russia Council agreed to intensify their work together on Afghan National Air Force Aviation training. With these successes, there too have been significant challenges such as missile defense and conventional arms control, which still affect the relationship today.

The NRC is where the 28 allies and Russia meet as equals in a format of 29 nations. This forum provides the framework for consultations on current security issues and practical cooperation in a wide range of areas of common interest.

The NRC is where nations determine the level of military cooperation and develop the NATO-Russia Work Plan. Currently, there are six specific areas of cooperation; Logistics, Combating Terrorism, Search and Rescue at Sea, Counter Piracy, Military Academic Exchanges, and Theater Missile Defense.

We will continue to look for new areas of cooperation which support NATO objectives, develop the capacity for joint action, and which promote operator-to-operator engagement. These efforts will contribute to improving trust as well as create reciprocal transparency and predictability, with the aim of contributing to the establishment of a common space of peace, security, and stability.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

DEFENSE OF ISRAEL AND IRANIAN NUCLEAR PROGRAM

13. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, President Obama has repeatedly stated that allowing Iran to acquire a nuclear weapon is unacceptable and must be prevented. Most recently during his trip to Israel the President said, "We will do what is necessary to prevent Iran from getting the world's worst weapons." If the President determines military action is required to stop Iran's acquisition of a nuclear weapon, EUCOM will undoubtedly play a key role in any operation. Do you agree with the President that a nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable and must be prevented?

General BREEDLOVE. I support the President's policy as stated. Having said that, I also agree with the President and Prime Minister Netanyahu that the preference is to resolve this situation diplomatically. In any case, given the levels of unprecedented coordination and consultation between EUCOM, other U.S. combatant commands, and the Israeli military along with partner nations, EUCOM is prepared to play a key role in any operation.

14. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, do you agree with the President that the use of U.S. military force may be necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon?

General BREEDLOVE. I agree with the President. When it comes to preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, no options should be taken off the table, to include the use of military force. I support the President's position on resolving this issue diplomatically, though Iran should have no doubt about the resolve of the United States and EUCOM's preparedness to be a key player for any contingency should the need arise.

15. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, if confirmed, will you ensure the forces under your command are prepared to carry out contingency plans, as ordered by the President, to confront Iran's nuclear program?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes.

16. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, do you agree that the United States must maintain a credible threat of the use of force against Iran and that a public conversation that downplays the threat of force is counterproductive and actually raises the potential that force may need to be used?

General BREEDLOVE. The U.S. military must always be prepared to support U.S. policy goals for any contingency whether it be against Iran or any other threat to U.S. security and national interests. EUCOM is postured to maintain a credible threat of the use of force and is prepared to play a key and supporting role in the region when directed.

17. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, the United States and Israel hosted the largest ever joint military drill between the two countries this past October. The drill, called Austere Challenge, hosted over 3,500 U.S. personnel in Israel and had been planned for more than 2 years as part of a longstanding agreement between EUCOM and the Israel Defense Force to regularly hold bilateral training exercises regularly. If confirmed, will you support continued joint exercises with our ally, Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes, EUCOM and the Israel Defense Force have a longstanding relationship and combined exercise program that includes seven semi-annual, annual, and biennial exercises: Juniper Cobra, Juniper Falcon, Juniper Stallion, Noble Dina, Noble Melinda, Noble Rose, Noble Shirley, and Reliant Mermaid.

18. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what tangible benefits does the United States derive from these joint exercises with Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. The strategic partner relationship the United States and Israel maintain in the Middle East is vital to stability in the entire region. Tensions throughout the Levant have been on the increase for the last year. EUCOM stands by its valued strategic partnership with Israel and will continue to improve on the bilateral cooperation between the two nations. Combined air defense training exercises are designed to maintain the interoperability between the United States and the Israel Defense Forces (IDF). While driven by the overall situation in the Middle East, joint U.S./IDF exercises do not relate to an individual incident or development. As part of our mission to build partnership capacity, bilateral exercises such as Austere Challenge are conducted on a routine basis. These exercises focus on improving only defensive capabilities, not offensive.

19. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, from the Austere Challenge Exercise, what areas do we need to work on to be ready to help defend Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. Following Austere Challenge 12 (AC12), the largest exercise with the Israelis to date, the next logical step is to now maintain the cooperative military capabilities between our two nations. EUCOM's next exercise with the Israel Defense Force is Juniper Cobra 14 (JC14), currently in the early design stage. JC14 will be designed to sustain the level of interoperability established by Austere Challenge 12.

Specific AC12 Lessons Learned/areas to work on and proposed solutions include:

- 6.5 Software. Patriot Post-Deployment Build 6.5 software anomalies were observed in AC12 (debris showing as false targets). EUCOM is working with the Program Office in order to gain Lower Tier Project Office verification.
- Increased Interoperable and Distributed Training. Due to personnel rotations, frequent and robust training is required between the combined U.S.-Israeli team. In addition to the biannual Juniper Cobra exercise, EUCOM is exploring, with the assistance of the Missile Defense Agency, options for distributed monthly and/or quarterly training.

20. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what do you think of the Iron Dome system employed by Israel when the terrorist organization Hamas fired over 1,500 rockets and missiles at the Israeli population in November 2012?

General BREEDLOVE. Iron Dome is Israel's newest operational missile defense system. These Iron Dome batteries provide Israeli population centers, within range of Gaza rockets, with a persistent defensive capability that does not exist with systems such as the Patriot or Arrow missile defense systems. To date, official Israeli reports on Iron Dome weapon system effectiveness show that the system performed very well in combat operations. After the November 2012 conflict, Israeli officials placed the overall system's success rate at 84 percent.

21. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what is your overall assessment of our missile defense cooperation with Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. [Deleted].

ISRAEL, TURKEY, AND REGIONAL STABILITY

22. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, over the last few years, Turkey has sought to exclude Israel from joint exercises with the United States and NATO. Do you agree Israel's participation in joint exercises with NATO is beneficial?

General BREEDLOVE. I absolutely agree with the statement that Israel's participation in exercises with NATO is beneficial. I have been concerned by the impact on NATO partnership cooperation activities of Turkey's bilateral dispute with Israel. Israel engages with NATO in the framework of the Mediterranean Dialogue. The Mediterranean Dialogue is one of the few security cooperation venues in the world where Israel can engage in constructive activities with Arab states. Besides Israel and Turkey, the other six members all come from the Arab world (Algeria, Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Mauritania, and Tunisia). In this sense, NATO serves as a platform which can foster better understanding of issues through such initiatives as the NATO Regional Cooperation Course at the NATO Defense College which has seen attendance by Israeli, Turkish, American, and other NATO officers and diplomats to jointly study security challenges together. Now that Israel and Turkey are working constructively towards resolution of the dispute, I am cautiously hopeful that the resumption of Israel-NATO cooperation will soon extend across the full range of NATO activities that help states within the region address common regional challenges.

23. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, should the U.S. military participate in exercises with Turkey if it demands Israel be excluded?

General BREEDLOVE. The improvement of Israeli-Turkish relations is in the best interests of the United States, Israel, Turkey, and the region. EUCOM should stand ready to facilitate those activities that rapidly restore the strength of their relationship including exercises that involve both Turkey and Israel.

24. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what is your assessment of Prime Minister Erdogan's regional ambitions?

General BREEDLOVE. Prime Minister Erdogan's domestic security considerations shape his regional outlook. Turkey's conflict with the Kurdistan Workers' Party is a case in point. This conflict has spanned 3 decades and cost over 40,000 lives. Recently, there has been some progress toward opening a dialogue that may signal a reduction in violence in that struggle, though it is too early to give a clear assessment. But we are supportive of this effort. PM Erdogan appreciates that Turkish power within the region is on the rise, but that Turkey will gain more through economic cooperation with neighbors than through a more aggressive foreign policy. Turkey's economy has outperformed regional economies over the last decade, but Turkey remains dependant on natural gas imports that drive their cooperation with regional exporters, including Russia and Iraq. In the event of some regional exigency, PM Erdogan will remain sensitive to perceptions of Turkey acting unilaterally and generally takes the position that Turkey should act as a part of a coalition.

25. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, do you think Turkey's cooperation with EUCOM and NATO on Syria has been adequate?

General BREEDLOVE. As Syria's northern neighbor, Turkey understands the threat, takes it seriously, and is engaged with the international community for support. Turkey is a strong and reliable ally of both the United States and NATO in an unstable region. In response to the Syrian threat, Turkey has requested and welcomed cooperation in a number of areas including combined staff planning and the deployment of Patriot Missiles to defend the Syrian border region. In January, NATO deployed six Patriot Batteries to Turkey's southern border to augment Turkey's air defenses. The United States, Germany, and the Netherlands each contributed two Patriot Batteries to this effort. Over the past year, EUCOM has worked with Turkey to support and enhance its capabilities to respond to various Syrian threats. Several of these efforts have been in support of broader Department of Defense (DOD) and Department of State initiatives, such as counter- and non-proliferation. It is important to note that Turkey is currently home to over 250,000 Syrian refugees, has lost two Air Force pilots to Syrian air defenses, and has sustained multiple cross-border indirect fire incidents due to the Syrian crisis.

26. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what plans does EUCOM or NATO have to secure chemical weapons in Syria if Assad falls and security of Syrian chemical weapons deteriorates to the point where proliferation is possible, if not likely?

General BREEDLOVE. Proliferation of chemical weapons is a very serious matter that could undermine regional stability. Since Syria is in the area of responsibility of the U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM), I respectfully request this question be referred to that command.

As with U.S. and international involvement in Libya in 2011, a resolution from the U.N. Security Council and agreement among the alliance's 28 members is necessary before NATO assumes a military role in Syria. NATO is prepared, if called upon, to be engaged.

Several NATO countries are working on individual contingency plans for possible military action in Syria. Within individual member countries, discussion regarding options including lethal support, no-fly zones, and arms embargoes are being considered.

That said, given that Israel and Turkey border Syria, EUCOM planners are fully integrated and synchronized with CENTCOM efforts and maintain a strong relationship with our NATO allies.

COUNTER PIRACY

27. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, NATO has had success in anti-piracy operations off the Horn of Africa. With expanding oil discoveries in the Atlantic Ocean off of the coast of Western Africa, and drug trafficking that runs from South America through that same area to Europe, do you see the potential need for an anti-piracy mission off of the west coast of Africa? If so, do you envision a potential counter-piracy mission off of the west coast of Africa as a U.S. force, a NATO force, or some combination?

General BREEDLOVE. As a preliminary matter, the Gulf of Guinea is neither in EUCOM nor NATO's Area of Responsibility. I understand that AFRICOM is successfully working with West African nations to assist in the development of their maritime capabilities in order to improve safety and security in the Gulf of Guinea. I believe AFRICOM is in a better position to assess whether Gulf of Guinea states may require additional support.

That said, each region is faced with its own unique root causes of piracy; each will require unique solutions. The strategic environment and imperatives which led to NATO's involvement in the current counter-piracy mission are quite different from that off the coast of West Africa. NATO's mission to counter maritime piracy began in 2008 with the request from the United Nations to provide escorts to U.N. World Food Program vessels transiting through dangerous waters to deliver humanitarian aid to Somalia.

In addition to the threat piracy posed to humanitarian efforts in Africa, there was an internationally recognized threat to the safety of vital sea lines of communication and economic interests off the Horn of Africa and in the Gulf of Aden. This included risks to the safety of one of the busiest and most important maritime routes in the world—the gateway to and from the Suez Canal.

Countering piracy requires a mix of maritime security capabilities, use of best practices by the commercial shipping industry, and rule of law ashore. NATO continues to contribute to international counter-piracy efforts in full accordance with the relevant U.N. Security Council Resolutions relating to Somali-based piracy and with the consent of Somali authorities.

An increase in piracy and maritime crime in the Gulf of Guinea is of growing concern to the maritime community, but lies outside the current area of operations for NATO vessels. Where the counter-piracy mission off the coast of Somalia, a failed state, required an international response, the Gulf of Guinea is lined with sovereign, functioning nations. The United Nations and others have called for nations of West Africa to develop a comprehensive regional anti-piracy strategy for the Gulf of Guinea.

MALI

28. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what type and quantity of air support has been provided to the French in Mali?

General BREEDLOVE. To date, EUCOM's air support to the French has been primarily aerial refueling and airborne ISR. Three KC–135 aircraft were deployed to Spain to provide tanker support to French strike aircraft. One E–8 was deployed to Spain to provide ISR in support of French operations in Mali, and two additional KC–135 aircraft were deployed to support the E–8 ISR missions. To sustain ISR collection, approximately 30 EUCOM personnel were deployed to Niger to support MQ–1 missions. Additionally, EUCOM postured C–130 aircraft to provide strategic inter-theater and intra-theater airlift to AFRICOM, France, and other troop contributing nations from Europe and Africa.

29. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, is our extensive support to the French in Mali being leveraged to increase our strategic access to bases, e.g. lily pad bases, in western Africa?

General BREEDLOVE. Respectfully request this question be directed at U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM). EUCOM's role in supporting French operations in Mali was mainly support to AFRICOM's direct operational support to the French. The French military operations in Africa are providing both a great opportunity to improve our bilateral relationship with France and encouraging the kind of out-of-area capability and initiative that makes France such a valuable U.S. ally. France genuinely appreciates the support we provide and I am sure our combined activities will contribute to expanded access within the region.

30. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, with the drawdown of forces in Afghanistan, do you anticipate that we will be able to get more ISR support into Africa given the large number of terrorist threats, such as the Lord's Resistance Army and Joseph Kony, al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb, and al Shabaab?

General BREEDLOVE. I respectfully request this question be directed to the U.S. Africa Command.

AFGHANISTAN

31. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what key lessons do you think we must learn from the precipitous draw-down of U.S. troops from Iraq that can be applied to our draw-down in Afghanistan?

General BREEDLOVE. Logistically, the drawdown in Afghanistan presents a different set of challenges than the drawdown in Iraq. While the Iraq drawdown was aided by seaport access and several air hubs, the drawdown in Afghanistan will rely more upon land and air transport. I will work with the alliance to synchronize our several—national redeployment efforts to achieve all available efficiencies—in some cases, finding economies and savings together that we could not achieve separately.

ISAF's primary task has changed from leading a population-centric counter-insurgency campaign to providing Security Force Assistance to the ANSF, as they assume the lead for providing their national security. The key missions of our post-2014 military presence will be focused on training, advising, and assisting ANSF; targeting counterterrorism missions against al Qaeda and its affiliates; and protecting U.S. forces and citizens.

32. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what key capabilities must we maintain in post-2014 Afghanistan?

General BREEDLOVE. Ultimately, Afghans must be able to secure and stabilize their country themselves. Our objective is to develop the capability for Afghans to assume these tasks. Achieving this objective requires a comprehensive program which trains, mentors and advises the ANSF through army and police advisory teams and within the NATO Training Mission-Afghanistan (NTM–A). NTM–A brings together both NATO and national training efforts to develop professional, capable and self-sustaining ANSF.

In parallel with the training and mentoring efforts, ISAF troops are implementing a phased process to facilitate the transfer of full security responsibility to Afghan security forces as their capabilities improve, in keeping with the end of 2014 transition timeline.

The training, advising, and assisting of the ANSF will continue after transition is complete at the end of 2014, when the ISAF mission will end.

NATO has agreed to lead a post-2014 mission focused on continued support to the development of ANSF capacity. Allies and my NATO military staff are currently going through an in-depth review to determine what assets and capabilities will be required post-2014 to maintain the momentum of ANSF development and sustain the progress we have already made. We have not yet reached the point of formally defining the number of forces and required capabilities.

33. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, NATO has been transformed by the expeditionary requirements in Afghanistan. After 2014, what will be the driving force to maintain those hard-earned skills and further evolve NATO to be able to meet 21st century threats?

General BREEDLOVE. Alliance forces, along with many non-NATO contributing nations in Afghanistan, have created a synergy of effort and network of lasting partnerships that will benefit our Nation and the alliance long after these deployed forces return home. Lessons learned from 20 years of NATO-led operations, with integrated, multinational command structures and forces of the many nations working alongside each other day after day, have both enhanced our military interoperability and strengthened the mutual confidence of our forces.

After 2014, NATO is expected to shift its emphasis from operational engagement to operational preparedness. This means NATO will need to remain capable of performing its core tasks—described in its Strategic Concept and of maintaining its forces at a high level of readiness. To help achieve this, allied leaders have set out the goal of "NATO Forces 2020": modern, tightly connected forces that are properly equipped, trained, exercised and led.

The Connected Forces Initiative (CFI) will help ensure that allies can communicate effectively, practice together, and validate and certify their ability to do so. The main requirements of CFI are to maintain NATO's readiness and combat effectiveness through expanded education and training, increased exercises, and better use of technology.

NATO exercises will cover the full spectrum of intensity, promote interoperability and also compensate for the reduced operational experience of forces working together. NATO will build a robust exercise and training program that will underpin the alliance's interoperability in the future. High-intensity, large-scale exercises will provide the demanding scenarios necessary for NATO to retain its "fighting edge." Defense Ministers in February 2013 agreed that the alliance should hold a major live exercise in 2015 and will draw up a comprehensive program of training and exercises for the period 2015–2020.

The NATO Response Force will also play an important role in this context by providing a vehicle both to demonstrate operational readiness and serve as a "test bed" for alliance transformation. It provides a collective approach with a ready, integrated, deployable, effective and efficient military response, through which to show alliance resolve, solidarity, and commitment.

STRATEGIC BENEFITS OF ENGAGEMENT WITH EUROPE

34. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, as I said in my opening statement, if recent history is any indicator, any operations we do in Northern Africa and the Middle East will be with Europe and from Europe. Strategic access to key geostrategic terrain as we saw in Libya, and interoperability as we see by the almost 30,000 European troops in Afghanistan, seem compelling reasons to remain engaged in Europe despite today's significant resource constraints. Why do you think we should remain engaged with Europe in light of today's severe budget cuts?

General BREEDLOVE. Our Nation must take care—even as we grapple with significant economic challenges and chart the necessary strategic reorientations—to protect, preserve, and continue evolving our extraordinary partnership with Europe. There are five salient reasons for this. First, Europe is home to most of the world's progressive democracies; nations with which we share the fundamental values that are a critical element in building effective coalitions. Second, with a GDP of $19 trillion—a quarter of the world's economy—and approximately $4 trillion in annual trade with the United States, Europe is key to the U.S. and global economies. Third, the European theater remains critical geostrategic terrain, providing the United States with the global access it needs to conduct worldwide operations and crisis response. Fourth, Europe is the backdrop for NATO, history's most successful and effective alliance, and a vital partner for dealing with the challenges of the 21st century. Fifth, Europe is today a security exporter, possessing many of the most highly trained and technologically advanced militaries in the world. No other region possesses a comparable pool of capable and willing partners able to conduct global operations with the United States.

The United States must remain engaged with Europe because it is a vital enabler for U.S. global reach. The coming decade will be a dynamic one, highlighted by increasing regional challenges and strategically overall U.S. primacy in global affairs would be diminished if we do not remain engaged with Europe. By remaining engaged, EUCOM will maintain relationships and expeditionary capabilities within European militaries that will continue to directly benefit American strategic interests and successfully defend the Homeland forward.

35. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what is the impact of a smaller footprint and reduced resources in Europe on U.S. influence within the NATO organization?

General BREEDLOVE. Despite a smaller footprint and reduced resources, the United States remains the leader of the alliance. Our commitment to a strategic partnership with Europe and global capabilities still provide the unquestioned guarantees of North American and European security. However, preserving U.S. influence while NATO resets in a post-ISAF environment will require a careful and nuanced approach. In particular, consistency in our messaging and our actions will be an important means of ensuring we retain the trust and confidence of our European allies and partners. This is especially true with regard to the posture of U.S. forces in Europe, our pledge to reinvigorate our participation in the NATO Response Force and rotate battalion task forces to Europe, and our engagement activities with allies and partners. In addition, we will have to find efficiencies through closer collaboration with NATO. For instance, we will have to look for opportunities to do national training exercises in a multi-national NATO framework and better harmonize our bilateral assistance with NATO efforts. Such measures can ensure that the US retains its leadership of NATO even with reduced resources in Europe.

36. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, as the percentage of GDP that NATO nations are spending on defense drops from the goal of 2 percent towards an inadequate 1 percent, how do we ensure that Europe will continue to shoulder its share of the global security burden?

General BREEDLOVE. While the European economic crisis continues to drive reduced military spending and force structure decisions among European nations, collectively, our European allies and partners still represent the second largest defense spending block (~$280 billion) in the world (NATO 13 April 2012 Press Release "Financial and Economic Data Relating to NATO Defence" (PR/CP(2012)047–REV1)—ahead of China (~$130 billion/year) and Russia (~$64 billion) (Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, Military Expenditure Database, http://milexdata.sipri.org). So, while it is true that governments continue to make inwardly focused decisions on defense spending—in many cases not achieving the self-imposed NATO 2 percent GDP benchmark—our European allies are still investing in defense, focused on contributing to NATO and preserving the expeditionary capabilities and interoperability that have been developed over the past decade of combat operations with the United States. However, it is of concern that the fiscal environment is driving key allies to undertake decisions that will have a material impact on their capabilities, forces, and ability to conduct future contingency operations. Given the persistent economic challenges and forecasts, our critical European allies and partners will continue to grapple in the coming years to maintain a full suite of interoperable capabilities and a sufficiently-sized, ready force to participate in global contingency operations. We must continue to engage, train, and exercise routinely with these allies and partners to influence and assist them in maintaining readiness and interoperability with U.S. forces. One of the ways we can ensure our allies and partners will be able to continue to shoulder their share of the global security burden is for U.S. forces to participate in combined and joint exercises, and utilize the U.S. Joint Multinational Training Command (Grafenwoehr and Hohenfels), which will build and sustain interoperability among themselves and with U.S. forces.

37. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, is the 1206 security assistance program still useful to EUCOM and your current mission?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. The section 1206 program remains essential to EUCOM's ability to support a successful ISAF transition in 2014 and the post-ISAF train, advise, and assist mission in Afghanistan. European allies and partners remain committed to deploying forces to Afghanistan in 2014 and beyond. The 1206 program enables us to provide willing allies (the NATO accessions of 1999 and 2004) and partners with the specialized equipment and training they need to operate safely and effectively in Afghanistan.

38. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what tangible results have you seen from the significant 1206 investment made over the years?

General BREEDLOVE. The investment of 1206 funding in Europe has produced significant results in the form of deployments of additional ally/partner nation forces to Afghanistan and enhancements in the operational effectiveness, safety, and interoperability of those deployed forces. Examples of supported deployments include nine battalion rotations of Georgian forces to RC-Southwest to support U.S. Marine Corps' forces; Security Force Assistance Teams from Albania and Croatia training ANSF; and contributions of Special Operations Forces from Poland, Romania, Hungary, and the Czech Republic. Perhaps most importantly, the 1206 program has built an enduring NATO-interoperable, expeditionary capability among willing allies and partners that will be available to support future operations.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS REDUCTIONS

39. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, prospects for cooperation with Russia on missile defense seem dim. In your opinion, what will it take for Russia to cooperate with the United States on missile defense?

General BREEDLOVE. The Russian distrust of the EPAA stems from their perception that EPAA is a threat to their strategic nuclear deterrent force. In my opinion, our best chance for success is engaging in information sharing and greater transparency measures so that they better understand our approach.

40. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, will the administration reduce nuclear weapons in Europe due to budget cuts or as a concession to Russia for a nuclear arms reduction deal?

General BREEDLOVE. NATO and the United States have repeatedly affirmed that U.S. nuclear weapons based in Europe are vital to alliance security and cohesion. The NATO Deterrence and Defense Posture Review, released last year and briefed at the Chicago Summit, states that nuclear weapons are a core component of NATO's overall capabilities for deterrence and defense alongside conventional and missile defense forces. The report also states that as long as nuclear weapons exist, NATO will remain a nuclear alliance. Until the President and NATO both agree on reducing or removing U.S nuclear weapons from Europe, they will remain based there.

41. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what is your assessment of how NATO and the Europeans would react to reductions of nuclear weapons in Europe with or without reciprocal Russian actions?

General BREEDLOVE. My assessment is that they would not react favorably to reductions not agreed to by NATO. The United States and NATO currently agree that U.S. nuclear weapons are a core component of NATO's capabilities for deterrence and defense. Without consultation with and concurrence from NATO on reductions of U.S. nuclear weapons based in Europe, they will remain based there at current strength.

42. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, the administration said it seeks to reduce tactical nuclear weapons in any future arms discussions with Russia, but Russia has established the condition that all U.S. tactical nuclear weapons must be removed from Europe. What is your position on whether the United States can or should remove tactical nuclear weapons from Europe in exchange for reductions in Russian weapons?

General BREEDLOVE. We support the administration's policy of basing tactical nuclear weapons in Europe in support of NATO and will continue to support that policy until directed otherwise by the President. Negotiations with Russia and/or NATO to remove U.S. tactical nuclear weapons from Europe are outside our purview.

43. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, what is NATO's position?

General BREEDLOVE. (Please see response to question #41). The Strategic Concept reconfirmed that as long as there are nuclear weapons in the world, NATO will remain a nuclear alliance. Deterrence, based on an appropriate mix of nuclear and conventional capabilities, remains a core element of NATO's strategy.

The Deterrence and Defense Posture Review of May 2012 has shown that the alliance's nuclear force posture currently meets the criteria for an effective deterrence and defense posture.

NATO's reduced reliance on nuclear forces has been manifested in steady and very significant reductions in the number of systems, overall weapon numbers and readiness levels since the end of the Cold War.

If there were to be a reduction in nuclear forces, allies agree that the North Atlantic Council (NAC) will task the appropriate committees to develop concepts that allow NATO to reduce its reliance on non-strategic nuclear weapons based in Europe. Additionally, the NAC would delineate what NATO would expect to see in the way or reciprocal Russian actions to allow for significant reductions in forward-based non-strategic nuclear weapons assigned to NATO.

The allies look forward to continuing to develop and exchange transparency and confidence building ideas with the Russia Federation in the NATO-Russia Council, with the goal of developing detailed proposals on and increasing mutual understanding of NATO's and Russia's non-strategic nuclear force postures in Europe. NATO is prepared to consider further reducing its requirement for non-strategic nuclear weapons assigned to the alliance in the context of reciprocal steps by Russia.

In addition, allies support and encourage the United States and the Russian Federation to continue their mutual efforts to promote strategic stability, enhance transparency, and further reduce their nuclear weapons.

44. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, has your command, or any other component of the U.S. Government that you know of, examined the feasibility of verifying Russian compliance with an agreement to reduce tactical nuclear weapons?

General BREEDLOVE. Not that I am aware of. We welcome continued efforts to secure an agreement with the Russian Federation that would increase transparency on the size and composition of its tactical nuclear arsenal. The administration is working to initiate, in consultation with NATO allies, negotiations with the Russian Federation on an agreement to secure and reduce tactical nuclear weapon stockpiles of the United States and the Russian Federation in a verifiable manner.

ARTICLE 60 MODIFICATIONS

45. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, commanders in the military are given great responsibility, literally over life and death. Decisions they make send men and women into battle where they may die or be severely wounded. This special trust and confidence is given to no other position in our Government. In line with this responsibility, commanders are given the autonomy to discipline, train, and reward their units so that they can establish a cohesive, mission ready unit capable of fighting and winning the Nation's wars. While we trust you with our sons' and daughters' lives, the proposed modifications to Article 60 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) seem to suggest that we do not trust your discretion when it comes to UCMJ offenses. Do you, as a commander, consider the UCMJ as it is currently structured, to be a viable tool to help you maintain and enhance the cohesiveness and fighting capabilities of your combat units?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. I believe the UCMJ, as currently structured, provides a tried and true military justice system that works fairly, ensures due process, maintains good order and discipline, and is accountable on and off the battlefield.

The independent authority of the commander to choose a particular course of action and/or disposition is balanced against a deliberate and robust procedural, clemency and appellate framework that provides an accused or convicted servicemember maximum due process rights. The comprehensive range of punitive options provides an effective deterrent against the commission of criminal misconduct, which strengthens unit morale, cohesiveness, and discipline. Current Service policies assist victims and witnesses through the military justice process to ensure all members are treated fairly and appropriately.

The military justice system operates effectively while maintaining the confidence of the force. Of course, part of the trust and confidence in our system is the fact that there is ongoing scrutiny and periodic updates to reflect our changing law and military structure.

46. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, have you seen any evidence that commanders are abusing their discretion as the convening authority to adjust sentencing?

General BREEDLOVE. I have seen no evidence that commanders are abusing their discretion as convening authorities to adjust sentencing. In my experience, commanders take this responsibility very seriously.

The fact that I am not aware of any abuse of discretion by convening authorities in adjusting sentencing does not mean there is no benefit in the Department's current scrutiny of the process. In fact, it is actions such as the Secretary's current review of sentencing authorities and the Department's record of making changes when warranted that ensures the continued trust in our laws.

47. Senator INHOFE. General Breedlove, the Secretary of Defense has announced that he intends to recommend changes to the UCMJ. How would the proposed changes to the UCMJ impact your effectiveness as a commander?

General BREEDLOVE. I am aware of and appreciate the Secretary of Defense's open mind and continued close scrutiny to maintain the value of the UCMJ as the most effective, fair, and protective military justice system.

I believe that any change or limitation in the authority or discretion of a convening authority requires careful thought to avoid unintended consequences to the effective administration of military justice. At a minimum, the fair and efficient administration of military justice requires convening authorities to retain the ability to conduct pretrial negotiations, and where appropriate, enter into pretrial agreements that provide limitations on adjudged punishments in exchange for guilty pleas.

The UCMJ is one of the things that makes the U.S. military great. I believe the intent of the Secretary's changes is, in part, to preserve the fairness, transparency, and appropriateness of convening authority actions. This is the very heart of the public trust in this system.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR SAXBY CHAMBLISS

BENGHAZI

48. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Breedlove, the attack in Benghazi, Libya, on September 11, 2012, highlighted several failures in our Nation's ability to respond effectively and timely to situations that threaten the lives of our citizens and interests within the region. You had command authority over the EUCOM-assigned air forces tasked with supporting the U.S. Africa Command (AFRICOM) area of responsibility. Could you describe in detail, the timeline and sequence of events for U.S. Air Forces, Europe in response to the Benghazi attack that resulted in the deaths of four Americans, to include U.S. Ambassador Chris Stevens?

General BREEDLOVE. The timeline below reflects the response to the Benghazi incident from the air component perspective. The timeline includes the U.S. Air Forces in Europe and the U.S. Air Forces Africa response from the time of the actual Benghazi incident.

Tuesday, September 11, 2012
GMT // EET

1942 // 2142	Incident starts at the facility in Benghazi.
1959 // 2159	An unarmed, unmanned, surveillance aircraft is directed to reposition overhead the Benghazi facility.
2111 // 2311	Diverted surveillance aircraft arrives on station over Benghazi facility.

Wednesday, September 12, 2012
GMT // EET

0132 // 0332	USAFE Battle Watch receives notification from AFRICOM Joint Operations Center (JOC) that the consulate in Benghazi has been attacked. AFRICOM JOC reports the US Ambassador as Missing.
0200 // 0400	USAFE cancels all pre-planned airlift missions for potential retasking. USAFE recalls all C-130J airlift aircrew, waives crew rest, and places maximum number of crews available on 3-hour alert. Aircraft are re-configured, defensive measures loaded, and fueled to support airlift of SOF and FAST in support of Libya operations.

Wednesday, September 12, 2012 (cont.)
GMT // EET

0300 // 0500	Second, unmanned, unarmed surveillance aircraft is directed to relieve the initial assets still over Benghazi.
0405 // 0605	AFRICOM requests a TRANSCOM C-17 aircraft on CENTCOM Aeromedical alert in Germany to prepare to deploy to Libya to evacuate Americans.
~0430//0630	USAFE AIR OPERATIONS CENTER (AOC) receives update on Benghazi situation from AFRICOM and is queried about providing fighter aircraft for Libya support. Close Air Support planners recalled to AOC.
~0440//0640	USAFE/AFAF Staff directs AOC to have USAFE Fighter Wing (Italy) to prepare 6 F-16s for Libya operations/support.
0509 // 0709	USAFE C-130J (HERKY 803) departs Ramstein, Germany to support movement of EUCOM special operations force and equipment from Stuttgart, Germany to NAS Sigonella, Italy.
0611 // 0811	USAFE C-130J (HERKY 656) departs Ramstein, Germany to support movement of USMC FAST platoon and associated equipment from NAS Rota, Spain to Tripoli, Libya.
0742 // 0942	USAFE C-130J departs (HERKY 655) Spangdahlem, Germany for movement of USMC FAST platoon and associated equipment from NAS Rota, Spain to Tripoli, Libya.
0900 // 1100	USAFE Battle Staff stood up and began conducting 24-hour operations.
1108 // 1308	USAFE/CV provides COMUSAFE's written guidance for USAFE fighter generation and heightened alert status: Italy – 4 fighter aircraft generated with 2 on alert; Germany – 4 fighter aircraft generated with 2 on alert; United Kingdom – 4 fighter aircraft generated, 2 on alert.
1114 // 1314	USAFE C-130J (HERKY 858) departs Ramstein, Germany to support movement of EUCOM special operations force and equipment from Stuttgart, Germany to NAS Sigonella, Italy.
1120 // 1320	USAFE C-130J (LION 435) departs Ramstein, Germany en route Tripoli, Libya as back-up to C-17 evacuation mission (with 3-person airfield security team).

Wednesday, September 12, 2012 (cont.)
GMT // EET

1214 // 1414	TRANSCOM Aeromedical Evacuation Alert (ISO CENTCOM Alert) C-17 departs Ramstein, Germany en route to Tripoli, Libya to evacuate Americans.
1635//1835	USAFE C-130Js (HERKY 803 ATA 1110Z / HERKY /858 ATA 1635Z) carrying EUCOM special operations forces, and associated equipment, arrive at an intermediate staging base in southern Europe.
1717 // 1917	C-17 departs Tripoli en route Ramstein, Germany, with American personnel and the remains of Ambassador Stevens, Sean Smith, Tyrone Woods, and Glen Doherty.
1757//1957	EUCOM special operations force, and associated equipment, arrives at an intermediate staging base in southern Europe.
1802//2002	USAFE C-130Js (HERKY 656 ATA 1802Z / HERKY 655 ATA 1855Z) carrying the FAST platoon and associated equipment, arrives in Tripoli.
2019 // 2219	Repatriation C-17 arrives in Ramstein, Germany.

49. Senator CHAMBLISS. General Breedlove, if confirmed, what changes to force structure and alert posture in Europe are necessary to respond more effectively to a future Benghazi-like event?

General BREEDLOVE. I am satisfied with EUCOM's actions with regard to our alert forces post-Benghazi. I intend to continue the ongoing efforts to adapt and refine EUCOM forces and alert postures which will enable us to effectively and expeditiously respond to the increasingly dangerous global security atmosphere characterized as the "new normal".

In the last 6 months, EUCOM has worked aggressively to provide scalable, rapidly deployable, special operations and security forces to protect and preserve U.S. personnel and facilities in the event of regional unrest. These forces maintain sufficient depth and flexibility to deliver a variety of pre- and post-crisis response options in both the EUCOM and AFRICOM areas of responsibility (AORs). EUCOM coordinates weekly with the Joint Staff and AFRICOM to evaluate potential indications and warnings, and adjusts force postures if required. To date, EUCOM has modified force structure and alert posture 14 times in response to changing strategic events.

Currently, EUCOM continues its efforts to transform the post-Benghazi response force construct into a flexible and scalable set of options. We continue to provide basing and access to AFRICOM response forces, and we are significantly increasing those capabilities within our theater. EUCOM recently coordinated with Spain to host U.S. Marine Corps forces to support AFRICOM crisis response missions, and we are already receiving the first wave of marines. We are in the process of transferring additional security teams and combat enablers to AFRICOM before 01 June 2013. EUCOM's U.S. Army component has developed a scalable contingency force with robust augmentation capabilities for rapid deployment anywhere in the EUCOM theater. This new contingency response force will be ready for employment prior to 01 June 2013.

As we look to the future, EUCOM will continue to collaborate with the Joint Staff, adjacent combatant commands, and U.S. Government agencies to review threats, intelligence products, and other indications/warnings that would potentially require crisis response forces. We will continue to mitigate risk by maintaining adaptive force structure and alert posture within our own forces, and request assistance where required. Finally, we will continue our efforts to build and preserve existing strategic partnerships which are vital in providing basing and access. These efforts are crucial to facilitating rapid response of U.S. forces and enablers.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

RUSSIA RESET

50. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, is the Putin Government in full compliance with all existing arms control agreements with the United States?

General BREEDLOVE. Since EUCOM does not participate in the verification process for arms control treaties, I would refer you to the President's annual report, submitted through the Department of State, on "Adherence to and Compliance with Arms Control, Nonproliferation, and Disarmament Agreements and Commitments" required by section 403 of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, as amended (22 U.S.C 2593a).

SANCTIONS ON IRAN

51. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, would you agree that Iran's missile development program and effort to acquire a nuclear weapons capability threaten not only U.S. national security, but also the national security of our allies in Israel and Europe?

General BREEDLOVE. I do agree with that assessment.

52. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, do you share President Obama's assessment that U.S. and international sanctions should be utilized to the fullest extent to persuade Iran to halt its nuclear weapons program?

General BREEDLOVE. I do.

53. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, the United States has implemented full sanctions against Iran Air and Mahan Air, but the European Commission has not implemented full sanctions. These airlines have facilitated the illicit activities of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) through their transport of IRGC operatives, arms shipments, and funds. Additionally, these two airlines have ferried weapons from Iran to Bashar al Assad's regime in Syria. These shipments have enabled Assad to continue his slaughter of the Syrian people. Are you aware of the activities of Iran Air and Mahan Air?

General BREEDLOVE. I am aware that in October 2011, the U.S. Department of Treasury designated the Iranian commercial airline Mahan Air as a specially designated terrorist entity pursuant to E.O. 13224 for providing financial, material, and technological support to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps-Qods Force (IRGC–QF). IRGC–QF uses Mahan Air to ship arms, transfer funds, and ferry personnel. Mahan Air also has provided transportation services to Lebanese Hezbollah, transporting personnel, weapons, and goods on behalf of Hezbollah.

I am also aware that Iran Air was designated in June 2011 pursuant to E.O. 13382 for providing support and services to Iran's Ministry of Defense Armed Forces Logistics, Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, and the IRGC. Iran Air has transported rockets and missiles via passenger aircraft, and IRGC officers occasionally take control of Iran Air flights carrying sensitive IRGC-related cargo.

In September 2012, Treasury identified as blocked property 117 aircraft operated by Iran Air, Mahan Air, or Yas Air (another designated Iranian cargo airline) to disrupt the flow of weapons and communications equipment to the Syrian regime. Iran has used Iran Air and Mahan Air flights between Tehran and Damascus to send military and crowd control equipment to the Syrian regime, in coordination with Lebanese Hizballah. Iran has used deceptive measures when shipping illicit materials to Syria, by using a combination of passenger and cargo flights and declaring illicit cargo as humanitarian and other licit goods.

The EU has not implemented full sanctions on Iran Air or Mahan Air, but many Western European airports refuse Iran Air refueling services, forcing Iran Air to terminate several European routes.

54. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, are you aware that some of the international destinations of these airlines include European cities?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. Although Iran Air has terminated several European routes due to some Western European airports refusing refueling services, I am aware that as of April 2013, Iran Air still flies to European destinations in Austria, Azerbaijan, Denmark, France, Italy, Germany, Netherlands, Sweden, Turkey, and the UK. I am also aware that Mahan Air still has routes to European destinations in Cyprus, Germany, and Turkey.

55. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, if confirmed, will you work with the State Department to encourage our European allies to increase even further their sanctions against Iran?

General BREEDLOVE. I will. At the same time, I will make sure that I am supporting the State Department's lead and remaining strictly within my role as a military leader.

56. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, will you look specifically at this issue related to Iran Air and Mahan Air?

General BREEDLOVE. I will look specifically at Iran and Mahan Air, and will continue EUCOM engagement with U.S. intelligence and interagency partners on this issue, to monitor the illicit activities of Iran Air and Mahan Air as well as other Iranian airlines that facilitate Iran's illicit activities.

VALUE OF U.S. MILITARY FORCES IN EUROPE

57. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, in light of the rebalance to Asia and our Nation's budget crisis, how would you respond to those who argue that the United States can't afford to maintain a significant U.S. military presence in Europe and should dramatically reduce or even eliminate the U.S. military presence there?

General BREEDLOVE. We recognize the challenges of the fiscal environment and, in accordance with the Defense Strategic Guidance, continue to consolidate our installations and seek additional efficiencies in U.S. overseas posture while maintaining the necessary capacity to meet our mission requirements.

Why Europe? First, Europe is home to most of the world's liberal democracies, with which we share fundamental values, a critical element to building coalitions. Second, Europe's importance to the U.S. and global economy cannot be overstated. Its $19.2 trillion total gross domestic product accounts for approximately 25 percent of the global economy with $3.9 trillion in annual trade between the United States and Europe. Third, the European theater represents critical strategic terrain, providing the global access needed for rapid crisis response by four U.S. combatant commanders. Fourth, the EUCOM theater is home to NATO, history's most successful alliance and essential to our ability to meet the challenges of the 21st century. Fifth, Europe is a security provider vice consumer, contributing over 50,000 personnel to NATO and U.N. operations worldwide and spending approximately $280 billion on defense (second only to the United States and well ahead of China and Russia). No other region possesses a comparable pool of willing and capable allies and partners for the United States for conducting global operations.

We will continue to advocate for a deliberate and balanced approach to posture in Europe to ensure that future changes meet minimum requirements to conduct U.S. contingency operations, support U.S. global strategic access, and meet our NATO commitments.

58. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, from the perspective of U.S. interests, what is the value of retaining a significant U.S. military presence in Europe?

General BREEDLOVE. DOD's strategic approach to defense posture is to maintain a forward posture that promotes U.S. strategic interests by being either essential to U.S. security, or providing geopolitical advantages, such as stronger bilateral or multilateral political, economic, or cultural ties. This inclination to maintain a forward presence is further supported by the following principles:

(1) First, in an era of resource constraints, the United States cannot effectively manage global security challenges on its own. The presence of U.S. military forces overseas can be a powerful catalyst for promoting multilateral approaches and regional security architectures that serve both U.S. and partner states' interests.
(2) Second, the long-term presence of U.S. forces abroad reassures allies and partners of our commitment to mutual security relationships, generates enduring trust and goodwill with host nations, and increases regional and cultural expertise in the force. The United States cannot simply "surge" trust and relationships on demand.
(3) Third, our defense posture must balance the benefits of an overseas presence that assures allies and partners of our commitments, with the need for flexibility to respond to contingencies, emerging threats, and global security needs in distant theaters. These are not mutually exclusive aims. In fact, reducing U.S. presence in a region to increase flexibility for global deployments may have a perverse effect; it may weaken U.S. relationships with host nations and lessen their willingness to receive surge U.S. forces during a crisis.

Forces stationed overseas provide greater utility by 'doing' almost everything CONUS based forces 'do' except contribute to a local community's economic viability. However, these overseas forces also demonstrate U.S. commitment to our allies; assure, deter, and dissuade; provide increased flexibility and responsiveness; enhance U.S. access into and through the European theater; help justify the U.S. leadership role in NATO; provide multi-national training opportunities; offer exposure to and awareness of culture differences; and reduce stress on the rotational force by being on-station.

TURKEY

59. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, how do you assess Turkey's role in NATO?

General BREEDLOVE. Turkey, with the second largest body of military manpower, after that of the United States, has been a steadfast ally and member of NATO since 1952. Turkey has been a major provider of forces and capabilities for NATO-led operations and has made substantial contributions to the NATO Response Force.

Its strategic geographic position on the alliance's southern flank supports NATO interests in the Black Sea and Eastern Mediterranean regions. In addition to access to sites for forward deployment in support of U.S. and alliance operations, Turkey has hosted a variety of NATO military headquarters since 1952. Today, it is host to the only Land Component headquarters in NATO's integrated military Command Structure in Izmir. Turkey, additionally, serves as the framework nation for a NATO Rapid Deployable Corps (NRDC) headquarters in Istanbul, which could be deployed on short notice in support of alliance operations. Turkey sponsors a NATO-accredited Center of Excellence for Defense against Terrorism in Ankara as well as a Partnership for Peace Training Center, which was established in an effort to contribute to the training and interoperability efforts of NATO's partner nations. Turkey is also host to an AN/TPY–2 early warning radar which is an essential component of Phase 1 of the EPAA to Missile Defense and an integral part of NATO's Missile Defense architecture. This radar serves as a U.S. contribution to NATO Missile Defense, as agreed at the 2010 Lisbon Summit.

60. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, what has been Turkey's role in Afghanistan?

General BREEDLOVE. In the words of William Holbrooke at the NATO Defense Ministers meeting, "I can think of no other country in the ISAF alliance that has a role that is more important than Turkey's in terms of operations in Afghanistan." Today, Turkey has a wide ranging and critical role in Afghanistan. This is in part due to the rich and enduring relationship that Turkey established with the newly independent Afghanistan in 1921, and which Turkey has maintained largely uninterrupted for decades. Turkey clearly plays an enduring and critical part, both as a NATO member with a troop contingent in ISAF, but also in a broader sense through its engagement in international cooperation and development with projects focused on alleviating conditions which are systemic drivers of conflict. In these areas, Turkey has focused on education, health, and infrastructure development to improve the Afghan quality of life. Within the NATO context, Turkey has commanded Regional Command-Capital three times. Turkey has also provided the NATO Senior Civilian Representative in Afghanistan twice. It has contributed two Provincial Reconstruction teams and today has more than 1,000 troops deployed as part of ISAF. Turkey's role will remain critical in the future precisely because of its unique place in the Muslim world, its longstanding NATO membership, and its historical and sustained connection with Afghanistan.

61. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, can you give me an update on our military relationship with Turkey?

General BREEDLOVE. The bilateral military relationship with Turkey is strong and coordination has improved over the last year. Events in Syria, though tragic, have provided opportunities for closer cooperation in prudent planning in which our military staffs are working directly with one another. Turkey has also been a valuable ally that has been instrumental in the expansion of the EPAA to missile defense by hosting a radar installation at Kürecik. Despite today's hard fiscal realities, both nations' militaries are preserving optimum opportunities for engagement and exchanges that help us to share common experiences and understand one another's priorities and objectives. Turkey's involvement in security cooperation is as deep as their operational commitment. Turkey spent $8.5 billion on Foreign Military Sales with the United States last year. This is a very high level of spending, but it is tending to decrease as Turkey establishes more domestic ability to produce its own equipment and weapons systems. Turkey manages International Military Education and Training (IMET) very efficiently, covering all expenses for their students and applying IMET funds only to the cost of educating their servicemembers. As a result, Turkey sent almost 400 students to American military schools and programs under the IMET program last year, more than any other ally or partner.

62. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, what is the relationship between Turkey and Iran?

General BREEDLOVE. The Turkey-Iran relationship is multifaceted including issues of energy, trade, cultural, and politico-security cooperation. Iran is Turkey's second largest supplier of natural gas and Ankara relies on Iranian oil for its own consumption. Turkey and Iran also have a shared concern with Kurdish separatism—to include some limited intelligence sharing and joint security operations—and a common interest in avoiding another wide-scale military confrontation in the region. However, opposing positions on Syria (Ankara supports the Opposition while Tehran supports the Regime), Turkey hosting the NATO ballistic missile defense radar, and Turkey's adherence to U.S.-European Union sanctions on Iran has resulted in some chilling of ties.

63. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, how does Turkey view Iran's nuclear program?

General BREEDLOVE. Ankara continues its public support for Tehran's nuclear ambitions, which Turkey views as Iran's right to seek peaceful nuclear technology, and disagrees with sanctions as a means to force Tehran into compliance. However, Ankara has said it does not support Tehran possessing nuclear weapons. Ankara will use its influence with Tehran to pressure acceptance to the offer from the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) under which Tehran would transfer all of its 20 percent-enriched uranium (which lies at the dividing line between low-enriched uranium and highly-enriched uranium) to a third country under IAEA custody. While Ankara has not officially adopted U.S.-European Union sanctions as policy, it recognizes its responsibility to comply.

With respect to Turkey's reaction to a strike on Iranian nuclear facilities, analyses indicate that Turkey would react harshly against any military strike against Iranian nuclear facilities as Ankara has consistently opposed, both publicly and privately, military action against Iran. Officially, the Turkish military is also opposed to a strike, believing the consequences would be "disastrous," and a broad consensus of Turkish intellectuals view a nuclear-armed Iran as the second worst outcome for the region, behind an attack against Iran's nuclear facilities.

64. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, how do you believe Turkey would respond if Iran acquires a nuclear weapons capability?

General BREEDLOVE. Ankara has repeatedly stated it will not accept any neighbor possessing any weapons that it does not possess, particularly nuclear weaponry. However, Turkey is unlikely to take any unilateral action against Iran absent provocation. Ankara will likely demand proof of claims—beyond assertions by Israeli officials—that Tehran has developed nuclear weapons capability. If Ankara accepts the evidence as substantiating the claims, we expect the reaction to be measured based on Tehran's stance. At present, Turkey relies heavily on Iranian oil and gas for Turkey's own consumption; until there is a reliable and affordable alternative source, Ankara will be hard pressed to risk damaging energy relations.

- Ankara would likely issue public statements condemning the development of nuclear weapons and would highlight the additional instability to the region.
- Ankara would likely recall its Ambassador to Tehran for "consultations," but would not completely sever diplomatic relations. Expelling Iranian officials is also a possible option, but would likely only impact lower secretarial positions.
- Ankara would probably support a United Nations Security Council/General Assembly resolution condemning the activity.
- Militarily, we would not expect to see any shifting of Turkish forces or equipment to the shared border with Iran. However, Ankara may seek additional NATO assurances of protection given Turkey's hosting of the ballistic missile defense radar.
- Ankara may create its own sanctions targeting existing bilateral relations such as limits on gold imports, or further reducing imports of oil.

65. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, what is your assessment of the current relationship between Turkey and Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. Turkish-Israeli relations have been strained for several years, declining since at least 2009 and stressed further following the deaths of nine Turkish citizens resulting from Israel's May 2010 interdiction of the Turkish M/V MAVI MARMARA. Since Israel's extension of the apology to Turkey for the incident, the two countries have entered into a discussion on the exchange of Defense Attaches. Any further progress at this time is likely to depend on the outcome of the reparations discussions. A draft compensation agreement was reached between the two countries on May 7, 2013, but a formal settlement has not yet been reached.

66. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, how important is the bilateral relationship between Turkey and Israel?

General BREEDLOVE. A strong bilateral relationship between Turkey and Israel is key to advancing stability in the region and could provide more support for reinvigorating the Middle East peace process. For NATO and the United States, warm relations between Turkey and Israel also open the door for more NATO-Israel engagement-which Turkey has the ability to veto at the present time. From the U.S. perspective, a strong relationship between two allies removes roadblocks to advancing U.S. policies in the region and restarting some suspended multilateral military training opportunities.

EUROPEAN DEFENSE SPENDING

67. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, NATO countries agree to spend at least 2 percent of their GDP on defense. Yet, many European countries do not honor this commitment. For example, Spain has averaged 1.1 percent defense spending over the last few years. How does this low defense spending in many European countries impact their military capabilities, as well as their ability to operate effectively with U.S. forces?

General BREEDLOVE. The continued European focus on austerity measures in response to the economic crisis has forced painful military spending decisions on many countries. Collectively, our European allies and partners still represent the second largest defense spending block (~$280 billion) in the world—ahead of China (~$130 billion/year) and Russia (~$64 billion). So, while it is true that governments continue to make tough choices on defense spending, our European allies are still contributing to NATO and attempting to preserve the expeditionary capabilities and interoperability that have been developed over the past decade of combat operations. Despite limited resourcing, European partners have made other significant contributions to security. In 2010, seven European countries (United Kingdom (1.54 percent), France (1.36 percent), Iceland (1.22 percent), Germany (1.2 percent), Netherlands (1.17 percent), Denmark (1.15 percent), and Norway (1.04 percent)) exceeded the U.S. funding contribution to U.N. peace operations by percent of GDP (which was .97 percent). I am concerned about the future military capabilities of our allies and partners given current levels of defense spending. A disproportionate amount of the spending cuts are from research, development and acquisition. These impacts not only effect current readiness, but potentially create a growing capability gap which will only be partially offset by NATO Smart Defense and European pooling and sharing efforts. This is a real challenge that will require serious effort and attention to address over the next few years. Since the Europeans represent our most reliable and capable security partners, it has a profound impact on our ability to address challenges as we also contend with reduced defense spending. In terms of European forces operating effectively alongside the United States, I am slightly more optimistic. While we will face a capability and capacity gap, there is real potential to maintain interoperable forces through the NATO Connected Forces Initiative. If we invest the time and resources to exercise and train with our allies and partners, I am confident we can preserve our hard won interoperability gains earned from 10 years of shared sacrifice in places like Afghanistan. The U.S. Joint Multinational Readiness Center (Hohenfels) and Joint Multinational Training Center (Grafenwoehr), and the U.S. Air Force Warrior Preparation Center (Miesenbach) will be crucial to this effort.

68. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, what role could you play in encouraging our defense partners to devote more of their resources to defense spending?

General BREEDLOVE. In both my capacities as Supreme Allied Commander Europe and as Commander, EUCOM, I have a responsibility and active interest to ensure that our most reliable, capable and willing partners are prepared and ready to address the full range of 21st century challenges. The decision to devote more resources to defense spending will be a political one. But the role I can play, as part of a network of defense professionals, is to inform the political debate by identifying the requirements and the risks imposed by a failure to adequately invest in defense. Using both offices, I will engage with key leaders to argue for holding the line on defense spending, push within NATO to support the acquisition of critical capabilities, and ensure that the EUCOM steady state engagement and country cooperation plans focus on encouraging the appropriate resources are devoted to building the required capabilities. Additionally, as NATO nations begin to develop efficiencies through Smart Defense, it will be crucial to ensure these efficiencies are reinvested in defense and not simply used to justify further defense budget cuts. Finally, through key leader engagements, supporting regional approaches, and building and resourcing capabilities, I can help make the right arguments to support European Defense Chiefs and Ministers in order to sway political leaders to continue to invest in defense. In this capacity, I will also respectfully ask Members of Congress to continue to engage with European and Canadian counterparts through such mechanisms as the NATO Parliamentary Assembly to also help influence our partners and allies to make responsible decisions involving their security and examine alternative approaches to austerity in order to ensure their economic future.

PERSONNEL

69. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, to what extent does EUCOM rely on DOD civilians and contractors to fulfill EUCOM's responsibilities?

General BREEDLOVE. Within the EUCOM headquarters, civilians and contractors make up nearly 55 percent of the assigned strength. They are an integral part of the command that provide invaluable contributions daily in support of the EUCOM mission.

70. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, how has sequestration affected the civilian contractors and DOD civilians working at EUCOM, and how has that affected EUCOM's ability to perform its missions?

General BREEDLOVE. The effects of sequestration are many and are substantial. Currently, EUCOM has had to enforce a civilian hiring freeze which has severely hindered the command's ability to recruit and fill vacancies. Additionally, the command's ability to augment exercise and contingency operations with approving overtime for civilians and contractors has been eliminated. The effects throughout the command with respect to employee satisfaction and morale have also been significant as employees are distracted by the concern over stability, job security, and potential financial hardship.

71. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, to what extent does EUCOM utilize personnel from its Reserve component to support EUCOM's work?

General BREEDLOVE. EUCOM currently has 1,066 Reserve component positions with reservists assigned. These personnel are mobilization assets who support EUCOM during their 2 weeks of Annual Training each year. Additionally, EUCOM augments the Active Duty staff with reservists on 1 year Active Duty orders. There are 135 Reserve component personnel at the EUCOM headquarters and the Joint Analysis Center on 1 year Active Duty orders.

72. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, is the use of Reserve personnel the most cost efficient method to support surges in demand for personnel at EUCOM and to make up for temporary reductions in the civilian and contractor workforce at EUCOM, such as those caused by sequestration?

General BREEDLOVE. Reserve component personnel provide a valued resource in terms of experience and depth when augmenting the EUCOM staff during surge or contingency operations. Many Reserve component personnel have expertise currently not resident on the staff and are effective stop-gap measures for temporary surges and limited contingencies, or until Active component personnel can be obtained.

73. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, is annual training in Europe for EUCOM reservists critical to maintaining their proficiency and ability to seamlessly integrate into EUCOM's staff?

General BREEDLOVE. Yes. The training value that our reservists receive when conducting Annual Training in Europe cannot be replicated in CONUS. Virtual means of staying "connected" across the Atlantic with the headquarters are useful tools—especially throughout the year, but by themselves do not provide the required level of proficiency in EUCOM HQs operations. Staff process training can only be fully addressed when in situ, making them fully capable in times of crises and support.

74. Senator AYOTTE. General Breedlove, will EUCOM continue to facilitate annual training in Europe for EUCOM reservists and utilize them as a cost-efficient means to cope with fluctuating personnel demands so that EUCOM can fulfill its vital national security-related missions?

General BREEDLOVE. EUCOM will continue to facilitate that training. Annual training in Europe for our reservists is an enabler for the command and provides a key capability that can be employed in contingency and surge operations.

EUCOM will also continue to use reservists to meet its fluctuating personnel demands.

[The nomination reference of Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, USAF, follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 8, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

The following named officer for appointment in the U.S. Air Force to the grade indicated while assigned to a position of importance and responsibility under title 10, U.S.C., section 601:

To be General.

Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, USAF, 5587.

[The biographical sketch of Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, USAF, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF GEN. PHILIP M. BREEDLOVE, USAF

Gen. Philip M. Breedlove is Commander, U.S. Air Forces in Europe; Commander, U.S. Air Forces Africa; Commander, Air Component Command, Ramstein; and Director, Joint Air Power Competence Centre, Kalkar, Germany. He is responsible for Air Force activities, conducted through 3rd Air Force, in an area of operations covering more than 19 million square miles. This area includes 105 countries in Europe, Africa, Asia and the Middle East, and the Arctic and Atlantic oceans, and possesses more than a quarter of the world's population and generates more than a quarter of the world's gross domestic product.

General Breedlove was raised in Forest Park, GA, and was commissioned in 1977 as a distinguished graduate of Georgia Tech's ROTC program. He has been assigned to numerous operational, command and staff positions, and has completed nine overseas tours, including two remote tours. He has commanded a fighter squadron, an operations group, three fighter wings, and a numbered air force. Additionally, he has served as operations officer in the Pacific Command Division on the Joint Staff; executive officer to the Commander of Headquarters Air Combat Command; the senior military assistant to the Secretary of the Air Force; and Vice Director for Strategic Plans and Policy on the Joint Staff.

Prior to assuming his current position, General Breedlove served Vice Chief of Staff of the U.S. Air Force, Washington, DC. As Vice Chief, he presided over the Air Staff and served as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Requirements Oversight Council and Deputy Advisory Working Group. He assisted the Chief of Staff with organizing, training, and equipping of 680,000 Active Duty, Guard, Reserve and civilian forces serving in the United States and overseas. General Breedlove has flown combat missions in Operation Joint Forge/Joint Guardian. He is a command pilot with 3,500 flying hours, primarily in the F–16.

Education:

1977 - Bachelor's degree in civil engineering, Georgia Institute of Technology.

1982 - Distinguished graduate, Squadron Officer School, Maxwell Air Force Base (AFB), AL.

1991 - Distinguished graduate, Air Command and Staff College, Maxwell Air Force Base, AL.

1991 - Master of Science degree in aeronautical technology, Arizona State University.

1995 - Master's degree in national security studies, National War College, Fort Lesley J. McNair, Washington, DC.

2002 - Fellow, Massachusetts Institute of Technology Seminar XXI, Washington, DC.

Assignments:

From	To	Assignment
March 1978	March 1979	Student, undergraduate pilot training, Williams AFB, AZ.
March 1979	August 1979	Pilot instructor training, Randolph AFB, TX.
August 1979	January 1983	T–37 instructor pilot, evaluation flight examiner and runway supervisory unit controller, Williams AFB, AZ.
January 1983	September 1983	F–16 student pilot, MacDill AFB, FL.
September 1983	January 1985	F–16 aircraft commander and instructor pilot, 614th Tactical Fighter Squadron, Torrejon AB, Spain.
January 1985	March 1987	Air liaison officer, 602nd Air Support Operations Group, Kitzingen AB, West Germany.
March 1987	January 1988	F–16 pilot, 526th Tactical Fighter Squadron, Ramstein AB, West Germany.
January 1988	August 1988	Chief of Flight Safety, 316th Air Division, Ramstein AB, West Germany.
August 1988	August 1990	F–16 flight commander, then assistant operations officer, 512th Tactical Fighter Squadron, Ramstein AB, Germany.
August 1990	July 1991	Student, Air Command and Staff College, Maxwell AFB, AL.
July 1991	May 1993	Chief of Air Operations, United Nations Command and Republic of Korea/U.S. Combined Forces Command, Yongsan Army Garrison, South Korea.
May 1993	July 1994	Commander, 80th Fighter Squadron, Kunsan AB, South Korea.
July 1994	June 1995	Student, National War College, Fort Lesley J. McNair, Washington, DC.
June 1995	July 1997	Operations officer, U.S. Pacific Command Division, Joint Staff, the Pentagon, Washington, DC.
July 1997	June 1999	Commander, 27th Operations Group, Cannon AFB, NM.
June 1999	May 2000	Executive officer to the Commander, Headquarters Air Combat Command, Langley AFB, VA.
May 2000	May 2001	Commander, 8th Fighter Wing, Kunsan AB, South Korea.
June 2001	June 2002	Senior military assistant to the Secretary of the Air Force, Headquarters U.S. Air Force, Washington, DC.
June 2002	June 2004	Commander, 56th Fighter Wing, Luke AFB, AZ.
June 2004	June 2005	Commander, 31st Fighter Wing, Aviano AB, Italy.
June 2005	October 2006	Vice Commander, 16th Air Force, Ramstein AB, Germany.
October 2006	July 2008	Vice Director for Strategic Plans and Policy, Joint Staff, the Pentagon, Washington, DC.
July 2008	August 2009	Commander, 3rd Air Force, Ramstein AB, Germany.
August 2009	January 2011	Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations, Plans and Requirements, Headquarters U.S. Air Force, Washington, DC.
January 2011	July 2012	Vice Chief of Staff of the U.S. Air Force, Washington, DC.
July 2012	present	Commander, U.S. Air Forces in Europe; Commander, U.S. Air Forces in Africa; Commander, Air Component Command, Ramstein Air Base, Germany; and Director, Joint Air Power Competency Center, Ramstein.

Summary of joint assignments:

From	To	Assignment
July 1991	May 1993	Chief of Air Operations, United Nations Command and Republic of Korea/U.S. Combined Forces Command, Yongsan Army Garrison, South Korea, as a major.
June 1995	July 1997	Operations officer, U.S. Pacific Command Division, Joint Staff, the Pentagon, Washington, DC, as a lieutenant colonel.
October 2006	July 2008	Vice Director for Strategic Plans and Policy, Joint Staff, the Pentagon, Washington, DC, as a major general.

Flight information:

Rating: Command pilot
Flight hours: More than 3,500
Aircraft flown: F–16, T–37, and C–21

Major awards and decorations:
Distinguished Service Medal
Defense Superior Service Medal
Legion of Merit with three oak leaf clusters
Defense Meritorious Service Medal with two oak leaf clusters
Meritorious Service Medal with three oak leaf clusters
Aerial Achievement Medal

Effective dates of promotion:
Second Lieutenant, June 1, 1977
First Lieutenant, Dec. 10, 1979
Captain, Dec. 10, 1981
Major, Nov. 1, 1988
Lieutenant Colonel, June 1, 1993
Colonel, Jan. 1, 1998
Brigadier General, Oct. 1, 2003
Major General, June 23, 2006
Lieutenant General, July 21, 2008
General, Jan. 14, 2011

[The Committee on Armed Services requires certain senior military officers nominated by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial, and other information of the nominee. The form executed by Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, USAF, in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Philip M. Breedlove.

2. Position to which nominated:
Commander, U.S. European Command Supreme Allied Commander, Europe.

3. Date of nomination:
April 8, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:

September 21, 1955; Atlanta, GA.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married to Cynthia Sue Breedlove (maiden name: Thompson).

7. Names and ages of children:
Samantha Leigh Tromly, 26.
Rebecca Nichole Breedlove, 23.
Daniel Jesse Breedlove, 18.

8. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed in the service record extract provided to the committee by the executive branch.

I have no advisory, consultative, honorary, or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed in the service record.

9. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.

I currently hold no positions as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, firm, partnership, or other business, enterprise, education, or other institution.

10. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.

I am a board member on the Advisory Board of the School of Civil and Environmental Engineering, Georgia Institute of Technology.

11. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements other than those listed on the service record extract provided to the committee by the executive branch.

I currently hold no scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, or have received any other special recognition for outstanding service or achievements other than those listed on the service record.

12. Commitment to testify before Senate committees: Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before any duly constituted committee of the Senate?

If confirmed, I agree to appear and testify upon request before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

13. Personal views: Do you agree, when asked before any duly constituted committee of Congress, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

I agree to provide my personal views, if asked, before any duly constituted committee of Congress even if my views differ from the administration in power.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–E of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–E are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

PHILIP M. BREEDLOVE.

This 15th day of February, 2013.

[The nomination of Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, USAF, was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on April 17, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on April 18, 2013.]

NOMINATIONS OF GEN MARTIN E. DEMPSEY, USA, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND REAPPOINTMENT AS CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF; AND ADM JAMES A. WINNEFELD, JR., USN, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF ADMIRAL AND REAPPOINTMENT AS VICE CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

THURSDAY, JULY 18, 2013

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC.

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:36 a.m. in room SH–216, Hart Senate Office Building, Senator Carl Levin (chairman) presiding.

Committee members present: Senators Levin, Reed, Nelson, McCaskill, Hagan, Shaheen, Gillibrand, Blumenthal, Donnelly, Kaine, King, Inhofe, McCain, Sessions, Chambliss, Wicker, Ayotte, and Graham.

Committee staff members present: Peter K. Levine, staff director; and Leah C. Brewer, nominations and hearings clerk.

Majority staff members present: Richard W. Fieldhouse, professional staff member; Michael J. Kuiken, professional staff member; Gerald J. Leeling, general counsel; Mariah K. McNamara, special assistant to the staff director; William G.P. Monahan, counsel; Michael J. Noblet, professional staff member; Roy F. Phillips, professional staff member; Russell L. Shaffer, counsel; and William K. Sutey, professional staff member.

Minority staff members present: John A. Bonsell, minority staff director; Daniel C. Adams, minority associate counsel; Adam J. Barker, professional staff member; Steven M. Barney, minority counsel; William S. Castle, minority general counsel; Samantha L. Clark, minority associate counsel; Allen M. Edwards, professional staff member; Thomas W. Goffus, professional staff member; Ambrose R. Hock, professional staff member; Anthony J. Lazarski, professional staff member; Daniel A. Lerner, professional staff member; Lucian L. Niemeyer, professional staff member; and Robert M. Soofer, professional staff member.

Staff assistants present: Lauren M. Gillis and Daniel J. Harder.

Committee members' assistants present: Carolyn Chuhta, assistant to Senator Reed; Jeff Fatora, assistant to Senator Nelson; Jason Rauch, assistant to Senator McCaskill; Brian Nagle, assistant to Senator Hagan; Mara Boggs, assistant to Senator Manchin; Patrick Day, assistant to Senator Shaheen; Moran Banai and Brooke Jamison, assistants to Senator Gillibrand; Ethan Saxon, assistant to Senator Blumenthal; Marta McLellan Ross, assistant to Senator Donnelly; Nick Ikeda, assistant to Senator Hirono; Karen Courington, assistant to Senator Kaine; Jim Catella and Steve Smith, assistants to Senator King; Christian Brose, assistant to Senator McCain; Lenwood Landrum, assistant to Senator Sessions; Todd Harmer, assistant to Senator Chambliss; Joseph Lai, assistant to Senator Wicker; Brad Bowman, assistant to Senator Ayotte; and Craig Abele, assistant to Senator Graham.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody.

The committee meets this morning to consider the nominations of General Martin Dempsey and Admiral James Winnefeld, both of whom have been nominated to continue in their current positions: General Dempsey as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Admiral Winnefeld as Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Thank you both for your service and for your willingness to continue to serve in these positions of huge responsibility.

I would also like to welcome and to thank your family members, some of whom are with us here this morning. Our military families, as you well know, are a vital part of the overall success and well-being of our Armed Forces, and we appreciate greatly their unwavering support and their many sacrifices, usually during the course of long military careers. During your opening remarks, please feel free to reintroduce your family members to our committee.

The foremost duty of the leadership positions to which General Dempsey and Admiral Winnefeld have been renominated is to ensure that our service men and women have what they need to win wars, to succeed in their missions, and to secure peace. Our nominees have carried out their duties with energy and with commitment. It is a testament to the quality of their service that the President has nominated them to continue in their positions.

I have had frequent occasions to seek the views of General Dempsey and Admiral Winnefeld over the years in both public and private settings. Even on those few occasions when I have disagreed with their assessments and recommendations, I have found their positions to be thoughtful and well reasoned.

If confirmed, our nominees will face a series of continuing challenges.

In Syria, Assad is using airstrikes, missiles, helicopters, tanks, and artillery to attack the Syrian people. He is targeting civilians in residential neighborhoods, in marketplaces, in schools, and in places of worship. He has used chemical weapons against the insurgents. He is increasingly relying on foreign fighters from Iran and Hezbollah to sustain his grip on power. To date, his actions have killed more than 100,000 Syrians, led more than a million to flee the country, forced more than 4 million more to become internally displaced, leveled entire villages and neighborhoods, and motivated the Syrian people to rise up against him.

I look forward to hearing the nominees' views on the steps that might be taken to increase the military pressure on Assad in support of the administration's goal of convincing the Assad regime and its supporters, including Russia, that the current military momentum towards the regime cannot last in the face of a major insurgency that has the support of both the Syrian people and an international coalition and that a political settlement that transitions Syria to a post-Assad regime that is inclusive of and protective of all elements of the Syrian society is the only solution.

In Afghanistan, while the campaign is on track to transition responsibility for the country's security from coalition forces to the Afghan security forces, and U.S. and coalition forces continue to draw down over the next year and a half, significant challenges remain to secure the hard-fought gains. Among those challenges is putting the U.S.-Afghanistan strategic partnership on a sound footing for the long term, including through the conclusion of a bilateral status of forces agreement to ensure that our troops have the legal protections necessary for any post-2014 U.S. military presence in Afghanistan. Recent statements by President Karzai have complicated negotiation of such an agreement, and I will be interested in what our witnesses have to say about the prospects for a successful negotiation, as well as what the status is of the efforts in Afghanistan militarily.

In mid-March of this year, Secretary Hagel responded to North Korea's provocative behavior by announcing a series of steps to improve our Homeland missile defense capability, including the planned deployment of 14 additional ground-based interceptors in Alaska by 2014.

On July 5, our ground-based midcourse defense system had a flight test failure. This test failure, along with an earlier failure, reinforces the need to pursue a "fly-before-you-buy" approach which demonstrates through realistic flight tests that the system will work as intended before deploying any additional inceptors. I would welcome our witnesses' comments on that issue as well.

The National Defense Authorization Act that we will bring to the Senate floor includes provisions that give the Secretary of Defense greater flexibility to transfer detainees from Guantanamo Bay, Cuba (GTMO). I will be interested in our witnesses' views on these proposed changes in our defense authorization bill.

Lastly, but far from leastly, we must confront the growing challenge of sequestration. All of the things that our military needs to do, responding to regional crises, maintaining readiness, training and equipping our forces, taking care of our servicemembers and their families, depend upon appropriate levels of funding. The damaging effect that sequestration is already having and will continue to have unless addressed, remedied, and reversed—that damaging effect on the readiness of our military must be addressed and addressed in a way that protects the vitality of our forces.

It is against the backdrop of these and many more challenges, both foreign and domestic, that we consider these two very important nominations.

Again, we welcome both of you today. We look forward to your testimony.

I now call on Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I mentioned to you, we have another hearing simultaneously with this one, two floors up, so I will be going back and forth.

Over the last 4 years, our military has suffered a steep and damaging drop in capabilities and readiness. This administration has cut nearly $600 billion already from the defense budget, reduced end strength by more than 100,000 personnel, reduced the size of the naval fleet, and cut hundreds of Air Force combat aircraft. Training and reset accounts have been gutted and modernization programs are being starved of resources. On the horizon is the addition of $500 billion in cuts if we are unable to find a solution for the sequestration, which you know, is kind of ridiculous. When you tell normal people that we have 18 percent of our budget is the military budget, and yet we are taking 50 percent of the cuts, it is totally unreasonable. It lets you know the priorities of this administration.

The longer we allow our force to deteriorate, the harder and more expensive it will be to repair and rebuild.

Earlier this year, Chairman Levin and I sent a letter to Secretary Hagel requesting a detailed plan on how the Department would allocate the additional $52 billion in sequester cuts slated for fiscal year 2014. The response we received was woefully light on details but made clear that further cuts in fiscal year 2014 will significantly amplify the pain our military is already enduring.

Admiral Winnefeld, you were asked earlier this year about the impact of the budget cuts on the military, and you responded. I have to say it was a very courageous response. I am quoting now. "There could be, for the first time in my career, instances where we may be asked to respond to a crisis and we will have to say that we cannot." Admiral, I feel that we are well on our way to this unthinkable reality.

Recently, the Department of Defense (DOD) has undertaken actions internally to address some critical readiness issues, including the resumption of flight operations for the Air Force after many squadrons—I believe 16—had been grounded for over 3 months. While this development is welcome news, I remain concerned over the vital training and maintenance activities, the services that remain curtailed, and nearly 700,000 DOD civilians are still being furloughed. What I find most concerning, however, is that much of this pain has been unnecessary and could have been avoided all along.

Earlier this year, I introduced a bill that would have provided for the Department with flexibility to allocate the sequester cuts in a way that minimizes risk. At that time, all the Chiefs agreed it would be still devastating, but not as devastating. When we come back and put our squadrons in flying status—again, I am going to conduct my own test on this, on how much more it costs now to retrain, get people back up in proficiency than it would have, had we just stayed with it.

Our actions at home do not occur in a vacuum. Around the world, we are seeing the effects of declining military capability and the absence of American leadership. From the Middle East to the Asia-Pacific, our adversaries are emboldened and there are growing doubts about the United States among our allies.

I raise these issues today because I am deeply concerned by the current state of our military. As our military is experiencing an unprecedented deterioration of readiness and capabilities, I ask our witnesses what advice they are giving the President on these matters.

General Dempsey, at what point will you advise the President that the defense cuts will result in the dire scenario you laid out before our committee in February? You said, "If ever the force is so degraded and so unready, and then we're asked to use it, it would be immoral."

General Dempsey, you also warned in testimony to this committee that further defense cuts will, "severely limit our ability to implement our defense strategy. It will put the Nation at greater risk of coercion, and it will break faith with the men and women in uniform." The Service Chiefs are already talking about combat forces and capabilities that are starting to hollow out. We had a discussion about this. Are we hollowing out, or are we already a hollow force?

I am afraid to remind you of the comments from the Director of National Intelligence, James Clapper, who stated earlier this year, "In almost 50 years in intelligence, I don't remember that we've had a more diverse array of threats and crisis situations around the world to deal with than we have today."

That is our problem, Mr. Chairman, and that is why we are having this hearing today.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

Let me call upon you, Chairman Dempsey. Welcome.

STATEMENT OF GEN MARTIN E. DEMPSEY, USA, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF GENERAL AND REAPPOINTMENT AS CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

General DEMPSEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Inhofe, distinguished Senators. I am honored to appear before you today on this 18th day of July as the 18th Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I am also thankful, thankful for the confidence placed in me 2 years ago, for the continued confidence of our commander in chief and the Secretary of Defense, and for the privilege of serving alongside Admiral Sandy Winnefeld and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Of course, I am also very thankful for the unwavering love and support and tireless service in her own way of my wife, Deanie, who is seated behind me, not to mention our three children and our seven grandchildren. Yes, that is plus four since my confirmation hearing 2 years ago, with one more due any day now to make it a total of eight.

Chairman LEVIN. I am sure if it were allowed you would, for that reason alone, love to be appointed a third time. [Laughter.]

General DEMPSEY. I do not know. Actually quite the opposite. I would like to spend some time with them when the opportunity arises.

I also want to mention I notice that my nephew Michael Dempsey, who is a student at Wake Forest University and home for the summer, has joined us today. We are awful proud of him as well.

But more than anything else, I am thankful for the opportunity to defend our Nation alongside the men and women who wear its cloth. When I witness their courage and their skill, I am very much reminded of the inscription that is on the Private Soldier Monument called "Old Simon" at Antietam Battlefield that goes like this, "Not for themselves but for their country."

It is on their behalf and in that spirit that I am here today. My only purpose is to be worthy of their service every day and in every decision, to strengthen the relationship of trust that the American Armed Forces has with the American people, to meet our sacred obligation to keep our Nation immune from coercion.

We cannot take this relationship for granted. Historic transitions are testing our ability to meet our obligations. We are in the midst of a difficult fiscal correction to restore the economic foundation of power. We are also transitioning from war to an even more uncertain and dangerous security landscape.

Even as the dollars are in decline, risk is on the rise. If we do not manage these transitions well, our military power will become less credible. We will foreclose options and we will leave gaps in our security.

It does not have to be that way. We can and we must lead through these transitions. We have it within us to stay strong as a global leader and as a reliable ally. We can make our military more affordable without making our Nation less secure. To do this, we need to get at least four things right.

First, we need to get our strategy right. This means aligning our aims with our abilities. Strategy is nothing if it is not about setting priorities. Even as we rebalance to the Asia-Pacific region, we still have to defend the Homeland from cyber, terrorist, and missile attack, achieve our objectives in Afghanistan, deter provocation on the Korean Peninsula, assure and assist allies across the globe, set a more responsive posture for a new normal of combustible violence. As we respond to new contingencies, we must come to terms with the risks and costs to these existing obligations. We may have to do less, but we should never do it less well.

Second, we need to get our force right. This means keeping our military ready and balanced. So far, we are getting it wrong. We have already lost readiness that will take more time and additional cost to restore. We are already out of balance due to the magnitude and the mechanism—not to mention the steep descent—of budget cuts. But it is not too late to recover. Remove the budget uncertainty. Slow down the drawdown. Help us make seemingly intractable institutional reforms. If we do this, we can build a joint force to meet the Nation's needs for a price that the Nation is able and willing to pay.

Third, we need to get our people right. This means strengthening our profession while keeping faith with the military family. Ours is an uncommon profession, one that must value character as much as competence, that rests on a foundation of learning and leadership, that advances equal and ethical treatment for all its members, and that allows no quarter for sexual violence in all of its destructive forms. We also keep faith by making sure that our sons and daughters always go to war with the best training, the best leadership, and the best equipment. If we get this wrong, we will not get anything else right.

Finally, we need to get our relationships right. This means staying connected to our allies and, most importantly, to our fellow Americans. Now is the defining moment in our Nation's relationship with its September 11 veterans. This generation is a national asset. They are ready to contribute in their communities. They need opportunities, handshakes, not handouts.

In the end, all relationships rest on trust. Two years ago, I offered this image at my confirmation hearing to illustrate the vein of trust that must run from our men and women in uniform on the front lines back here and right back to our communities, our families, and the American people.

[The information referred to follows:]

See attached photo.

General DEMPSEY. Today, it is still all about trust. Reconfirmation is at its base a reaffirmation of trust. I am humbled by the opportunity, and I will continue to work to earn it every day. I know you expect it and I know our men and women in uniform deserve it.

I would like to say one other thing before passing it back to you, Mr. Chairman. I am very careful not to presume confirmation, and in that spirit and not knowing when my last opportunity will be to appear before this body, I would like to thank you for your leadership of this committee and your support of America's men and women in uniform, as well as the two ranking members, Senator Inhofe, Senator McCain, with whom I have had the privilege of working for the last 2 years.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

General DEMPSEY. Thank you and I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Admiral?

STATEMENT OF ADM JAMES A. WINNEFELD, JR., USN, FOR REAPPOINTMENT TO THE GRADE OF ADMIRAL AND REAPPOINTMENT AS VICE CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF

Admiral WINNEFELD. Good morning, Chairman Levin and Ranking Member Inhofe and other distinguished members of the Committee on Armed Services.

I am also honored to appear before the committee this morning and to do so along with my friend and colleague and boss, General Marty Dempsey.

The military is a family business, and I am pleased to have with me today my wonderful wife, Mary, who has been such a supportive partner. She is behind me in the joint purple outfit. She has also been a tireless advocate for military families and wounded warriors and their caregivers, which has been a great comfort to know that I have such a willing partner to do this sort of work.

My sons, James and Jonathan, would have been with us also today, but they are both at athletic tournaments, one at a State baseball championship tournament and the other at a golf tournament. But they remind me every day of the importance of honorable service.

It has been my privilege to serve the Nation as Vice Chairman for the past 2 years, and I am honored to have been asked by the President to serve another term.

If reconfirmed, I will continue to provide independent and objective advice to the Chairman, the Secretary of Defense, and the President on the shape, readiness, health, and use of the military instrument of power and to keep this committee informed and to give my best effort within the three portfolios of policy, investment, and people.

In a world growing more rather than less dangerous, at the same time we face considerable financial pressure, there are plenty of challenges in the three portfolios I just listed.

In the area of policy, we have been grappling with a host of threats to our national security interests around the world, in Afghanistan, in Iran, on the Korean Peninsula, with the continuing evolution of al Qaeda and its affiliates, in the aftermath of the Arab Awakening in Libya, Syria, Egypt, and other nations, and within the increasingly complex cyber domain.

In the investment portfolio, I was first confirmed by the Senate for this job on the same day the Budget Control Act (BCA) was enacted, and we continue to cope with the financial challenges in the wake of that act that are quietly eroding our readiness to defend our Nation and have so impacted our ability to plan for tomorrow.

To the people portfolio, we are doing our best to manage the enormous uncertainty to which our military and civilian members and their families are being exposed during this budget crisis.

We are also expending considerable effort to ensure we are properly caring for our wounded, ill, and injured members and their families, as well as finding every lever we can to eliminate the pernicious insider threat of sexual assault.

These are only a few of the challenges we face, and much remains to be done in all three of these portfolios.

If confirmed, I look forward to continuing to serve our great Nation in uniform and pledge to work with this committee on the difficult choices required to achieve a capable and strategically shaped force that can keep America safe and our interests secure.

Allow me to close by saying how deeply grateful I am for the energy all the members of this committee and your able staff bring to these issues and for your longstanding support for our men and women in uniform and our civilians.

I look forward to taking your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Admiral.

Let me now ask you both the standard questions which we ask of our military nominees.

Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir, I have.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I do.

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

General DEMPSEY. No.

Admiral WINNEFELD. No, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you ensure that your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record and hearings?

General DEMPSEY. I will.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

General DEMPSEY. They will.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Okay. We are going to have a 7-minute first round of questions.

General, do you support finding additional ways to increase the military pressure on Assad?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, first, let me say that I am well aware of the human suffering and the tragedy unfolding in Syria and the effect that it is having not just inside Syria but on the region.

To your question about courses of action going forward, I support very strongly a whole-of-government approach that applies all the instruments of national power.

As for the military instrument of power, we have prepared options and articulated risks and opportunity costs to put additional pressure on the Assad regime.

Chairman LEVIN. Does the administration support additional training and equipping of the opposition?

General DEMPSEY. The administration has a governmental approach to the increased capability of the opposition.

Chairman LEVIN. Does that include training and equipping militarily?

General DEMPSEY. Not through the Department of Defense.

Chairman LEVIN. Through other means, whether it might be other countries?

General DEMPSEY. Yes.

Chairman LEVIN. On Afghanistan, are the security forces of Afghanistan on track to be fully in charge of securing Afghanistan by December 2014 when the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) combat mission ends?

General DEMPSEY. They are. General Dunford assesses that he will achieve his campaign objectives in developing the Afghan security forces. Now, he does also acknowledge there are some potential gaps that he will have better clarity on after this fighting season.

Chairman LEVIN. But he is basically on track?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Now, I am not going to ask you what advice you have given to the President on the residual force which might remain, assuming there is an agreement with the Afghans, after December 2014. I am not going to ask you what the advice is because that is advice you give confidentially to the President, and he has a right to your confidential advice.

My question, however, is the following. Have you given the President your advice relative to the size of the residual force?

General DEMPSEY. I have, sir. We have provided several options. As the Joint Chiefs, we have made a recommendation on the size and we have also expressed our view on when that announcement would best meet the campaign objectives.

Chairman LEVIN. Now, would you agree that legal protections for our troops, which would be provided for if we can reach a bilateral security agreement with Afghanistan, are essential to any long-term U.S. troop presence in Afghanistan?

General DEMPSEY. I do believe that.

Chairman LEVIN. So any presence after December 2014 is dependent upon working out a bilateral agreement with the Afghans?

General DEMPSEY. That is right, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. I hope President Karzai is listening to that answer.

General DEMPSEY. I will travel over there on Friday night, sir, and have a planned office call with him.

Chairman LEVIN. I hope that you would make that clear, and also I believe that our committee—and I will not speak for others directly. If anyone does not feel this way, they will speak for themselves. But I think it is essential that he understand that there has to be a bilateral agreement that protects our troops for there to be a residual presence. I happen to favor a residual presence, by the way.

General DEMPSEY. As do we.

Chairman LEVIN. I happen to favor giving confidence to the Afghans that there is going to be continuing relations. But I do not want to just be silent in the face of what I consider to be President Karzai's unwise—a number of his comments which are very unwise in terms of whether or not he wants a residual presence or not. He sometimes acts like he does not want a residual presence even though it is very clear to me that the Afghan people do and so does he, but he wants it on his terms, and it cannot just be on his terms. It has to be on a mutually agreed basis. Would you agree with that?

General DEMPSEY. I do, sir. I also, though, would point out that our relationship and our interests in Afghanistan run deeper than just President Karzai.

Chairman LEVIN. Of course. There is going to be an election next year, and I think you can also pass along to President Karzai that his assurances that he is not going to be a candidate in that election but that there will be an election are something that the committee members, I think probably most of whom have met with him, take seriously. Those statements of his matter to us.

Now, on the Guantanamo issue, we have in our National Defense Authorization Bill language which would give greater flexibility to the Department of Defense to transfer Guantanamo detainees to the United States for detention and trial, if it is determined to be in the U.S. national interest and if public safety concerns are addressed, to streamline the authority of the Secretary of Defense to transfer Guantanamo detainees to foreign countries. Do you support those provisions?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, what I support as the senior military leader of the Armed Forces of the United States is that we must have an option to detain prisoners. We cannot expect young men and women on the battlefield to have a single option which would be simply to kill. We must have a capture and detain option. I support anything that will assure me that those young men and women will have that option.

Chairman LEVIN. Assuming that they have that assurance that there are a place or places——

General DEMPSEY. That is correct, sir.

Chairman LEVIN.—then given that qualification, one which I share, by the way, do you then support the language of the bill?

General DEMPSEY. I would have to see the bill. But if you are asking me has Guantanamo, the facility, tarnished the image of the United States globally, I think it has. Therefore, I would welcome any other solution.

Chairman LEVIN. On missile defense, we have had an assessment from Lieutenant General Richard Formica, a letter providing the assessment that investing in additional sensor and discrimination capability for our Homeland missile defense would be a more cost effective and less expensive near-term Homeland missile defense option than deploying an east coast missile defense site, particularly since there is no current military requirement to deploy an east coast site.

Do you agree with those assessments of Vice Admiral James Syring and General Formica? Do you agree that additional analysis is needed to determine whether it would be necessary to deploy an additional missile defense site in the United States in the future?

General DEMPSEY. I would like to ask the Vice Chairman who works that to comment—but I will say I absolutely agree we should do the analysis before we make a decision on how best to meet that capability requirement.

Chairman LEVIN. I am glad you gave me an opportunity to ask Admiral Winnefeld.

General DEMPSEY. I have been looking for an opportunity, Senator. [Laughter.]

Chairman LEVIN. Well, so have I. Thank you for giving me that opportunity. Admiral?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Chairman Levin, the way I have put it is I would spend my next dollar on missile defense on the sensor discrimination that you described. There is an oft-quoted saying in the U.S. military, "quantity has a quality all its own". In this case, quality has a quantity all its own. If you can get better discrimination, you can have a better firing doctrine that would help you there.

I also think it is wise that we are doing the environmental impact statements (EIS) for a potential east coast site. As we watch the threat develop—and we are going to have to be very cognizant of that because it could develop quickly—it may become necessary to actually put into place a second site. We will play that as we have to.

Chairman LEVIN. But when you say we should do the EIS, you mean before making a commitment to a site, that you complete those assessments?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir. I think we are planning on doing the EISs in the relatively near term, and I think they will be done naturally probably before there is a need to actually make a decision to go with an east coast site. But I also want to state we need to be cautious and very cognizant of where the trajectory is of the threat.

Chairman LEVIN. When you say they will be done naturally, you think they should be done?

Admiral WINNEFELD. They will be done. They should be done. I agree with doing them as a hedge, as part of our hedge strategy that we have always considered having an east coast site, just as a part of the hedge strategy with putting more interceptors——

Chairman LEVIN. I am just trying to get a clear answer. Do you believe they should be done before the decision is made as to whether any site is selected?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir, I think so.

Chairman LEVIN. I have gone over my time. I apologize to my colleagues and call upon Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In my opening statement, I quoted each one of you, and they are very strong quotes, particularly the one stating "If ever the force is so degraded and so unready, and then we're asked to use it, it would be immoral." Then General Dempsey, you add, "There could be for the first time in my career instances where we may be asked to respond to a crisis and we will have to say that we cannot." Then, of course, we saw that James Clapper said that there has never been a time in our history—and he has been around for 40 years—when the threats are so great and diverse as they are today.

Do you agree with that?

General DEMPSEY. I do, Senator. There are probably fewer existential threats to the Nation, but there are far more ways that middle-weight states, non-state actors, and violent extremist groups can reach out and touch us.

Senator INHOFE. Do you agree with that, Admiral?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir. I would say that there are two definitions of a hollow force. One is the force is larger than the readiness money you have to keep it ready, and that is the more complex definition. The simple one is something that looks really good on the outside but it is rotten in the middle.

Senator INHOFE. Yes. I was not talking about the hollow force. I was talking about the threats that are out there.

I look back wistfully at the days of the Cold War. Things were predictable back then. Now, you have entities out there, like Iran, that our intelligence says are going to have a weapon and the capability of a delivery system. That is what he is talking about. I think it is a scary thing.

You both believe that. Have you shared this with the President?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, we have briefed the President.

Senator INHOFE. So he knows this?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. Yet, he continues with his approach.

Let me ask you a question about GTMO. You said you would welcome any other solution. I have often looked at GTMO as one of the few good deals we have in this country that we have had since 1904. Rent is $4,000 a year I think it is, Mr. Chairman, and they do not collect it half the time. Yet, when you say we welcome any other solution, what other solution? Is there a solution out there that would not entail bringing these people into our continental United States? Either one of you.

General DEMPSEY. I have seen the analysis done of any number of solutions, but there has not been any consensus on which one to pursue. I simply want to align myself with those who say we have to have a detention solution.

Senator INHOFE. No, I agree. We have to have a detention. We have something there that is ready-made. I understand that a lot of the people in the Middle East do not like it. It has given us a bad reputation in some areas. But, I believe that we need to think of America first.

I can recall 4 years ago when the President came out talking about these alternatives that they had. They had sites in the United States. One was in Oklahoma. I went down there and I talked to a young lady. She was in charge of our prison down there. She had had several tours in GTMO, and she said, "What is the matter with them up there? Don't they know that we have this?" It is ready-made.

I have to say this because this is a great frustration to me. Yes, we have language that is pretty good language in the bill, but nonetheless—I will just ask one last question on that.

Can you think of anything that would not entail incarceration or movement into the United States? Right now off the top of your head.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I do not have an easy answer to that one, Senator.

One thing I would mention is just a little more flexibility I think would be useful to us. I will give you an example. We have a moral obligation to take good medical care of these detainees. Because we cannot move them outside of GTMO, we have to build very state-of-the-art medical facilities.

Senator INHOFE. I have seen it.

Admiral WINNEFELD. It would be great to be able to move them briefly back and forth to the United States if they need medical treatment and send them back. That is the kind of flexibility I mean.

Senator INHOFE. Okay, that is fine.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I know that is different from what you are talking about.

Senator INHOFE. We have that. There is not a person up here who has not been down there more than once. One of the big problems they have with the detainees down there is they are overweight, and they are eating better than they have ever eaten in their lives. They have better medical attention. They have tests run that they never even heard of before. I think we are meeting that.

On April 9, when we stop the flying—I have talked to each one of you about this, but I think we need to get something on the record. I have an aviation background, and I do not think you have to have that to know that you have to keep your proficiency up. That was 3 months ago, April 9. Now, I applaud the decision to now get back in and start retraining.

I mentioned in my opening statement that I was going to conduct a study as to how much more it costs us to go through the retraining that we are going to have to go through right now than if we had never made the decision back on April 9.

Have you already done that, or do you have any information in terms of how much more it is going to cost now than if we had not done it to start with?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I think it is a good question, and I think we can easily get that for you for the record in terms of cost.

What I can tell you is that if you take one of these squadrons that has not been flying at all, it is going to take anywhere from 1 to 3 months for them to bring their proficiency back up just in basic airmanship skills, taking off and landing and that sort of thing, and then probably another 3 months beyond that to get their combat skills back. I think of it more in terms of time, but there is a cost dimension and we can get you that.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, but time, would you not agree, equals risk at the time we need these? We had some of them who came right out of school right around April 9. They are going to go back and almost start from the beginning now. If we do not have the capability of taking care of the needs as they come up, I believe that that translates into a risk that I am not willing to take if I can do anything about it.

[The information referred to follows:]

As of today, there are 18 squadrons in the Air Force still flying at reduced levels of readiness. An additional 7,000 flying hours at a cost of $116 million above the President's 2014 budget request and 3–6 months would be necessary to bring these remaining 18 squadrons from current (lower than Basic Mission Capable) flying rates back to pre-sequester mission status (Combat Mission Ready flying rates).

Prior to sequestration, a substantial number of Air Force squadrons were already operating at lower than optimal goals due to previous Budget Control Act (BCA) reductions and the effects of long-term high operations tempo. On 9 April, a total of 31 squadrons were stood down, including 13 combat-coded (fighter, bomber, and Airborne Warning and Control System) units and 18 institutional units (Weapons School, Aggressors, Thunderbirds, etc.). Through efficiencies and the $208 million from the Department of Defense reprogramming request, the Air Force was able to shift funds and increase the flying rates of the 13 combat coded units back to Combat Mission Ready (CMR) rates for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. It will take 3–6 months at this CMR rate before these squadrons return to pre-sequestration mission ready rates. The efficiencies and reprogramming also allowed the remaining 18 institutional units to resume flying, albeit lower than Basic Mission Capable rates.

The Air Force will continue to have readiness challenges due to the BCA and sequestration, beyond the units that were stood down. To bring all Air Force flying squadrons back to full mission readiness goals needed to meet Defense Strategic Guidance requirements, it would take approximately 2 years, an additional $3.2 billion per year in fiscal year 2014 and fiscal year 2015, and a reduction in current deployment tempo (e.g. deploy-to-dwell at 1:3 or better).

General DEMPSEY. Senator, could I add?

Senator INHOFE. Sure.

General DEMPSEY. What we are seeing is that we are going to end up with two problems over time if sequestration remains in effect. The immediate problem for the next several years will be readiness because we will not be able to find the money we need to achieve the level of sequestration cuts without dramatically impacting our readiness. Then as the force becomes smaller, you can restore readiness because you are dealing with a smaller force, but I think too small. So it goes too far too fast.

Senator INHOFE. Yes, I understand that. The proficiency of a smaller number of units can be greater but you are still dealing with a smaller number of units. When we have the diverse threats that we have right now, to me that is not a very good idea, not that you can do anything about it, but right now that is a problem.

The last question, because my time is up, would be, Admiral, I appreciate the fact that you used the word "immoral". Given the current path of readiness in the Armed Forces, in your professional judgment when will the commander in chief be at a point of making immoral decisions?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I do not think I was the one who used the term "immoral".

But I think we are keeping the White House closely informed as to the outcome of the Strategic Choices and Management Review. That includes both capability, capacity, and readiness of the force. They are aware of those results and I am sure that they are going to factor that into their decisionmaking on the rest of the budget issues that are in play. Hopefully, we will be able to find a good resolution that will allow us to go forward with being able to plan for the future.

Senator INHOFE. I appreciate both of you. We have to let the people know that we have a real serious problem here, and I think this hearing is our opportunity to do that.

I apologize in attributing a quote to you. I guess it was General Dempsey who made that quote.

General DEMPSEY. Yes, it was, sir.

Let me assure you that if the Nation is threatened, we will go. But that is the point. We will go and we may not be ready to go. So it would depend on the nature of the conflict in which we were asked to participate. If it is an existential threat to the Nation and we send them, there is no immorality in that. But if this were some other contingency and we were asking young men and women to go not ready and we had a choice to do that——

Senator INHOFE. That is where the immorality issue comes in.

General DEMPSEY. That is right.

Senator INHOFE. I appreciate that very much and I agree with you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Blumenthal?

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join in thanking both of you for your service over many, many years.

General Dempsey, you and I have discussed briefly the purchase of helicopters for the Afghan armed services, the purchase of Russian MI–17s from the export agency controlled by Russia that is now selling arms to Syria and a country that is still harboring, providing refuge to Edward Snowden. We discussed the reasons for that sale. Very graciously, you suggested you would look into the possibility of either ending that sale, which will result in helicopters right now, according to the Inspector General for Afghanistan, sitting on the runways of Afghanistan because they lack pilots to fly them and they lack people trained to maintain or repair them.

I wonder whether there is something we can do either to stop those sales, purchases subsidized by American taxpayers, provided by American taxpayers to a supposed ally that still does not have a status of forces agreement with us that will enable us to continue providing aid to them. I think in connection with that question, what additional kinds of resources we should consider stopping if there is no status of forces agreement?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, on the MI–17s, I support continuing on the path we are on to get the Afghans as capable as possible by the end of 2014, and that will require us to stay committed to that fleet of MI–17s. There is no way we could transition at this point and put them in anything other than that airframe.

What I suggested to you is that if we can achieve a lasting, enduring relationship with them and if they live up to their end of the deal and we live to our end of the deal, we will be investing in them through foreign military sales for some time. There is a likely point where we could transition them to U.S.-built aircraft. But in the interim period, we cannot. I should not say we cannot. It would be my recommendation that we stay the course with the existing program.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Is that interest sufficient, do you think, to justify the national security waiver under the legislation that is currently included in the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA)?

General DEMPSEY. I do, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. What would have to change for those helicopters to be purchased from an American manufacturer such as Sikorsky or any of the others that are more than capable of providing better aircraft to the Afghans?

General DEMPSEY. We actually have experience in making that transition in Iraq where we have initially outfitted them with Soviet aircraft and are now making the transition to an American airframe. It starts with training and long lead time procurements. But that effort is unlikely to begin until we establish a bilateral security agreement.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Admiral Winnefeld, I was at a briefing recently that you gave, an excellent briefing, on threats to our Navy. I wonder if you could comment, to the extent you are able, on the importance of the Ohio-class replacement in terms of nuclear deterrence, the importance of continuing with that program, and any possible jeopardy that might be impacted as a result of sequester.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Senator, we of course remain committed to the triad. We believe that is the right approach for nuclear deterrence for this country, and of course, the fleet ballistic missile submarines are an absolutely essential element of that triad. It is the most survivable element that we have. It is a very reliable platform, a very reliable missile that goes with it. We are very committed to the next class coming down the line.

I think we have delayed it about as far as we can. We need to now—and we are getting into the requirements and design of this missile-carrying submarine. Again, we are just committed to the program. It is terribly important that we get this right.

We are going to try to control the costs on it. We are going to try to make this, like all the programs we are working right now, from the beginning a successful acquisition program. I know that the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (AT&L) and Sean Stackley with the Navy and the Chief of Naval Operations himself are all committed to making this a successful program.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. You would agree, would you not, that this program really has to be spared any impact as a result of sequester? It is so vital to our national security.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would agree with that, yes, sir.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. General Dempsey, I wonder if I could move to a personnel issue that I know, because of your personal commitment to the well-being of our troops, is of great interest to you, the electronic medical record system which still is incompatible—the Department of Defense medical records system with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) record system—despite questions that I and others have asked repeatedly under this Secretary of Defense and the previous one. I remain concerned, to put it mildly, with the fact that interoperability still is a goal not a reality. I wonder if you could comment on what can be done to increase the pace of making those two systems compatible. I had thought originally that they would be one system. A billion dollars has been spent on making them one system.

General DEMPSEY. Thank you, sir.

I share your concern. I can also assure you that Secretary Hagel who has a background in the Veterans Administration shares it. He has taken a decision to move the responsibility, the program management, into AT&L where it will, I think you will see, be much better managed.

We have done other things. For example, agreed to certify as complete medical records that pass from Active Duty into the Veterans Administration, which then relieves the burden of them having to do continual research to figure out if the record is complete.

That is the path we are on, but your oversight and interest in it will be an important part of achieving it.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

My time has expired. But I, again, want to thank you both for your extraordinary service and just to reiterate, General Dempsey, I remain unhappy, very strongly unhappy, with our current position and posture vis-a-vis those MI–17s and I am not going to let the issue go. With all due respect, I understand your position. Thank you very much for being so forthright in your answers.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Blumenthal.

Senator McCain?

Senator MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I must tell both the witnesses at the onset I am very concerned about the role you have played over the last 2 years, your view of your role as the chief advisors to the President on national security, and the state of the world over the last 2 years since you have come to hold the office you hold.

General Dempsey and Admiral Winnefeld, do you believe the continued costs and risks of our inaction in Syria are now worse for our national security interests than the costs and risks associated with limited military action?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, as we have discussed——

Senator MCCAIN. I would like to know an answer rather than a filibuster. I have 6 minutes and 10 seconds.

General DEMPSEY. I assure you, Senator, I will not filibuster.

This is a regional issue. I would say that the issue in Syria is we are at greater risk because of the emergence of violent extremist organizations, as is Iraq.

Senator MCCAIN. You are not answering the question, General. Do you believe the continued costs and risks of our inaction in Syria are now worse for our national security interests than the costs and risks associated with limited military action?

General DEMPSEY. With all due respect, Senator, you are asking me to agree that we have been inactive, and we have not been inactive.

Senator MCCAIN. We have not been inactive?

General DEMPSEY. That is correct.

Senator MCCAIN. This, again, gives validity to my concern because, obviously, we may not have been inactive, but any observer knows that Bashar al-Assad is prevailing on the battlefield. Over 100,000 people have been killed. Hezbollah is there. The situation is much more dire than it was 2 years ago when you and Admiral Winnefeld came to office.

So your answer is that we have not been inactive?

General DEMPSEY. That is correct. We have not used direct military strengths, but we have not been inactive.

Senator MCCAIN. I will ask you for the third time. Do you believe that we should take military action? Which has greater risk? Our continued, limited action or significant action such as the establishment of a no-fly zone and arming the rebels with the weapons they need, which they have not been getting, General, I know. I know perhaps better than you because I have been there. Which do you think is a greater cost? The action that we are taking now, which has had no effect on the battlefield equation, or doing nothing?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, I am in favor of building a moderate opposition and supporting it. The question of whether to support it with direct kinetic strikes is a decision for our elected officials, not for the senior military leader of the Nation.

Senator MCCAIN. This goes back to my concern about your role as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs.

General DEMPSEY. I understand.

Senator MCCAIN. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs is supposed to provide the best advice he can as far as our overall national security is concerned. That is why you are the sole military advisor.

You testified this February you had advised the President to arm vetted units of the Syrian opposition. In April, you testified you no longer supported the position. Now we read in published reports that the administration has decided to arm the Syrian opposition units.

How do we account for those pirouettes?

General DEMPSEY. I would not accept the term "pirouette," sir. I would accept the term that we have adapted our approach based on what we know of the opposition. If you recall, in the beginning of the year there was a period where it was pretty evident that the extremist groups were prevailing inside the opposition. So I have not been wavering——

Senator MCCAIN. Is your position that the extremist groups are prevailing inside the opposition?

General DEMPSEY. You asked me about February. In February, I had that concern.

Senator MCCAIN. So that is your answer to why in February you advised the President to arm them? In April, you said that we should not, and then now, obviously, we are arming the rebels. Do you support that policy?

General DEMPSEY. I support the building of a moderate opposition and including building its military capability.

Senator MCCAIN. Here is an example of my concern. You told CNN on July 8, "the war in Syria is not a simple matter of stopping the fight by the introduction of any particular U.S. capability. It seems to me that we need to understand what the peace will look like before we start the war." The war has been going on, General Dempsey, to over 100,000 people killed. We did not start the war and we would not be starting a war. We would be trying to stop a massacre that is going on. We would try to stop the Hezbollah with thousands of troops. We would try to stop the fact that the Russians continue to supply heavily Bashar al Assad's forces and what would be a great triumph for Iran in the entire region. But you say it seems to me we need to understand what the peace will look like before we start the war. Do you think we ought to see how we could stop the war by intervening and stopping the massacre?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, would you agree that we have recent experience where until we understood how the country would continue to govern and that institutions of governance would not fail, that actually situations can be made worse by the introduction of military force?

Senator MCCAIN. Actually, General Dempsey, you and I went through this in 2006 in Iraq when I said that it was not succeeding and that we had to have a surge and that only a surge could succeed in reversing the tide of battle. You disagreed with me way back then. I think history shows that those of us who supported the surge were right and people like you who did not think we needed a surge were wrong.

I guess my question to you is, is it in any way a good outcome for this situation on the battlefield to continue as it is with obviously Bashar al-Assad prevailing and a great victory for Iran and continued slaughter of thousands and thousands of people, the destabilization of Jordan, the destabilization of Lebanon, and what is clearly erupting into a regional conflict? Is that your answer?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, somehow you have me portrayed as the one who is holding back from our use of military force inside of Syria.

Senator MCCAIN. No, I am not saying that, General. I am saying what your advice and counsel is to the President of the United States, and your views are very important because that is your job.

General DEMPSEY. It is. I have given those views to the President. We have given him options. Members of this committee have been briefed on them in a classified setting. We have articulated the risks. The decision on whether to use force is the decision of our elected officials.

Senator MCCAIN. The chairman just asked you if you would give your personal opinion to the committee if asked. You said yes. I am asking for your opinion.

General DEMPSEY. About the use of kinetic strikes? That issue is under deliberation inside of our agencies of Government, and it would be inappropriate for me to try to influence the decision with me rendering an opinion in public about what kind of force we should use.

Senator MCCAIN. So your answer to the chairman's question about giving your personal view is circumscribed by decisions that are still being made?

General DEMPSEY. I will rather let this committee know what my recommendations are at the appropriate time. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCAIN. When might that be?

General DEMPSEY. Sir, if the administration and the Government decides to use military force, we have provided a variety of options, and you know that.

Senator MCCAIN. Well, if it is your position that you do not provide your personal views to the committee when asked, only under certain circumstances, then you have just contradicted what I have known this committee to operate under for the last 30 years.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator McCain.

Senator Donnelly?

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, General. Thank you, Admiral.

I want to get back to Syria in a second.

But, first, I want to ask you, General Dempsey. In regards to mental health services for our servicemembers, one of the things that has recently happened is that at Camp Lejeune, they were reduced by about 50 appointments per month because of the sequestration. I was wondering if you know if there has been any increase in suicide or suicide attempts since sequestration took effect.

General DEMPSEY. I do not have that data readily available, Senator. It is a good question. We are aware of some of the reduction in services. I can take that for the record.

Senator DONNELLY. Okay, great.

[The information referred to follows:]

While it is difficult for the Department to track a direct effect of sequestration on suicide events or attempts, one thing is certain, the Department has witnessed a decline in the total number of suicide events during calendar year 2013 as compared to calendar year 2011 and calendar year 2012. The latest suicide report from the Armed Forces Medical Examiner's Office (week ending July 14, 2013) stated that year-to-date 2013 there have been a total of 156 confirmed and suspected suicides. This number, while unacceptably high, indicates 45 fewer suicide events compared to 2012 and 8 fewer than in 2011. We're cautiously optimistic that our extensive efforts may be showing results, and we must continue to keep our eye on the ball following through on prevention efforts to ensure these numbers continue to decrease. The Department will continue its collaboration efforts with the Department of Veterans Affairs, other Federal agencies, nongovernmental organizations, and academia to share an understanding of key risk factors associated with suicide, collaborate on a national strategy, and develop best practices in suicide prevention.

Since the date civilian furloughs officially began (on/about July 8, 2013), there have been seven new cases of suicide events. While there has been a decrease in the number of services provided due to sequestration, the number of suicides has not increased. Suicide remains a highly complex issue with many facets contributing to a servicemember's choice to commit this act. Personal/dispositional factors, contextual factors, clinical health factors, historical factors, and even deployment factors can all contribute as stressors linked to suicide events and in some cases a lack of services may not be at issue at all. While sequestration will force the department to make tough decisions, suicide prevention is of vital importance and will remain a top priority for our leaders.

Senator DONNELLY. The follow-up on that would be, are there efforts in place right now to try to minimize the effect on mental health since it has such a dramatic effect on our servicemembers?

General DEMPSEY. There are any number of efforts, and it has the attention of not only the Department but also the Joint Chiefs. Admiral Winnefeld himself chairs a meeting with the Vice Chiefs of the Services. We meet in the tank. We are concerned because although we have prioritized care for wounded warriors, families, and mental health services in the face of declining resources, how that is implemented in the field can sometimes be missed. We are alert to it.

Senator DONNELLY. Okay.

I was in Afghanistan a few months ago and met with our commanders. At the time, we were on all of our metrics. We were right where we wanted to be as we head toward the end of 2014. Admiral and General, are we still meeting the plan that we had laid out? Are we still being able to hold the towns that we have started to hold? Are we able to turn the Taliban back? Is the plan moving along on schedule? Is it going faster or slower? Are we meeting the numbers we were hoping to meet as we head toward the end of 2014?

General DEMPSEY. I will start and see if the Vice wants to add anything.

Besides speaking with General Dunford on a weekly basis and visiting him about quarterly, I also reach out to as many other people as I can possibly reach out to who can give us other views. Yesterday we had a woman from the Congressional Research Service who had actually spent the last 5 months traveling around Afghanistan visiting with civilian and military leaders, mostly Afghans. Her report aligned with General Dunford's assessment that we can achieve our military campaign objectives on the timeline that is currently established.

Senator DONNELLY. I appreciate the update because if we are able to stay on that program, then the Afghan forces have a chance to make this work.

To get back to Syria that Senator McCain was talking about, if conditions do not change, does it look to you, as it looks to many, that in the near future Daraa could also fall to the Assad Government as well?

General DEMPSEY. Actually the chairman asked——

Senator DONNELLY. I apologize. I had to step out.

General DEMPSEY. No, no, sir. I was just reflecting on the fact that there are many people concerned about Daraa. I met on Saturday with King Abdullah from Jordan, and I will be visiting him next week and his leaders as well. We have military contingency planning ongoing both back here, but also inside Jordan. So, yes, we are concerned about Daraa.

The conflict tends to ebb and flow. That kind of conflict will always ebb and flow. We are watching and making sure that we would have options available to the national command authority if necessary.

Senator DONNELLY. What steps, short of a limited no-fly zone, could have the kind of effect that could slow down the Assad forces?

General DEMPSEY. Let me pass that to the Vice because he just did some significant work on this in preparation for his hearing on Tuesday.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Senator, there are a whole range of options that are out there.

Senator DONNELLY. The reason I asked that is because I know there is a whole range of options, but as you look at everything, the rebel forces are being moved from almost everywhere they are located. So we have options but the ball seems to be heading the other way.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would not want to get into any Intelligence Community judgments or anything classified in an unclassified hearing. But I think as commonly known, where the opposition is most on the run right now is in the central and western part of Syria around al-Qusayr, which they have lost, around Homs, which is a very difficult situation for them right now. That also happens to be the most important place other than Damascus itself probably for the Syrian regime to regain control of because that represents the pathway from Damascus into their traditional homeland near the coast. So they really want that back.

I believe personally—and it is only my personal judgment—that if the regime is successful in that area, they will next move north to Aleppo, which is the largest city in Syria. It is their commercial center. I do not think they are going to go down to Daraa yet, but we have to watch. We have to maintain vigilance and discern where this thing is headed.

Senator DONNELLY. Then whether it is Aleppo or Daraa, and I know there are contingencies, but to not take action is to take action and is determinative of what happens. I think there is a concern as to how long does this go on before the momentum becomes irreversible.

Admiral WINNEFELD. We are ready to act if we are called upon to act. I think the current track that is being pursued by the administration is a diplomatic track. All manner of other options have been discussed and are continually under discussion, and I would not want to get out in front of the President or anybody else on what choices he might make.

Senator DONNELLY. In effect, you are waiting to hear at this point.

Admiral WINNEFELD. As we should be. We are ready, providing every possible option we can in case we are called upon to exercise the use of force, which we believe is a political decision.

Senator DONNELLY. In regards to the rebel forces, as you look at them right now, General and Admiral, we have been concerned about al Nusra and their activities. Do you see the al Nusra piece growing stronger than the moderate piece? How do you see this moving on a day-to-day basis?

General DEMPSEY. There was a period back in April that Senator McCain referred where I was very concerned that the al Nusra front, Ahrar al-Sham, and others—there are hundreds of different groups that shift allegiances and alliances on the opposition side, and it makes it very challenging to determine what we are really looking at there. The Intelligence Community is hard at it. I am hard at it. We are hard at it with our regional partners. There was a period of time when I was fearful that the extremist element, the jihadist Salafist side of the opposition was gaining considerable strength.

Of late, through some efforts that we have made to convince our allies to avoid creating a problem by empowering some of these groups, we have had some success at that. We have also had some success in identifying more clearly a part of the opposition that could be built and trained not only militarily. This is the point I really want to make sure resonates. This opposition has to not only be prepared militarily, but it has to be prepared if it achieves a position of governance inside of Syria. Otherwise, the situation will deteriorate even further.

Senator DONNELLY. General, Admiral, thank you for your service.

Mr. Chairman?

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Donnelly.

Now, before I call on Senator Wicker, Senator Inhofe has a very brief comment.

Senator INHOFE. Just a brief clarification. I was told by my staff when I came back that I might have been misunderstood in my comments about GTMO. I am arguably the strongest supporter of opening it up, using it to its fullest capacity not just for incarceration but for trials. The language is in the bill. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your good faith efforts in the language that was in there, but I am against the language that is in the NDAA.

Thank you for giving me the opportunity to state that.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Wicker?

Senator WICKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Dempsey, welcome back.

Let us talk about the situation in Egypt. There has been disagreement in Washington about the wisdom of continuing to provide assistance to the Egyptian military in light of recent events there. When I look at Egypt, I do not see very many Jeffersonian Democrats, but I believe the Egyptian military has acted with great professionalism and restraint throughout the 3 years of difficult transition since the 2011 ouster of Hosni Mubarak.

I believe one of the primary reasons there has not been far more bloodshed and suffering during this time of transition is the support the United States has provided to Egypt through foreign military sales and military-to-military cooperation.

In light of recent events, some have called for the end of these programs. Let me tell you how I feel about this and our commitments under the Camp David Accords and then I will let you respond.

First, we must maintain the strength of this relationship to enable us to assist and influence Egypt's military leaders.

Second, the United States would be shortsighted to overlook the return on investment we get from the Egyptian military, for example, Suez Canal transits for our carrier battle groups, intelligence cooperation, counterterrorism cooperation. These are examples of the benefits we derive from this relationship.

Third, the Egyptian military has played a stabilizing role during Egypt's transition.

Fourth, our commitments under the Camp David Accords have yielded sustainable peace between Israel and Egypt. We must acknowledge Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu's statement this weekend on Face the Nation that the Camp David Accords have been, "The cornerstone of peace between us and our neighbors, and it has also been the cornerstone of stability in the Middle East."

General Dempsey, do you agree with me regarding the importance of military-to-military relationships as enablers of U.S. foreign policy?

General DEMPSEY. I do, Senator.

Senator WICKER. Do you agree with me that we should continue to maintain and foster the strength of the U.S.-Egyptian military relationship?

General DEMPSEY. I do. If our Government decides that they have to take some action based on existing legal frameworks and restrictions, I would recommend that we find a way to restore those as quickly as possible even if it meant conditioning them some way. But I very strongly believe we have to maintain our contact with the Egyptian armed forces.

Senator WICKER. Do you have any reason to believe, as some have feared and as some fear now, that weapons and equipment that we provide to the Egyptians or that we have provided in the past have been used or will be used or would be used in ways that might eventually endanger the U.S. military or civilian personnel or U.S. interests?

General DEMPSEY. There is no indication at this point, Senator, that that would be a concern.

Senator WICKER. In your opinion, was the elected Government of Mohamed Morsi moving toward a dictatorship?

General DEMPSEY. If I could, I would like to use this opportunity to express my conversations with my counterpart. I can tell you they very strongly believe that.

Senator WICKER. Okay. Let me ask you then, before I move on to another topic. I made some pretty emphatic statements. Would you like to elaborate? I will give you an opportunity to elaborate on what you have said about the relationship that we have had and the assistance and the sales that we have had with the Egyptian military.

General DEMPSEY. Thank you. My own personal experience with it goes back to when I commanded U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) in 2008, and I can tell you that they are a very strong partner of the United States, a very key nation in the region. As you put it yourself, we enjoy preferential passage in the Suez, dynamic overflight. They have committed to the Camp David Accords. The Israeli military considers the Egyptian military a strong partner. In my personal experience, which goes back now about 5 years, they are worth the investment.

Senator WICKER. Now, with regard to Syria, the chairman talked in his opening statement about a post-Assad solution, the negotiated solution. Do you agree that unless the momentum shifts—and I think Senator Donnelly was concerned about this also—back toward the rebels, there is hardly any chance for that sort of solution that the chairman seeks and is hoping for?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, I agree. I think as the momentum ebbs and flows, each side feels itself more compelled or less compelled to seek a negotiated settlement. Sure.

Senator WICKER. If I can, I think you answered a question from the chairman about ways in which military support could be gotten to the rebels, and I think he asked about enabling other governments to support the military efforts if we are unable politically or unwilling to do so. Do you remember that question?

General DEMPSEY. I do.

Senator WICKER. Can you elaborate at all, or is that something you just do not feel comfortable talking about?

General DEMPSEY. No. I am comfortable talking about the commitment to improve the capabilities of the opposition. There are any number of ways to do it directly.

Senator WICKER. The military capability?

General DEMPSEY. That is correct.

But you have also heard me say it is not just about improving or enhancing their military capability.

Senator WICKER. I understand that, but that is what my question is about.

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir.

Of course, other nations as well. There is a significant diplomatic effort to bundle our efforts together into something that will increase the pace at which their capability could be increased.

Senator WICKER. Could you elaborate as to who these allies might be that are a little more willing?

General DEMPSEY. I would rather do that in a classified setting, Senator.

Senator WICKER. Okay.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Wicker.

Senator Reed is going to yield momentarily to another Senator who is next in line who I believe is Senator Gillibrand. Senator Reed is going to yield just for one turn.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Okay, thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you both for your public service, for your dedication, for all that you do for our military and for our Nation.

I would like to first focus and continue the conversation on Syria.

I have grave concerns over the broader regional security in the Middle East, particularly when we are seeing the continued influx of jihadi and Hezbollah fighters into Syria. I want to talk a little bit about what this means for Syria's neighbor.

Obviously, with Hezbollah in Lebanon, Iran has been able to have an influence at Israel's border. Will Iran be able to do the same with regard to Syria in your estimation? What can we do to prevent both a jihadi haven, as well as a stronghold for Iran through Hezbollah in Syria?

General DEMPSEY. I will take this and then if the Vice Chairman wants to add because we have been—it will not surprise you to know—deeply involved in this issue collaboratively.

First of all, you are exactly right to think of this as a regional issue, Senator. I would add that Iran is not just a challenge to the United States in its nuclear aspirations but also through its surrogates, its proxies, its arm sales. They are trying to foment a sectarian conflict that runs from Beirut to Damascus to Baghdad. The approach to that, the strategy that would underpin our efforts should be regional, therefore, which means we need to increase our support of the Lebanese armed forces on one side, of the Iraqi armed forces on the other, and of our Jordanian and Turkish partners on the northern and southern flank.

Senator GILLIBRAND. With regard to the broader question on Iran specifically, I have heard both cautious optimism and grave concern about the election of Rohani as the new President. What is your assessment of the impact of the election? Do you expect his election to change Iran's nuclear policy or its international policies? What is your initial assessment?

Admiral WINNEFELD. First of all, I reflect back on former Secretary Gates' oft-quoted remark of he is looking for the elusive Iranian moderate. Rohani does have a reputation for being a moderate. He has made some moderate statements since he has been elected, but he is not in office yet. There are those of us who have the opinion he is going to struggle a little bit against a very conservative central government leadership led by the Supreme Leader that may prevent him from, if he wants to be a moderate, becoming one.

I think the real watchword here is prudence. It makes sense to potentially reach out to him, see where he is coming from, but not to do so naively. I do not think anybody is going to do that. I think we are in a good position here. But it is an interesting development. Nobody really expected him to be elected, at the same time again the elusive Iranian moderate. We need to maintain the pressure that we are maintaining on the regime and make it very clear to them what our objectives are, number one, that they not develop a nuclear weapon.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you.

Turning now to cyber, both of you have testified that you believe that cyber is a growing threat and a serious concern for our military and for our national security and for our economy. We have been working on a bipartisan basis on a bill called The Cyber Warrior Act—Senator Vitter and Senator Blunt are leading the charge for the Republican side—in order to create a National Guard unit that is dedicated solely to cyber defense of our Nation as a way to get some of our best and bravest from the private sector who are dedicated to the military and the defense of this country to be able to use their talents more efficiently, in a more cost efficient manner as well.

Can I have your opinions on what the impact of creating these units would be with their dual status and whether that would be in the end better for our defense and for growing this talent in house?

General DEMPSEY. I will go first. Again, this is one where the Vice has also been deeply involved.

First of all, you have our commitment to seek to figure out what are the various roles in all the components of our military and all the branches of Service. Without making a firm commitment right now on that particular approach, I will say that each of the Service Chiefs is taking a look at it under the advice of our U.S. Cyber Command Commander and U.S. Strategic Command Commander.

By the way, you say it is a growing concern. It is here right now. There is urgency to this and I think you understand that.

We would have to understand what the cyber role would be for a guardsman. There really would be no role in a title 2 authority. There is no title 2 authority for cyber. It is really title 10.

But go ahead, Sandy.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would say it has been an interesting idea that we have looked at and we are committed to looking at. We are growing our cyber force by a considerable number. It is probably the only part of our force that is going to grow under current budget conditions.

We need this new force to do a number of things for us, principally to help us defend our own networks inside the Department of Defense to help defend the Nation against cyber attacks. Obviously, law enforcement, Department of Homeland Security (DHS) have the lead there, but we play an important role in assisting them.

Then there is the potential for offensive cyber operations in support of a combatant commander if we end up finding ourselves in a war.

Where the National Guard fits into those three niches is something we need to study and look at. We are short of money. It is going to cost a lot to develop this capability in the Guard, and it is not there all the time for us. Then again, I think you make a fair point that there is expertise out there to tap on.

Senator GILLIBRAND. That we want to have.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I just think we need to look very closely, very soberly at whether this makes sense financially.

Senator GILLIBRAND. I would like to work with you both on this issue.

We have, obviously, been spending a lot of time on sexual assault in the military. It is something everyone cares deeply about solving. One of the things I want to get your thoughts on the military has had a change of position on its view towards Article 60, that we can actually take Article 60 authority outside the chain of command and still maintain good order and discipline, still maintain command climate, command control.

Why do you think removing Article 30 would be different in any way? Because I would imagine that second legal decision would not have a differing impact than removing Article 60.

General DEMPSEY. The approach to Article 60 was because we had put in place over time in our judicial system other mechanisms, military judges and prosecutors, and an appeal process that allowed us to consider changing the authorities of a convening authority to change a ruling after the fact. But that is, it seems to us, different than taking the actual offense out of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).

Do you want to add anything to that?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I think the most important thing to me is to make sure that there is an active deterrent out there that somebody who is contemplating sexual assault knows that they are going to be caught, that they are going to be prosecuted, and if they are prosecuted, they are going to be punished. It is the same thing that has worked in the drug world for us and the like. It is our strong view that the commander is responsible for that.

Senator GILLIBRAND. But I would argue that the commander is still responsible for that because keeping in a number of the articles like Article 134, other articles that are general crimes, you are still fundamentally responsible for command climate, good order, and discipline. For any type of infraction of any part of the UCMJ, the commander is responsible for. You have to set the climate where this assault and rape is not going to happen where they can not be retaliated against and where they will report.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I could not agree more.

Senator GILLIBRAND. The only difference is the legal judgment, that weighing of evidence and facts, will now be done by a trained objective military prosecutor.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would like to give you a couple of numbers on what the Army has discovered recently, peeling back the numbers on what a so-called objective observer might end up with.

The Army has looked back over the last 2 years and has found 35 cases where a civilian district attorney (DA) refused to take a sexual assault case—refused to take the case. The chain of command in the military insisted that the case be taken inside the military chain of command. Of those 35 cases, there are 14 out there that are not yet resolved. They are still in the court system. There are actually 49. Of the 35 complete, 25 resulted in a court martial conviction. That is a 71 percent conviction rate. The civilian rate is around 18 to 22 percent. So of those 71 percent that were convicted, 24 of the 25 got punitive discharges. They are doing prison time.

If the Army had not taken those 49 cases and the 35 where we have achieved a conviction, those people would be walking the street right now. The victims would not have had the resolution that they deserved in this case. This was done inside the chain of command, the chain of command insisting that a prosecution be pursued, and it was pursued successfully. I worry that if we turn this over to somebody else, whether it is a civilian DA or a nonentity in the military, that they are going to make the same kind of decisions that those civilian prosecutors made. I worry that we are going to have fewer prosecutions if we take it outside the chain of command.

Senator GILLIBRAND. We want prosecutions that are going to result in guilty verdicts, and weighing these kinds of evidence is very difficult. That is why being trained to know what kind of cases you can bring forward and win is so important.

But, moreover, you may have helped a handful of victims. We are still having 23,000 victims who do not feel the system is strong enough, objective enough, and transparent enough to even report. If we are going to address the 23,000 cases as opposed to the handful where a judgment of a commander might have helped, we need to change the system.

My time has expired.

General DEMPSEY. By the way, thanks, Senator. I hope you know we actually embrace this discussion.

Senator GILLIBRAND. Thank you for your service and thoughtfulness.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Gillibrand.

Senator Ayotte?

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank both of you for being here and your families for your distinguished service to our country.

General Dempsey, I want to thank you for your recent visit to New Hampshire. It really meant a lot to our men and women in uniform, and they said to me after that it really said so much about your leadership to go hear from those on the ground. Also at our shipyard, our civilian workforce—they deeply appreciated it. So thank you.

Yesterday I was deeply troubled by a report that came out from the Government Accountability Office (GAO) about the Joint Prisoner of War/Missing in Action (POW/MIA) Accounting Command (JPAC), and that report actually said that unfortunately the leadership weaknesses and fragmented organizational structure is undermining the important function of JPAC. Of course, with more than 83,000 of our country's heroes remaining missing or unaccounted for from past conflicts, including 49 from New Hampshire for Vietnam and Korea, I believe we have a moral obligation to those we have left behind.

This follows up a recent Associated Press (AP) report that found that an internal study that was done at DOD found that this effort, JPAC, was so inept, mismanaged, and wasteful that it risked descending from dysfunction to total failure. There were allegations that this internal study had been suppressed by DOD.

General Dempsey, what are we going to do about this and how are we going to make sure that we fulfill our responsibility to those who have served our country and have been left behind so that they understand that they are not forgotten?

General DEMPSEY. First, Senator, thanks for the hospitality last week. I assure you I always get more than I give on those visits to soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines, coast guardsmen, and all the components.

This is a new report to us as well. I can tell you, though, that the Secretary of Defense, while on travel, called me up to make sure that I had been made aware of it and to tell me that when he got back and when I complete this process of hearings and office calls, that he wants to get to the bottom of it.

I mean, it is so new, but it is so discouraging and moving rapidly toward disgraceful. I assure you we will get at it.

We have a new commander out there, and I can also tell you that he is seized with this as well.

Senator AYOTTE. I have written the chairman and I hope that we could have, with the full committee, a hearing on this because I believe it is that important to get to the bottom of some of the issues that have been raised by this GAO report and the internal report.

I would like to ask you, Chairman Dempsey, the chairman and the ranking member of this committee wrote to Secretary Hagel on May 2, 2013. We have heard testimony both in the Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee and every subcommittee within this committee about the impacts of sequestration. In that letter, the chairman asked you to produce, or the Department of Defense to produce, a package of reductions for the fiscal year 2014 defense budget that would be the most workable approach for meeting the $52 billion in reductions required by sequestration under the BCA.

We did receive a response recently from Secretary Hagel, but it does not really answer our question on the specifics.

Have you put together a contingency plan for the $52 billion in reductions required by sequestration in 2014?

General DEMPSEY. The Services, having received their fiscal guidance about 2 weeks ago, are preparing that contingency right now. It will be a contingency that addresses both the President's budget submission and also the sequestration.

Senator AYOTTE. We had asked for this in July. Can you give me a commitment as to when will this be produced to us, this committee, so that we can understand the impacts of sequestration and we can also share it with our colleagues about what it really means in terms of the impact of the readiness of our forces?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I can probably help.

General DEMPSEY. Yes, go ahead.

Admiral WINNEFELD. It is a very fair question. The answer that came back was the first contours of what the fiscal year 2014 execution would look like under those conditions.

It is important for us to keep in mind that there are about five things the Service planners, budget planners, are having to go through right now. They are going through what 2014 is going to look like under the conditions that were asked for in the letter. They are finalizing what 2014 execution would look like under the President's budget. They are also having to develop two or three different scenarios for the fiscal year 2015 to 2019 budget. These people are furloughed 1 day a week. So it is a little tough to produce fine detail of that quickly. But the Services have been given the task and they will have an execution plan before the first of October and you will have it.

Senator AYOTTE. We need it sooner. Let me just say that you can do all the planning you want for the President's budget, but it is pie in the sky right now. The reality is that the law is the sequestration, and until the American people understand and everyone here understands what the real impact of that is, that is why I am hoping that you will make that the priority.

I know I do not have that much time, but I want to ask you, the Chairman and the Vice Chairman, about Russia. In particular, I saw a recent report that Russia is in violation of the Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces Treaty. Is that true?

Admiral WINNEFELD. That is something that we cannot address in an unclassified hearing, but I would be happy to get into a discussion with you in a more classified setting, the point being that we have very good verification methods in place. We watch this very closely. We believe that they are in compliance with the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), and I need to leave it at that in this setting.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. I will follow up because I am not asking about the START treaty.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I understand.

[The information referred to follows:]

The administration is prepared to brief the Senator on the issues relating to the question.

Senator AYOTTE. The reason that I am asking this is because here is where we are with Russia, a postmortem conviction of Sergei Magnitsky—the human rights case—who was, of course, tortured and killed for bringing out corruption within the government. To put it in your face with the United States, they have not ruled out granting asylum to Edward Snowden. Just today there was a report that one of Putin's chief opponents, Navalny, a candidate for the mayor of Moscow, was convicted. It really reeks of using the judicial system for Putin to punish his opponents.

When I look at that context, one thing that concerns me is that our posture with Russia—if they are in violation of their treaty obligations, that is an important issue.

One final question, Admiral. The President recently announced that he would be considering further reductions to our nuclear arsenal. Do you believe that we should do that unilaterally?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Senator, the advice that we have given to the President is that we not do that unilaterally, that we do it as part of a negotiated package of reductions.

Senator AYOTTE. If there were going to be unilateral reductions, would you oppose those reductions?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would not give that advice to the President that we do a unilateral reduction.

Senator AYOTTE. You would advise against a unilateral reduction in our nuclear deterrent?

Admiral WINNEFELD. We already have.

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. I appreciate that.

General DEMPSEY. There are three things, Senator. There is the through negotiations, preserve the triad, and modernize the stockpile.

Senator AYOTTE. My time is up, but I think given the behavior of Russia, I think it is at best naïve to think that we are going to be able to negotiate any kind of further reductions, which I would oppose. I do not think that is the right direction for the protection of this country. But in light of what I just described—and obviously, we cannot discuss it in this setting, but if we find out that they are in violation of other treaty obligations, coupled with their other behavior, I do not see how we can expect good faith negotiations from the Russians at the moment.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Senator Reed?

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen, for your service to the Nation and to your families' service because it is evident you cannot do this alone.

General Dempsey, one of your statutory duties is to provide your formal military advice on the strategic environment and military activities needed to address that environment through the Chairman's risk assessment. Given the current world environment, which seems to be changing minute by minute—Senator Ayotte just detailed what has happened in the last 24 hours with respect to the Russians—what changes would you make today to your risk assessment that you submitted in April?

General DEMPSEY. Thanks, Senator.

The first thing I think you have probably noticed is we changed the one we submitted in April. Previously it had been an accumulation of combatant commander requirements.

By the way, this is to Senator Inhofe's point earlier. Since I have been Chairman over the past 2 years, the requirements that the combatant commanders have submitted have actually increased in U.S. Pacific Command, in CENTCOM, and in U.S. Africa Command notably. It is to the point about increasing risk, declining readiness.

We changed it to try to align what we are doing with national security interests unprioritized, because that is not our responsibility to prioritize them, and we made an estimate of what we are doing across the globe that is being placed at risk. We also looked inside the Services at how the health of the force is evolving.

In that document, I made mention of the fact that this document did not account for sequestration, and that once that became a reality, that I would have to revise my risk assessment. I will have to do so to align with the submission that Senator Ayotte just described.

Senator REED. Thank you very much, Chairman Dempsey.

Admiral Winnefeld, my colleagues, particularly Senator Gillibrand, have done extraordinary service to the Nation and to the military by pointing out that despite years of effort, we have a significant sexual abuse problem in the military. We have to, as you both clearly indicated, not rhetorically but fundamentally respond to this.

One aspect we focused on has been the judicial system. But some of my experience suggests that there are other levers that are critical to the climate, the command structure, the performance of the military, and they include evaluation, promotion, and retention. If we do not focus on those areas also, then we will never have the kind of force that we need and the trust that we need among the men and women who serve in that force.

Can you comment on that? I know you and your colleagues have taken on a leadership role in dealing with this issue.

Admiral WINNEFELD. In terms of promotion and——

Senator REED. How do we make this so that every day someone thinks about their responsibilities? There is a judicial process out there, but this is what is expected of me to stay in the force, to succeed in the force, and to have the force succeed.

Admiral WINNEFELD. There are an enormous number of aspects of that answer, but I will touch on a few.

The most important thing—and Senator Gillibrand touched on this—is the command climate that we hold commanders responsible for establishing that makes the likelihood of a sexual assault drop down hopefully to zero. There are a number of aspects. It is about teaching people what a heinous crime this is. It is about reporting it if you see it. It is about intervening if you see it about to happen, a whole host of measures that commanders must take to establish the climate inside their commands. We need to hold commanders accountable for establishing that climate, and we intend to. That is one of the reasons why the command climate surveys now are going to be seen, which we normally have not done, by the next echelon up in the chain of command. If that next echelon up detects a problem that the climate is not where it needs to be, then action can be taken and it can be even entered into somebody's evaluation as sort of a down strike, as you will.

In keeping with the prevention and the advocacy, investigation, accountability, and assessment pieces of what we are trying to do to take on this pernicious issue, it is absolutely vital that the climate piece of it come to the forefront and that we hold commanders responsible for that.

Senator REED. Thank you very much.

General Dempsey, can you comment on the current level of cooperation between the Government in Kabul and NATO International Security Assistance Force command? Every day there seems to be another example of friction rather than harmony.

General DEMPSEY. The relationship with notably the President of Afghanistan is "scratchy" I think is probably as good a word as I could describe it. He is addressing what he describes as issues of sovereignty, and we are trying to close the gap on what an enduring presence and commitment might look like.

Senator REED. Thank you.

Admiral Winnefeld, in terms of the recent discovery of contraband coming out of Cuba to North Korea, do you have a rough assessment at this juncture? Was it the Cubans trying simply to rehabilitate their equipment, or were they trying to get equipment to North Korea so the North Koreans could use it?

Admiral WINNEFELD. It is a little hard to tell at this point. The Intelligence Community is still evaluating that. It would be easy to come to the conclusion that under the guise of returning equipment to North Korea for repair, that in fact these are jet engines and missiles that would be going to North Korea to replenish their stocks or what have you.

In either case, it clearly exposes North Korea's willing defiance of the international community and United Nations (U.N.) Security Council's resolution and the like. We are very glad that the Panamanians discovered this so that we can once more expose to the world the cynical behavior of the North Korean regime.

Senator REED. Thank you. Thank you, General.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Reed.

Senator Graham?

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you both for your service.

Chairman Dempsey, the Russian President said I think a couple of days ago that if he thought hurting U.S.-Russian relationships would be a consequence of granting Snowden asylum, he would not do it. What would your advice be to the Russian President about granting Snowden asylum?

General DEMPSEY. I think that there would be consequences across all of our relationships, military, economic——

Senator GRAHAM. It would be damaging and not do it. Would that be your advice?

General DEMPSEY. I think it would be, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay, thank you very much.

The Prime Minister of Israel was on national television, on Face the Nation Sunday, and he said the following things about Iran. There is a new president in Iran. He believes he is criticizing his predecessor for being a wolf in wolf's clothing. His strategy is be a wolf in sheep's clothing, smile, and build a bomb.

Admiral Winnefeld, do you agree with that analysis?

Admiral WINNEFELD. As I mentioned earlier, I certainly would agree that we are for the elusive——

Senator GRAHAM. Is there any doubt in your mind that this guy is actually a moderate?

Admiral WINNEFELD. We are looking for the elusive Iranian moderate.

Senator GRAHAM. Now, my question to you—and this will determine how I vote for you. Do you believe the current President of Iran is a moderate?

Admiral WINNEFELD. He does not have a history of being a moderate, no, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. I will take that as no.

The United States should ratchet up the sanctions and make it clear to Iran that they will not get away with it, and if sanctions do not work, then they have to know that you will be prepared—us, the United States—to take military action. That is the only thing that will get their attention. Do you agree with the Israeli Prime Minister about the threat of military force against the Iranian nuclear program may be the only thing to get their attention, General Dempsey?

General DEMPSEY. That has been our approach all along, sir. So yes.

Senator GRAHAM. So great. We are all on the same sheet of paper there, that if they do not believe we are going to hit them, they are going to move.

Here is what he said about all the problems in the Mideast summed up this way. All the problems that we have, however important, will be dwarfed by this messianistic, apocalyptic, extreme regime that would have an atomic bomb. It would make a terrible, a catastrophic change for the world and for the United States.

Do you agree with his assessment of how important it is not to allow the Iranians to get a nuclear weapon?

General DEMPSEY. I do and that is what we have said.

Senator GRAHAM. Great.

All right. Now, as to Afghanistan, the current commander suggested that a 12,000-member force, two-thirds being United States, the other 4,000 being NATO, not counting American special forces troops SOF capability, would be a reasonable number to leave behind in terms of a follow-on force. Does that make sense to you? Is he in the ballpark? Does that make sense?

General DEMPSEY. He is and we have said so at NATO in various sessions.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you very much. That is encouraging.

Do you agree with me that it would be a wise investment to keep the Afghan army at 352,000 at least for a few more years rather than draw them down to 232,000?

General DEMPSEY. I do.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you.

Syria. Is Assad winning?

General DEMPSEY. Currently the tide seems to have shifted in his favor.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, Admiral Winnefeld?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would say specifically the tide has shifted in his favor in the central and western part of the country. It is very fragile in the north, and they are hanging in there.

Senator GRAHAM. Is he winning overall or not?

Admiral WINNEFELD. If I were to have to pick who is winning, it would be the regime, but not by much right now.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay. All right. So the regime is winning but not by much.

Could they be winning without Russia's help?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I think the most important help they are getting, sir, is Iranian and Hezbollah. I do not know whether Russia's help is vital but it is certainly helping them.

Senator GRAHAM. General Dempsey, how would you evaluate the significance of Russia's help to Assad?

General DEMPSEY. Through their foreign military sales, they are arming—

Senator GRAHAM. Let me put it this way. If the Russians said we want you gone tomorrow, would it matter to Assad?

General DEMPSEY. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. It would be a gamechanger, would it not, Admiral Winnefeld?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I certainly think so, but Assad is going to fight to the death I think.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with me that if Russia said to Assad we no longer support you, it would be the ultimate gamechanger?

Admiral WINNEFELD. It would be a very important gamechanger, absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you. Do you see Russia doing that?

Admiral WINNEFELD. No, sir.

Senator GRAHAM. If he stays versus him going, what is the most catastrophic outcome for us? If he wins over time and he does not leave versus having to deal with the fact that we kicked him out because we said he had to go, what is worse for us? Him staying or going?

General DEMPSEY. We have said that it is the Nation's policy that Assad must go.

Senator GRAHAM. So that means it is worse for us for him to stay and we not be able to achieve our policy. Do you agree with that?

General DEMPSEY. That is my interpretation.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree with that, Admiral Winnefeld?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir, I do.

Senator GRAHAM. Will he be in power next year if nothing changes? Your best military advice. If we keep just where we are at, Iran is helping him, do you agree they are all in in helping Assad?

General DEMPSEY. I do.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree that Hezbollah is helping Assad?

General DEMPSEY. Absolutely.

Senator GRAHAM. Do you agree that Russia is helping Assad?

General DEMPSEY. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. If nothing changes, if we do not change our game, will he be in power a year from now?

General DEMPSEY. I think likely so.

Senator GRAHAM. What would that mean for the King of Jordan? Will he be in power a year from now?

General DEMPSEY. As I have said, I have met with him and he is concerned that the demographics in his nation——

Senator GRAHAM. Right. You are dead right. He told me he did not think he would be here in another year because there will be a million Syrian refugees and it is destabilizing Jordan. Do you agree with that?

General DEMPSEY. That is his concern. That is right.

Senator GRAHAM. What would that mean for the region and us if the King of Jordan is gone a year from now and Assad is in power a year from now? Would that be a good thing or a bad thing?

General DEMPSEY. He is a strong ally. It would be a bad thing.

Senator GRAHAM. It would be a horrible thing for the Mideast, would it not?

General DEMPSEY. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. If this war in Syria keeps going on and Assad is still in power a year from now, what effect would it have on Iraq?

General DEMPSEY. It is already destabilizing western Iraq.

Senator GRAHAM. Iraq would just begin to fall apart at a faster rate—do you agree with that—because it is destabilizing the country?

General DEMPSEY. That would certainly be a possible scenario.

Senator GRAHAM. From the Israelis' point of view, the likelihood of Hezbollah getting Russian-made advanced weapons, if he is still in power a year from now—does that go up or down?

General DEMPSEY. From the Israeli standpoint, up.

Senator GRAHAM. Yes. From Israel's standpoint, one of the worst nightmares for them, short of an Iranian nuclear weapon, would be Hezbollah getting advanced weapons sold to Assad by Russia, and that likelihood would go up if he is still in power a year from now.

General DEMPSEY. Yes.

Senator GRAHAM. We will talk in the second round about sequestration. Thank you both for your answers.

Chairman LEVIN. If we can finish the first round by noon at least, there would be a very brief second round. That is my current intention, which I have shared with the ranking member.

Senator McCaskill?

Senator MCCASKILL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just when I think we have made real progress on wartime contracting, something happens and I realize that we have still miles to go before we really have a handle on this.

The latest incident that has come to my attention is a $34 million military base, Leatherneck, in Afghanistan. When the marines on the ground found out this was going to be built, they sent the word up they do not need it, do not want it. That was in May 2010. In February 2011, contracts were issued, and the building was built.

Now we know it is never going to be occupied, probably going to be demolished because it was done according to U.S. wiring standards. For the Afghanistan army to take it over, for the national forces there to take it over, it would be quite an investment for them to convert the building for their use.

I understand an investigation is ongoing. I questioned Mr. Jenman about this the other day. But I need to hear from you, General Dempsey, that you are committed to getting to the bottom of this because if we do not fix accountability in this instance, whoever pulled the trigger on that expenditure really needs to be disciplined. In my opinion, they should be fired because we have to start sending a signal that when the people are saying do not build it, it is a waste of money, that it does not get built. Are you aware of this situation?

General DEMPSEY. Absolutely, Senator. You have my commitment that we will get to the bottom of it.

If I could share just a bit of good news we have—so this one was not caught, but we have de-obligated about $1.3 billion in contracting for U.S. Forces Afghanistan and a similar amount, probably twice that amount, for the Afghan security forces.

Senator MCCASKILL. That is good. I appreciate that very much.

There has been discussion around military sexual assault that our allies have gone to a different system. The reason that this was talked about was in the context that Canada and Europe had gone to a different system in order to provide more protection for victims. We have had a chance now to take a really close look at those countries and what happened, and it is my understanding those changes in their system resulted from a concern that there was not adequate due process protections for perpetrators. Is that your understanding as well, General Dempsey?

General DEMPSEY. That is correct. Based on our last hearing on the subject, we have done a lot of research into why our allies, the five other nations, went that path, and it is not just because they wanted to protect the accused, but they were also mandated to do it by human rights courts in the European Union.

Senator MCCASKILL. The other argument that is being made about leaving this in the hand of just prosecutors, civilian and/or Judge Advocate General (JAG) prosecutors, is that this would increase reporting. I have had an opportunity to look at the numbers. In Canada, we actually have 176 in 2007, 166 in 2008, 166 in 2009, 176 in 2010. I looked at the numbers in the United Kingdom. Their numbers have actually gone down over the last several years in terms of reports from 54 to 40 to 40. In Australia, they have been stable at 82, 86, 84 over the last several years.

In Israel, there had been a fact about reporting going up when they changed part of their system when it related to lesser sexual offenses a few years ago. There was testimony about their reporting going up 80 percent. If you look back at the numbers—now, these are sex-related offenses total in the military. So everybody gets an understanding of the difference between the enormity of the challenges in our military and what they are looking at in Israel, 26 in 2009, 20 in 2010, 14 in 2011, and 27 in 2012. So yes, there is an 80 percent increase when they changed this between 2011 and 2012, but they only got back to the numbers that they had a few years previously before the change was made.

Are you all aware in the research you have done that changing the system has resulted in an increased reporting anywhere in the world?

General DEMPSEY. There is no analytical evidence nor anecdotal evidence that it has increased reporting. Furthermore, what my counterparts tell me is it has slowed the system down.

Senator MCCASKILL. You mentioned, Admiral Winnefeld, in your testimony earlier that you all have taken a look at prosecutors' decisions in isolation. I have some knowledge of this. There was discipline meted out in my office when I found out that prosecutors in our warrant desk, which was our intake desk, were getting lobbied by some of the trial prosecutors on their decisions because they did not want any losers. They did not want them to take cases that were going to reflect poorly on their won/lost record because when you are a prosecutor, there is a won/lost record. When you take a case to trial, you either win or you lose. So your status among your peers and in some instances your upward mobility in your job could depend on just your conviction rate. When you isolate them with this decision, then there certainly could be instances where you would have a prosecutor that did not want to take a close one, that did not want a "he said/she said".

Do you have additional information that you can share with this committee in terms of numbers of the number of times that civilian prosecutors have said no, military prosecutors have said no, but there are victims out there today that have had justice because the commander said yes?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I do, and I will give you a couple of examples. The Marine Corps has had 28 cases. They have looked back to 2010, 28 cases where civilian prosecutors declined to take the case. Of those, 16 of them the Marine Corps was able to obtain a conviction at court martial, 57 percent. So those are 16 perpetrators that are no longer walking the street and 16 victims who received justice who would not have received it otherwise.

The more startling numbers are from the Army, and I will repeat them. The Army has looked at 49 cases in the last 2 years. Actually 14 of them are still in process. We do not know what is going to happen with those cases. They are still in the trial system. Then 35 of them have been completed. Of those, 25 or 71 percent resulted in a conviction at a court martial. Two additional ones were plea bargained down to a punitive discharge. That takes the number up to 77 percent of these cases that civilian prosecutors would not take that resulted in some serious action taken against a perpetrator. There are some that were acquitted, understandably. Most of the ones who were found guilty have done hard time, are doing hard time, and have been given a punitive discharge from the military. These were all done inside the chain of command.

I would add, Senator McCaskill, some of these are very heinous cases that the DAs would not take. One of them was a 10-year-old autistic girl who was sexually assaulted. We took the case. The commander insisted on it, and a conviction was obtained.

Senator MCCASKILL. This is hard. We all have the same goal. But I do want to say, as I close this questioning, that anybody who characterizes me as someone who is protecting the Pentagon, that somehow I am in cahoots with the Pentagon trying to hurt sexual assault victims, with all due respect to you guys, I think you are terrific, but there is nobody who will be further in front of the line to kick you until you are senseless if we do not get this problem under control. This is not victims versus the Pentagon. Anybody who is characterizing that is doing a disservice to victims and is doing a disservice to the military and doing a disservice to the members of this committee who have spent hours trying to find the right way to make sure that we prosecute more cases effectively within the military.

I thank you both very much.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Mr. Chairman, if I can take 10 seconds?

Senator MCCASKILL. Yes.

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would like to just reinforce what General Dempsey said a moment ago, that we actually are very grateful for the attention that the entire committee has given to this. It has been very helpful to us.

I also want to say that I look forward to our next chance to have you and other people with prosecutorial experience over to the Pentagon, as we have done before, and get your thoughts, show you what we are doing, get your expertise in there. I think that is a very productive opportunity.

Senator MCCASKILL. You do not need to worry about me being invited. As many of your JAGs will know, I call them. I am not reaching out because you guys are calling plays on this. I was just infuriated at the article that was written that this is somehow you guys pulling strings over here telling us what to do. Nothing could be further from the truth. I appreciate both of you and your commitment to this, but believe me, we are not going anywhere.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you. If I may just take 30 seconds before Senator Chambliss speaks, there was an implication in an article in Politico that the amendment which was adopted by this committee was somehow or other cleared or shared with the Pentagon. That is not true. Are you aware of that?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Not that I am aware of.

General DEMPSEY. No.

Chairman LEVIN. A two-page article suggesting that somehow or other the Pentagon screened or impacted the language which we offered in a public session in this committee that led to the adoption of a bipartisan amendment, part of an article that suggested that somehow or other the Pentagon wrote something or screened something.

What they did, very properly so, was asked by the subcommittee that adopted language on this subject for its reaction. We do that all the time before the bill is marked up. The subcommittee then wrote its language under Senator Gillibrand's leadership. Wrote its language after consultation appropriately with the Pentagon. Totally appropriately. But the amendment that was adopted by this committee on a bipartisan vote was not shared with the Pentagon.

I do not know if the folks at Politico that wrote that two-page article implying to the contrary want to correct their article. But in fairness, I believe they should.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Chairman, may I just say on a point of personal privilege on behalf of Senator McCaskill, the implication that she is bought off by the Pentagon—she has been the spark plug in this whole thing from day one. I want her to know how much I appreciate that.

Chairman LEVIN. Her prosecutorial experience, I must say, is invaluable to this committee, not just on this subject but on a lot of other subjects, including this whole contracting problem that she has delved into with such tenacity and effect.

Senator Chambliss?

Senator CHAMBLISS. Thanks, Mr. Chairman, and thanks for your leadership and your impassioned leadership on this issue of sexual assault. I am not going to go into questioning. I think it has been thoroughly vetted, gentlemen. We know where you are and that you are trying to rectify a very serious situation. But I think you have a thorough understanding that this committee, as a total committee, is upset with what is going on in that realm in every branch of our military. We have to fix it. The system is broken. The chairman's leadership on this and, as he said, in a bipartisan way I think addresses it fairly. We will look forward to that debate on the floor.

General Dempsey, in your answers to advance questions from the committee, you said, "We are at risk of strategy and solvency if sequestration is implemented as currently presented by law." The words "strategy and solvency" sounds like sending unprepared troops into combat and not being able to take action against threats to national security and not being able to assist allies and partners in unstable regions. Is that what you meant?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, sir. Maybe even more simply, it is the mismatch of aspirations and abilities.

Senator CHAMBLISS. I want to go back, General Dempsey, to Syria. Again, it has been thoroughly talked about here, but I am a little bit confused. I heard your response to Senator McCain's questioning. Here is the way I see where we are with respect to Syria right now and your participation in the process.

You have been in place about 2 years, as we all know. During that 2 years, the conflict in Syria has been going on the entire time. There has been virtually an uncontrolled slaughter going on inside of Syria, and I note that even the President's nominee to be Ambassador to the United Nations said yesterday in her hearing that the failure of the U.N. Security Council to respond to the slaughter in Syria is a disgrace that history will judge harshly. I agree with that. But it is also a fact that the United States has kind of sat by and watched what is happening over there and we have really had our hands behind our back.

Now, you have been in place for 2 years. You have been the principal military advisor to the President on this issue and others. Has the President followed your advice on the involvement of the United States in Syria?

General DEMPSEY. The President has asked for options, and we have provided them. On the issues, has he followed my advice, the issue is whether—there are two issues at work. Could we and should we? I have advised him on "could we". We have not gotten into a conversation about "should we" except as it relates to the current path, which is one focused primarily on building a moderate opposition.

Senator CHAMBLISS. I am taking that to mean then that the President has listened to your options but apparently you have not picked a side or been forceful in what you think the President ought to do. Am I correct?

General DEMPSEY. Sir, let me talk about the role of the Chairman because it keeps coming back to that. It is my responsibility to provide options about the use of force and how they would contribute to a broader strategy not in isolation.

I am reluctant to—in fact, I am unwilling actually to discuss my advice to the President on whether we should use force while that deliberation is ongoing.

To the point about what is my responsibility to this committee, my responsibility to this committee is to have the same kind of conversations with you as we have on options and on what the military instrument of power could do in the context of a broader strategy.

But the decision on whether to use force is fundamentally a political decision and one that is being deliberated even frequently with regard to Syria. But for me to advocate it would absolutely put me in what I have deemed to be an inappropriate position with both the President and this committee.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Did you advocate for a no-fly zone or against a no-fly zone?

General DEMPSEY. That is the point, sir. I have not advocated nor opposed any of those options. I have explained what they would do to the situation.

Senator CHAMBLISS. Here is my dilemma, General. You are the top military advisor to the President. Syria is the most significant international military conflict going on today. It has the capability of providing future unrest to that part of the world that may be permanent. There has been no change in U.S. policy from a military standpoint in Syria during your 2 years.

Now, if we approve you for another 2 years, confirm you for another 2 years, then is there going to be a change in policy in Syria over the next 2 years, or are we just going to keep doing what we are doing, which is watching innocent people slaughtered?

General DEMPSEY. Senator, I would hate to take that burden entirely on myself to determine whether the situation in Syria will change over the next 2 years. You can be sure that as we develop options to be considered in military instrument of power, that I will articulate whether I think they will be effective, what are the risks involved to U.S. forces, what are the opportunity costs.

Let me tell you what has changed in the last 2 years. We are far more involved on the Korean Peninsula at higher states of readiness. We are far more involved in the Gulf at higher states of readiness. We continue to manage the conflict in Afghanistan. There are some significant risks we are accruing while we also are engaged in trying to determine how to match ends, ways, and means in the face of sequestration.

Senator CHAMBLISS. In closing, let me just say that Secretary Hagel in a recent announcement directed a 20 percent cut in the number of top ranking officers and senior civilians at the Pentagon by 2019. I applaud that move. I think that is something that has to be done. We look forward to as a committee to working with you, assuming you are confirmed, to carrying out that directive by the Secretary. It is not going to be easy. It is not going to be pleasant, but everybody has to share in this pain, including our top ranking folks.

General DEMPSEY. No question. If I could just respond very briefly. There are a couple of things we should do, Senator, whether sequestration was hanging over our heads or not. One of them is to make ourselves more efficient at the institutional level. The other is compensation and health care, and we are going to need your help to do that.

Admiral WINNEFELD. If I could add just 1 second. I do not want to leave the committee with the impression that has been in the press that it is only the top brass that are being reduced by 20 percent. It is the entire staffs that are being reduced by 20 percent. This is a significant cut and we offered it. We believe that we have to become more efficient and never waste a crisis. It is the entire staff, not only the Joint Staff but the Office of the Secretary of Defense staff, but also the combatant commanders' staffs we are going to trim by 20 percent over the next 5 years.

Chairman LEVIN. Just if I heard you correctly, it is not just that you support it but that you offered it. Is that correct?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Thank you, Senator Chambliss.

Senator Hagan?

Senator HAGAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Dempsey, Admiral Winnefeld, thank you very much for your service to our country and for being here today.

General Dempsey, on just this past Monday, I had the great pleasure to be at the Fleet Readiness Center-East at Marine Corps Air Station Cherry Point to welcome the arrival of the first F–35B that was scheduled for modifications. I know how important the F–35B is to the Marine Corps, to our national security, and to the local North Carolina communities that support it. This was certainly reiterated to me during my visit on Monday.

Like you and like the members of this committee, I am very worried about the damage that sequestration is already doing to the Department and to our national security. Most of the members of the civilian workforce that I met with on Monday had just had their first furlough day the Friday before, which I think is a harsh reminder of Congress' inability to find a solution here. We actually have 19,000 civilians working for DOD that are on furlough in North Carolina.

Please know that I remain dedicated to finding a balanced bipartisan solution to sequestration, and what I really worry about are those in Washington who underestimate the damage that sequestration will have if this is allowed to continue in fiscal year 2014 and beyond. I think it is important that Congress and the people hear directly from senior leaders like yourself about the impact that this is going to have if it is allowed to continue.

Can you just give a few examples of the impact that it might have on the F–35B and other modernization programs, as well as on the local communities that support them?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, let me give you a very brief, generalized answer. The Vice Chairman sits on most of the meetings where the tradeoffs are made in things like modernization.

But the point is that, as I said, it is too far and too fast. At the beginning of this period, we will suffer most prominently in readiness and in modernization. We have to take money where we can get it. Later on, as the force shrinks, we will be more ready but we will be less modernized than we think we need to be, and in my view we will have forces inadequate to achieve the strategy as currently conceived and we will have to look back at how we might change our strategy.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Specifically on the F–35, our first priority right now is to finish the development of that program, and we requested some money in the reprogramming authority to get that done in fiscal year 2013 to keep the sustainable technology development effort on track.

Because of the importance of this program, we are doing everything we can to protect the numbers as the Department finalizes the lots 6 and 7 prices, and I do not want to stray outside of my authority. This is really in the Under Secretary of Defense for AT&L lane. But we are committed to this program, and we really want to ramp up production as soon as we can to get the economies of scale that we need in order to make this a productive program. The F–35 is a very important program to us. There is no question about it.

Senator HAGAN. It is also my understanding on sequestration that the DOD civilian supervisors, they received notice just recently that if they have knowledge that the employees that report to them work more than the allotted hours during their furloughs, even when it is voluntary on their part, that those supervisors, these civilian supervisors, are subject to fines up to $5,000 and potential jail time. When I realized that there are legal guidelines, I know, that have to be followed. We certainly do not want to have furloughed employees to have to involuntarily work without pay, but to me this seems to go too far. I am troubled that these supervisors could face these unbelievable penalties because they have motivated workers who really are dedicated to the national security of our country despite the furloughs, and we cannot fault them when they want to continue their mission, once again, because Congress has not acted.

What are your thoughts on this matter? How does one find the right balance here?

Admiral WINNEFELD. First of all, Senator, I would make a shoutout to our civilian employees in the Department who are fantastic. These are people who under ordinary conditions work extra hours because they believe so much in what they are doing, and they are just tremendous.

I am not a lawyer and I do not have the legal background in this. I believe that the restrictions you are referring to when you are furloughed are legal restrictions, and I think we are just trying to stay within the letter of the law.

But I could not agree with you more on the overall principle and the sentiment that these are American patriots who want to do the best they can for their country. We are cutting out a day's pay and they still want to do work for us. I mean, what more can you ask for from these great folks?

So the sooner we can resolve this, the better. I know the Department is working hard, if we can, to reduce the number of furlough days this year. There are no guarantees. The comptroller is working on that. But it is a real tragic situation for these great Americans.

Senator HAGAN. Even these legal ramifications, they are not supposed to even look at the BlackBerries on the days of furlough.

The previous two quadrennial defense reviews have mandated significant growth in our Special Operations Forces (SOF) and enablers that directly support their operations. Admiral Winnefeld, in response to the committee's prehearing policy questions, you said given the financial downturn that we face, we must balance the need for soft capabilities with our need to address other capability demands in light of increased budgetary pressures.

Do you believe that previously directed growth in the size of SOF should be retained despite the current budgetary pressures, and how should special operations capabilities be prioritized compared to the other capability demands that you referenced?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I have to be quite honest in telling you that if we get into the full BCA caps, the full sequester, what we call "sequester forever" in the Department, that we are probably going to have to level off SOF growth because there are so many other programs that are going to be shrinking in size. It is sort of the philosophy if you are level, then you are doing pretty well in this budget environment. If you are growing, it is really unusual. The only thing I know of that will grow will be the cyber forces, and everything else is going to be coming down in size. I think keeping it in perspective that leveling off SOF is probably about as good as we can do if we get to the full BCA cuts.

Senator HAGAN. Even with the demands that we see around the world today?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Even with the demands. Our SOFs are fantastic. They are doing very important work around the world, no question. We have a considerable amount of SOF forces in Afghanistan doing counterinsurgency. That will end at the end of 2014. We were hoping to take that capacity and bring it home and do a couple of important things with it. One is to rest the force a little bit. These folks have been going very hard for the last decade. Another would be to enhance our building partnership capacity efforts across the world. We certainly want to rest the force. We may have to trim back a little bit on the building partnership capacity just because of the budget cuts. Again, you are pretty lucky if you are only leveling off under these circumstances.

Senator HAGAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Hagan.

Senator Shaheen?

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Dempsey and Admiral Winnefeld, thank you both very much for your service to this country and for your willingness to continue to serve under what are very difficult times.

General Dempsey, I very much appreciate your coming to New Hampshire and your visiting both Pease and our National Guard and the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard and meeting with a number of the businesses in New Hampshire that help make up part of the great defense industrial base we have in this country.

Many people on the committee have expressed their concerns about sequestration. I know it is something that you both care very much about. One of the things that we heard from the businesses in the meeting that you had in New Hampshire was their concern about the uncertainty and what that means in terms of their future ability to provide the support that our military needs in order to do their job.

I wonder if you could speak to whether this is something you are hearing from other parts of the country and then how concerned you are that continuing cuts from sequestration might have a very damaging impact on the defense industrial base in this country.

General DEMPSEY. Thank you, Senator.

What I found most interesting in that roundtable were two things. The big corporations—I will not name names, but the big corporations have enough flexibility that they can kind of weather the storm and are likely to still be there when we need them. It is the small businesses who do not have that kind of flexibility who I think we risk losing in two ways. One is I suspect they will look—well, they said it. They are going to look increasingly overseas. The second thing they said was that their ability to innovate is being reduced. So we are losing in several ways that I think could have a long-term negative effect.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you.

The other thing you have both talked about is the importance of the people who serve this country, both who serve actively in the Armed Forces, as well as those people who support your mission in the civilian capacity. One of the concerns that I have had is relative to the workers that we have who have the degrees in the science, technology, engineering, and math fields.

Looking at the statistics for the people we will need to do the work of our military and its support in the future, the statistics do not look very good because the average age of an aerospace worker in the industry is 44. Also, 26 percent of the aerospace workforce became eligible for retirement in 2008. Meanwhile, 50 percent of the Navy's science and technology professionals will be retirement eligible by 2020. Those statistics go on.

Can either of you speak to concerns that you have about how sequestration might be affecting our ability to recruit the people who have the degrees and the skills that we are going to need in the future? If we are looking at sequestration not just in 2013 but 2014, 2015, 2016, for the next 9 years, what does that do to our civilian workforce that supports your mission?

General DEMPSEY. I will ask the Vice to respond in a moment here. But reflecting back to the trip to the Portsmouth Naval Yard, one of the other things I was unaware of was the apprenticeship program where they take some of the folks with the skill set that you described—30 of them, as I remember, some significant number—from incredible schools in the Northeast notably and they build into them this passion that I saw in the workforce there in support of the U.S. Navy and, in fact, in support of the Coast Guard as well. It is going to be simply a matter of mathematics. They are going to do less of that. I think we will lose some of those.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Fundamentally, the real challenge we have under the worst sequester scenario is the steepness of this cut, and what we have found over time and we understand very well this time around is that it is very hard to get force structure out quickly. Force structure meaning people. We cannot get people out fast enough. What that means is the only other levers you have are readiness and modernization. Readiness and modernization are very technical things. So we will be jettisoning basically a number of modernization programs or vastly trimming them down, and we will be reducing readiness which includes depot work and that sort of stuff which is also technical. I worry about that.

The other thing is that as we get smaller, the tendency under the rules we have is that sort of the last person in is the first person out. That is our seed corn, all these young, technically adept folks that are thinking of coming in or who are already in. If they are first to go, we are going to lose them. Then we are going to have the effects that you talked about where we have a force that stays and retires and there is nothing to backfill them. It really is something we have to watch closely. I know Frank Kendall is worried about it. I know Ash Carter is worried about it. It is something we have to be very mindful of as we move forward.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you. I certainly share that concern.

Let me ask you both. One of the things that Senator McCain and I have worked on is language both in the immigration reform bill that passed the Senate, as well as in the National Defense Authorization Act that this committee has done, would deal with the number of Afghans and Iraqis who have been helpful to the United States and the international force who are concerned about their safety once we get past 2014 and the NATO force withdraws.

I wonder if you could talk about how concerned you are about that and what kind of message it would send to other people in the future who might be willing to cooperate with us in these kinds of conflicts if we are not able to help provide safety for those people who have cooperated.

General DEMPSEY. Having lived with those men and women, I strongly support the effort. But let me turn it over to the Vice who has been tracking it most closely.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Just to give you a sense, actually yesterday we had a deputies committee meeting that I was unable to attend but sent someone on this exact issue, special immigrant visas and the like to get these folks in who have really literally risked their lives to enable our operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. It has the attention of the National Security staff. It has our attention, and we will continue to push it in the right direction.

I would just say if you hear anything that is making you uncomfortable, do not hesitate to talk to us. We will be happy to answer any questions you might have.

Senator SHAHEEN. Thank you. I know that Senator McCain and I stand ready to be of any help we can, and I know it has the support of this committee as well. Thank you very much.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Shaheen.

Senator Sessions?

Senator SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for your leadership of this committee. You lead us in a way that gets most of us to vote together every time we bring a bill out, and I think that is a testament to bipartisanship in the defense of America.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much.

Senator SESSIONS. General Dempsey, particularly I just want to ask you to reaffirm—and I know you will do so—your responsibility to share with this committee and Congress your best military judgment about matters and that you will internally—when asked by the commander in chief to give your opinion, you will give your best, unvarnished military opinion and not be influenced by politics or pressures of any kind.

General DEMPSEY. I can assure you that is what has been my intent and will remain my intent in the future.

Senator SESSIONS. Admiral Winnefeld, would you likewise?

Admiral WINNEFELD. That is what we have been doing and what we continue to do. Yes, sir.

Senator SESSIONS. I thank you. It is really important because we have a lot of significant agenda items that are occurring that will set policy for years to come whether it is the number of personnel, our involvement around the world, whether it is missile defense. In particular, we are beginning to have some hearings on our nuclear capabilities. The public proposal of the President that he would like to reduce by one-third our already substantially reduced nuclear arsenal raises a serious concern to me. We will be asking you as time goes by your best judgment on that. Of course, it goes beyond the technical issues to our role in the world and the confidence our allies have in us also.

General Dempsey, one of the more amazing things to me that I believe has caused a great deal of unnecessary problems with the sequester and the reduction in spending was the fact that this was passed in August 2011, and the President said in a national debate it was not going to happen but it was the law of the United States. He signed it. I frankly at the time wondered how it was going to be fixed. I had my doubts that we would get it fixed. The President has indicated basically he wants more taxes and more spending and he will not find any other reductions in spending anywhere else to relieve the burdens on the military.

But I would just like to get one thing straight with regard to the difficulties you have faced this year. My understanding is that you made no plans and made no cuts in the first 6 months of this year even though you were aware that this was the law in 2011, and as a result, you have had to make more dramatic cuts, more unwise reductions to try to finish this year within the budget law that you have been told you have to finish under. Has that been a problem for you and why did we not plan to reduce spending all year instead of making up all of that in the last 6 months?

General DEMPSEY. It has been a problem, Senator. We found ourselves with 80 percent spent with half the year to go. The answer as to how did we get to that position that was the budget guidance we received.

Senator SESSIONS. You got that from the executive branch?

General DEMPSEY. I get my marching orders from the Department, but I assume they got it from the Office of Management and Budget.

Senator SESSIONS. I do remain concerned about the impact on the Defense Department. It is not just that I have, as a member of this committee and personal views, a strong affinity for the men and women who serve us in uniform, but because half of the reductions in spending that were included in the BCA have fallen on one-sixth of the U.S. Government spending, the Defense Department. This is a disproportionate reduction in spending in my opinion to our Defense Department, and it is at a level that is troubling to me.

I am ranking on the Budget Committee and I have seen the numbers. We should look for other areas within our Government to find some savings too. For example, Medicaid has no cuts. Social Security has no cuts. Medicare had a little but it did not help the Defense Department. That was used to reduce spending reductions in other departments. Food stamps has gone up four-fold in the last 10 or 12 years, had zero cuts. We are just at a point that we have to figure out how to deal with this. I do believe you are being asked to take a disproportionate cut, and Congress should work with the President, the Commander in Chief, and he needs to help us work through a way to spread out some of this belt tightening so that other departments and agencies in the Government tighten their belt too.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much. Thank you for your comments as well about me, Senator Sessions.

Now, is Senator King here? If not, Senator Kaine? Senator Nelson?

Senator NELSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, thank you for your public service.

Let us talk first about upgrading the intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaisance (ISR) fleet. You are moving from manned platforms to a combination of unmanned and manned platforms. The law directs the Vice Chairman and the Under Secretary to certify annually that the Navy remains in compliance in supporting the needs of the combatant commanders, and the Navy has certified compliance. My interest in this is that in the President's budget, the Navy plans to gradually draw down your manned platforms before going over to the P–8 platform and then to field a fleet of MQ–4C Tritons, the unmanned aerial vehicles.

Now, it is my understanding that the Secretary of the Navy is supportive of this position. Have you all spoken to the combatant commanders to confirm if these ISR capabilities fulfill their requirements?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I have not recently covered that particular slice of the combatant commander requirements. They are going to have their integrated priority lists due to us here over this fall, and we will scan those. We also get constant feedback from their J–8 organizations, but I would have to take it up for the record on whether specifically in that area we are answering their needs.

Senator NELSON. Okay. I would appreciate it. I think that there is some concern in the Secretary's Office about this transition, and to see that those manned platforms are utilized so that there is not a gap while we are transitioning over and getting the combined fleet between unmanned and manned.

[The information referred to follows:]

Combatant commanders' requests for intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaisance (ISR) always exceed our capacity to provide. However, regarding capability, the combatant commanders contributed to the Navy's MISR&T Transition Plan through the Battlespace Awareness Joint Capabilities Board. The combatant commanders understand and support how we are optimizing the Navy's "high-demand, low-density" ISR capability.

Yes, Dr. Vickers and I, along with Joint Staff and representatives from the combatant commands, carefully reviewed Navy's current ISR capabilities and proposed way ahead. We have certified Navy's plan each of the past 2 years. Such review is critical because, while the EP–3E ARIES and P–3 Special Projects Aircraft (SPA) have been workhorses for the Navy and Joint Force for decades, they're fast approaching end-of-service life (approximately 2020).

To mitigate short-term risk, the Navy is sustaining the capabilities of both the EP–3E and P–3 SPA aircraft while fielding the baseline Triton UAV with its greatly improved persistence. They are also adding a Quick Reaction Capability, which provides certain "SPA-like" capabilities, to the P–8A aircraft. Proper phasing of manpower is critical to ensure transition of capability and capacity to follow-on platforms, without impacting combatant commanders.

The Navy's plan, as part of a joint effort, invests in the right platform/sensor mix and is in the best interests of the Joint force, particularly in our current budgetary environment. However, additional requirements, particularly those in the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2014 draft language requiring the sustainment of five EP–3Es for allocation, that limit the Navy's ability to execute this plan may draw resources that impede fielding of the appropriate future force. Dr. Vickers and I will continue to monitor Navy's progress closely.

Senator NELSON. Now, once we are withdrawing from Afghanistan, there is going to be a lot of ISR assets that will come back and be distributed throughout the combatant commands. I sure wish that you all would take a look at what sequestration is doing to us in U.S. Southern Command and the huge success that they have had interdiction of drugs coming north. As a matter of fact, just in the last year, Colombia itself interdicted 207 metric tons. As it started to come through Central America toward the U.S. border, the Joint Interagency Task Force-South, which is the joint task force going after these drugs—that interdicted 152 additional metric tons. By the time it gets to the southern border of the United States, then they were interdicting another 10 metric tons. You can see that the big part has already been interdicted before it ever got there, thanks to a lot of U.S. Southern Command's efforts in the joint task force. I would surely appreciate it, as these ISR assets are going to be available, that you will consider Southern Command as a part to use those ISR assets. I know you will.

But would you just for the record state what are going to be the long-term effects of the sequester on the counternarcotics mission?

General DEMPSEY. In general, I will tell you that we will be able to do less in the maritime transit zones for the immediate future because of some combination of sequestration and also maintenance that has been deferred over time. I am concerned about it. In fact, I met over the past several months with both my Canadian and my Mexican counterparts to see if we can collaboratively find a way to mitigate the risk.

Admiral WINNEFELD. We have just had to make some very difficult choices in the current environment with readiness declining and the Navy unable to support as many ship deployments as they would like to, as you well know. We have had some considerable success, as you point out, with interdicting drugs coming from Central and South America in the maritime environment and other environments. We are going to have to allocate resources. As the Chairman mentioned, it is about balancing ends, ways, and means, and we will just have to keep our eye on it. Absolutely.

Senator NELSON. I will tell you where you are going to be additionally stressed is if we are fortunate to get an immigration reform bill and if it stays in the present posture that it passed the Senate where all this additional money is being used to enhance the effectiveness of the land border, what is going to happen to all those drugs and, indeed, human smuggling it is going to go right around on the maritime border.

Now, I think this was an oversight. They would not accept Senator Wicker's and my amendment to enhance by just $1 billion, DHS, the Coast Guard, and helping DHS with unmanned platforms.

The Navy blimp is also an asset that can be used on that. I have ridden in that blimp. It can dwell for a long time. The amount of gas that it takes for a 24-hour mission is the same amount of gas that it takes for an F–16 to crank up and just run out to the runway. It is a cost-effective platform for observation of something like a maritime border.

Hopefully, if we can pass the immigration reform, we are going to be able to enhance that maritime border. But this is going to all the more bring into question the desperate need to avoid sequester in a place like Southern Command, not even to speak of all the other commands. I spent some time with Admiral McRaven, and he walked me through what is going to happen to Special Operations Command if we have this sequester continue. It is absolutely ridiculous that we would be doing this to ourselves not only shooting ourselves in the foot but starting to shoot ourselves up the torso.

I wish you would take a look at the ISR assets as they come back and allocate some of them to Southern Command. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Nelson.

We are going to have a very brief second round of about 2 minutes for those of us who are here. We have a vote. I cannot see that clock, but it is getting close to 12:15 p.m. Is it there already? Anyway, I think we have a vote at 12:15 p.m. I am going to have a 2-minute second round.

General, I want to find a way to work through the options issue on Syria not in 2 minutes but I want to work through it because I think there is a real uncertainty among some of us as to what your role is in terms of telling us your personal opinion on things, what your role is in terms of giving advice to the President, in terms of the options that you have laid out, the pluses, minuses, strengths, weaknesses of each of those options, whether they could be effective, what are the costs, what are the opportunity costs, and so forth.

What I am going to ask you to do for the record is to give us an unclassified list of options and your personal assessment of the pros and cons of those options. Now, in some of those pros and cons and your personal assessment, it will be pretty obvious that you are not going to recommend something. But I am not going to ask you point blank which of these options you recommend. You have said you are not going to tell us. You cannot tell us or you have not decided. For whatever reason, you are not going to tell us what your preferred option is, but what you are willing to do is go through with us the pluses and minuses of each of the various options. That is what I am going to ask you to do in a fairly thorough way for the record.

If you need to give us a classified annex, that is fine. But I want to work very hard to try to work through this issue of the options in Syria.

Now, you are aware of the fact that I personally have favored arming and training the opposition. I personally, indeed, want to consider and I have even gone beyond that talking about stand-off airstrikes against certain facilities. That is just my own personal opinion so you know where I am coming from. You and I have talked about it. I am not trying to persuade you that that is the right position or should be your position, but that is my public position.

My question to you is whether or not you are willing to give to us an unclassified list of options and the strengths and weaknesses, the costs and effectiveness and so forth of each of those options.

General DEMPSEY. Absolutely, Senator, as well as the framework of a strategy in which they might make sense, which I am happy to do.

Chairman LEVIN. Anything else you want to add to it. I do not want to limit you in any way. As long as it includes that, it may help us work through this issue.

General DEMPSEY. Yes, but I would ask you take my point even now that the decision whether to use force is one that I must communicate personally to the President. As you have seen me do in the past, if the President takes my advice and you ask me, I will tell you that he took my advice. If he does not, I am more than willing to tell you no. My recommendation was something else. He is certainly under no obligation to take my advice.

Chairman LEVIN. You have indicated that you are not going to share with us your opinion, if you have one, on whether or not to use force.

General DEMPSEY. While it is being deliberated.

Chairman LEVIN. While it is being deliberated. I am not asking you to do that. I think if you just are able to do what I have asked you to do, it may be clear that at least some of those options you think are not wise options just from your pros and cons assessment.

General DEMPSEY. Right. I thought we got at it at some level in the classified briefing.

Chairman LEVIN. But we need an unclassified answer. You said you are willing to lay out options and to show pros and cons of options and whether they can be effective, what are the costs, various costs, and so forth. If you will do that, it may be a step that would be a constructive, positive step. If you can do that within the next 4 or 5 days, we would appreciate it.

General DEMPSEY. Sure.

[The information referred to follows:]

See attached letter.

CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20318-9999

JUL 19 2013

The Honorable Carl Levin
Chairman
Committee on Armed Services
United States Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

On 18 July 2013, you asked me to provide an unclassified assessment of options for the potential use of U.S. military force in the Syrian conflict. It offers my independent judgment with as much openness as this classification allows. I am mindful that deliberations are ongoing within our government over the further role of the United States in this complex sectarian war. The decision over whether to introduce military force is a political one that our Nation entrusts to its civilian leaders. I also understand that you deserve my best military advice on how military force could be used in order to decide whether it should be used.

At this time, the military's role is limited to helping deliver humanitarian assistance, providing security assistance to Syria's neighbors, and providing nonlethal assistance to the opposition. Patriot batteries are deployed to Turkey and Jordan for their defense against missile attack. An operational headquarters and additional capabilities, including F-16s, are positioned to defend Jordan. We are also prepared for the options described below:

Train, Advise, and Assist the Opposition. This option uses nonlethal forces to train and advise the opposition on tasks ranging from weapons employment to tactical planning. We could also offer assistance in the form of intelligence and logistics. The scale could range from several hundred to several thousand troops with the costs varying accordingly, but estimated at $500 million per year initially. The option requires safe areas outside Syria as well as support from our regional partners. Over time, the impact would be the improvement in opposition capabilities. Risks include extremists gaining access to additional capabilities, retaliatory cross-border attacks, and insider attacks or inadvertent association with war crimes due to vetting difficulties.

Conduct Limited Stand-off Strikes. This option uses lethal force to strike targets that enable the regime to conduct military operations, proliferate advanced weapons, and defend itself. Potential targets include high-value regime air defense, air, ground, missile, and naval forces as well as the supporting military facilities and command nodes. Stand-off air and missile systems could be used to strike hundreds of targets at a tempo of our choosing. Force requirements would include hundreds of aircraft, ships, submarines, and other enablers. Depending on duration, the costs would be in the billions. Over time, the impact would be the significant degradation of regime capabilities and an increase in regime desertions. There is a risk that the regime could withstand limited strikes by dispersing its assets. Retaliatory attacks are also possible, and there is a probability for collateral damage impacting civilians and foreigners inside the country.

Establish a No-Fly Zone. This option uses lethal force to prevent the regime from using its military aircraft to bomb and resupply. It would extend air superiority over Syria by neutralizing the regime's advanced, defense integrated air defense system. It would also shoot down adversary aircraft and strike airfields, aircraft on the ground, and supporting infrastructure. We would require hundreds of ground and sea-based aircraft, intelligence and electronic warfare support, and enablers for refueling and communications. Estimated costs are $500 million initially, averaging as much as a billion dollars per month over the course of a year. Impacts would likely include the near total elimination of the regime's ability to bomb opposition strongholds and sustain its forces by air. Risks include the loss of U.S. aircraft, which would require us to insert personnel recovery forces. It may also fail to reduce the violence or shift the momentum because the regime relies overwhelmingly on surface fires—mortars, artillery, and missiles.

Establish Buffer Zones. This option uses lethal and nonlethal force to protect specific geographic areas, most likely across the borders with Turkey or Jordan. The opposition could use these zones to organize and train. They could also serve as safe areas for the distribution of humanitarian assistance. Lethal force would be required to defend the zones against air, missile, and ground attacks. This would necessitate the establishment of a limited no-fly zone, with its associated resource requirements. Thousands of U.S. ground forces would be needed, even if positioned outside Syria, to support those physically defending the zones. A limited no-fly zone coupled with U.S. ground forces would push the costs over one billion dollars per month. Over time, the impact would be an improvement in opposition capabilities. Human suffering could also be reduced, and some pressure could be lifted off Jordan and Turkey. Risks are similar to the no-fly zone with the added problem of regime surface fires into the zones, killing more refugees due to their concentration. The zones could also become operational bases for extremists.

Control Chemical Weapons. This option uses lethal force to prevent the use or proliferation of chemical weapons. We do this by destroying portions of Syria's massive stockpile, interdicting its movement and delivery, or by seizing and securing program components. At a minimum, this option would call for a no-fly zone as well as air and missile strikes involving hundreds of aircraft, ships, submarines, and other enablers. Thousands of special operations forces and other ground forces would be needed to assault and secure critical sites. Costs could also average well over one billion dollars per month. The impact would be the control of some, but not all chemical weapons. It would also help prevent their further proliferation into the hands of extremist groups. Our inability to fully control Syria's storage and delivery systems could allow extremists to gain better access. Risks are similar to the no-fly zone with the added risk of U.S. boots on the ground.

Too often, these options are considered in isolation. It would be better if they were assessed and discussed in the context of an overall whole-of-government strategy for achieving our policy objectives in coordination with our allies and partners. To this end, I have supported a regional approach that would isolate the conflict to prevent regional destabilization and weapons proliferation. At the same time, we should help develop a moderate opposition—including their military capabilities—while maintaining pressure on the Assad regime.

All of these options would likely further the narrow military objective of helping the opposition and placing more pressure on the regime. We have learned from the past 10 years; however, that it is not enough to simply alter the balance of military power without careful consideration of what is necessary in order to preserve a functioning state. We must anticipate and be prepared for the unintended consequences of our action. Should the regime's institutions collapse in the absence of a viable opposition, we could inadvertently empower extremists or unleash the very chemical weapons we seek to control.

I know that the decision to use force is not one that any of us takes lightly. It is no less than an act of war. As we weigh our options, we should be able to conclude with some confidence that the use of force will move us toward the intended outcome. We must also understand risk—not just to our forces, but to our other global responsibilities. This is especially critical as we lose readiness due to budget cuts and fiscal uncertainty. Some options may not be feasible in time or cost without compromising our security elsewhere. Once we take action, we should be prepared for what comes next. Deeper involvement is hard to avoid. We should also act in accordance with the law, and to the extent possible, in concert with our allies and partners to share the burden and solidify the outcome.

Thank you for this opportunity to share my assessment. The classified versions of all the options described here have been presented to the National Security Staff for consideration by the Principals and the President. They have also been presented to the Congress in several briefs, including one recently provided by the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Sincerely,

MARTIN E. DEMPSEY
General, U.S. Army

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Ayotte, I believe. No. I may be wrong.

Senator AYOTTE. I am next but I am going to defer first to Senator Graham and then go.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay. Senator Graham?

Senator GRAHAM. Thank you.

Chairman Dempsey, back to Afghanistan. If no troops were left behind for whatever reason in 2015, we just pulled out and there were no American forces left behind, the zero option, very quickly what is the likely outcome in Afghanistan?

General DEMPSEY. Although I have told you that the progress of the security forces has been significant, they would not have the level of confidence to sustain themselves over time if it happens that precipitously.

Senator GRAHAM. It would lead to what I believe would be a fractured state, a larger safe haven for al Qaeda types, and over time would be a disaster. Do you agree with that?

General DEMPSEY. Those are all high risks.

Senator GRAHAM. Okay, thank you.

Admiral Winnefeld, sequestration. In terms of the Air Force, if sequestration—let us start with the Navy. Over a 10-year period, how many ships will we have in the Navy after 10 years of sequestration?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I do not have the exact number for you.

Senator GRAHAM. Somebody says 232 ships.

Admiral WINNEFELD. It could be that low.

Senator GRAHAM. Would that be just like crazy?

Admiral WINNEFELD. It would certainly impact our ability to respond to contingencies and to have forward presence and deter——

Senator GRAHAM. Well, I think it is crazy.

One-third of the fighter force is grounded today. They are beginning to fly again because you have robbed Peter to pay Paul. But has the effect of sequestration grounded one-third of our fighter force?

Admiral WINNEFELD. It has grounded nine fighter squadrons, which is not one-third of the fighter force, but there are other squadrons that are flying at a rate lower.

Senator GRAHAM. What would it take for the enemy to knock out nine Air Force squadrons?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I know where you are coming from and it would be a heck of a lot.

Senator GRAHAM. If I were the Iranians, I would send a thank you note to Congress for grounding more Air Force planes than they could on their own. To say I am upset about this is an understatement.

Finally, what if, General Dempsey, Congress could not find a way to reach a deal on funding the Government? Come October 1, we just cannot fund the Government and the politicians in Washington cannot come up with a budget and we had no money for our military. What signal would that be sending to our troops and to our enemies? What kind of national security impact would it be in the times in which we live if there was no agreement to fund the Government? What would it mean to our national security?

General DEMPSEY. You remember, Senator, I held up this slide showing that these kids that we send into harm's way trust us. I would have to assess that bond of trust would be broken.

Senator GRAHAM. As to our enemies, how would they take this?

General DEMPSEY. I think they would be certainly happy at our demise.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Graham.

Senator Ayotte?

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Admiral Winnefeld, when you look at the security of this country, what would you prioritize first?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would prioritize first the survival of the Nation.

Senator AYOTTE. Would that mean protecting the Homeland?

Admiral WINNEFELD. It would definitely.

Senator AYOTTE. I know that earlier you were asked about our missile defense system, and you said that the first dollar we should spend is on the sensor to add discrimination power. Correct?

Admiral WINNEFELD. That is correct.

Senator AYOTTE. I guess I am kind of dumbfounded by it because, as I understand it, that was not in the budget proposal put forth by the Department. Why was that if it was the number one?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I would have to review the budget documents to validate that. But one thing to remember is we have a new commander of the Missile Defense Agency, a new director there. He is doing an exceptionally good job. Vice Admiral Syring. He, along with his technical experts, have studied this and they have come to the conclusion that you can get better shot doctrine if you get better discrimination. He would hasten to add that if the threat gets worse, we are going to need more missiles as well, which is one of the reasons why——

Senator AYOTTE. Okay. Let me follow that, you had said in your testimony that you have to watch the threat develop from Iran. In fact, in the recent interview that Prime Minister Netanyahu gave, he said that Iran is building intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBM) to reach the American mainland within a few years. Of course, that is consistent with what we have heard if 2015 is a potential date when Iran will have ICBM capability or could have to reach the mainland of the United States. Is that right?

Admiral WINNEFELD. It is an intelligence assessment. It shifts all the time, but 2015 is the current number when they could potentially have a capability.

Senator AYOTTE. 2015 is the number. I guess I am a little dumbfounded why we keep saying that there is no current military requirement for an east coast missile defense site when the priority of our Nation is to protect the Homeland. As I understand it, if we went, in terms of an EIS, to production of an east coast missile defense site, it would take about 6 years, would it not?

Admiral WINNEFELD. I do not know that it would take that long. I would have to get the exact numbers for you. But I think that when the EISs are done, closely on the heels of that we would have another threat assessment that is continually going on. We would have to come to a decision fairly soon, I think, after that as to whether we would do an east coast missile field to start with.

[The information referred to follows:]

After the completion of the Environmental Impact Statement and selection of a site, it will take approximately 5 years—2 years for planning and design, and 3 years for construction. Location (e.g. construction seasons, geology, et cetera) and budget programming (i.e. military construction) will affect the schedule.

Senator AYOTTE. When I look at the possibility of 2015 ICBM capability, I think the tail is wagging the dog in terms of how long it would take to put that up. I know you said first dollar. What if you had the second dollar of missile defense? What would you do with it?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The first thing we want to do is get the CE–2 missiles working and get them into the silos in Alaska to get the additional missiles we have talked about. That is going to take some time in and of itself to get that done.

The first dollar, as I mentioned, is the sensors so that we have this "quality has a quantity all its own" phenomenon where we have to shoot fewer missiles at the inbound threats. If we can accomplish that, that will really help us.

Then assuming if the threat continues on a trajectory where Iran develops an ICBM, we may well need an east coast missile field in order to defend this country.

Senator AYOTTE. I think what you are saying today is the second dollar.

By the way, we could do both at once if we wanted to in terms of protecting the Homeland, could we not?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Physically we could, but in terms of—— Senator AYOTTE. If we allocated the resources for you to do it.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Right. The question is is that the wisest use of the resources. It competes with everything else, but as you pointed out at the very beginning of this discussion, the highest priority is the defense of the Nation.

Senator AYOTTE. Thank you both for being here. I appreciate your service to the country.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Ayotte.

Thank you both. We are hopeful that we will have a speedy markup and confirmation, but that will be up to the whole committee. That would be my hope. Thank you. We thank your spouses, your wives who are here, your families again for their great support over the years.

We will stand adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 12:25 p.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to GEN Martin E. Dempsey, USA, by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. On previous occasions you have answered the committee's policy questions on the reforms brought about by the Goldwater-Nichols Act, the last time being in connection with your first nomination to be Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Has your view of the importance, implementation, and practice of these reforms changed since you testified before the committee at your last confirmation hearing?

Answer. No. I continue to believe that the Goldwater-Nichols Act as passed is effective, and I credit this legislation for making us the Joint Force we are today. However, if confirmed, I will continue to examine the lessons of the past 10 years of war to determine if there are opportunities to make us an even more effective Joint Force.

Question. In light of your experience as Chairman, do you see any need for modifications to Goldwater-Nichols? If so, what modifications do you believe would be appropriate?

Answer. I do not believe modifications to the Goldwater-Nichols Act are required at this time. Today's Joint Force reflects the commitment to integration and jointness across the Military Services established by Goldwater-Nichols in 1986. If confirmed, I will continue to examine the lessons of the past 10 years of war to determine if there are needed legislative modifications or other opportunities to improve jointness.

DUTIES

Question. Based on your experience as Chairman, what recommendations, if any, do you have for changes in the duties and functions set forth in section 152 through section 155 of title 10, U.S.C., and in regulations of the Department of Defense (DOD), that pertain to the Chairman and the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the organization and operation of the Joint Staff in general?

Answer. If confirmed, I do not presently foresee recommending any changes to the law. I will, however, be attuned to potential issues and opportunities for improvement that might suggest consideration for eventual changes in the law.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Other sections of law and traditional practice establish important relationships between the Chairman and other officials. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the following officials:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff must have a close working relationship with the Secretary of Defense. Under title 10, the Chairman is assigned several duties that guide the relationship to include serving as the principal military advisor to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of Defense. The Chairman also performs other duties assigned by the Secretary of Defense.

Question. The National Security Advisor.

Answer. The National Security Advisor is a special assistant and direct advisor to the President. As the role of the Chairman is to serve as the principal military advisor to the President, National Security Council, Homeland Security Council, and Secretary of Defense, if reconfirmed, I will continue to work closely with the National Security Advisor to ensure our efforts are synchronized across the interagency and for the purpose of implementing Presidential decisions.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Under existing directives, the Deputy Secretary of Defense has been delegated full power and authority to act for the Secretary of Defense on any matters upon which the Secretary is authorized to act. As such, the relationship of the Chairman with the Deputy Secretary is similar to that with the Secretary.

Question. The Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C., and current DOD directives establish the Under Secretaries of Defense as the principal staff assistants and advisers to the Secretary regarding matters related to their functional areas. Within their areas, Under Secretaries exercise policy and oversight functions. These instructions and directives are applicable to all DOD components. In carrying out their responsibilities, and when directed by the President and Secretary of Defense, communications from the Under Secretaries to commanders of the unified and specified commands are transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. The General Counsel of the Department of Defense.

Answer. Under title 10, U.S.C., section 140, the DOD General Counsel serves as the chief legal officer of DOD. In general, the DOD General Counsel is responsible for overseeing legal services, establishing policy, and overseeing the DOD Standards of Conduct Program, establishing policy and positions on specific legal issues and advising on significant international law issues raised in major military operations, the DOD Law of War Program, and legality of weapons reviews. The office of the DOD General Counsel works closely with the Office of Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and communications with the combatant commanders by the DOD General Counsel are normally transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. The Department of Defense Inspector General.

Answer. The DOD Inspector General performs the duties, has the responsibilities, and exercises the powers specified in the Inspector General Act of 1978. If confirmed, I will continue to cooperate with and provide support to the DOD Inspector General as required.

Question. The Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff performs the duties prescribed for him as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and such other duties as may be prescribed by the Chairman, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense. When there is a vacancy in the Office of the Chairman or in the absence or disability of the Chairman, the Vice Chairman acts as Chairman and performs the duties of the Chairman until a successor is appointed or the absence or disability ceases.

Question. The Secretaries of the Military Departments.

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C., section 165 provides that, subject to the authority, direction and control of the Secretary of Defense, and subject to the authority of the combatant commanders, the Secretaries of Military Departments are responsible for administration and support of forces that are assigned to unified and specified commands. The Chairman advises the Secretary of Defense on the extent to which program recommendations and budget proposals of the Military Departments conform to priorities in strategic plans and with the priorities established for requirements of the combatant commands.

Question. The Chiefs of Staff of the Services.

Answer. Because of the Goldwater-Nichols Act, the Service Chiefs are no longer involved in the operational chain of command. However, this does not diminish their importance with respect to title 10 responsibilities. Among other things, they serve two significant roles. First, they are responsible for the organization, training, and equipping of their respective Services. Without the full support and cooperation of the Service Chiefs, no combatant commander can assure the preparedness of his assigned forces for missions directed by the Secretary of Defense and the President. Second, as members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chiefs are advisers to the Chairman and the Secretary of Defense as the senior uniformed leaders of their respective Services. In this function, they play a critically important role in shaping military advice and developing our joint capabilities. If reconfirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Service Chiefs to fulfill warfighting and operational requirements.

Question. The combatant commanders.

Answer. The combatant commanders fight our wars and conduct military operations around the world. By law, and to the extent directed by the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman serves as spokesman for the combatant commanders and is charged with overseeing their activities. He provides a vital link between the combatant commanders and other elements of DOD, and as directed by the President, may serve as the means of communication between the combatant commanders and the President or Secretary of Defense. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the combatant commanders to enable their warfighting capability and to provide support.

Question. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

Answer. The Chief of the National Guard heads a joint activity of DOD and is the senior uniformed National Guard officer responsible for formulating, developing and coordinating all policies, programs, and plans affecting more than half a million Army and Air National Guard personnel. Appointed by the President, he serves as principal adviser to the Secretary of Defense through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on National Guard matters. He is also the principal adviser to the Secretary and Chief of Staff of the Army and the Secretary and Chief of Staff of the Air Force on all National Guard issues. As National Guard Bureau Chief, he serves as the department's official channel of communication with the Governors and Adjutants General. As a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau has the specific responsibility of addressing matters involving non-Federalized National Guard forces in support of homeland defense and civil support missions.

Question. The Commander, U.S. Forces-Afghanistan.

Answer. Although the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff is the principal military advisor to the President, the Secretary of Defense, and the National Security Council, he is not in the chain of command of the Commander, U.S. Forces-Afghanistan (USFOR–A). The Commander, USFOR–A reports to the Commander, U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM), who, in turn, reports directly to the Secretary of Defense. This reporting relationship is prescribed in title 10, U.S.C., section 164(d)(1). The Commander, USFOR–A does not have a formal command relationship with the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but he coordinates with him through the Commander, CENTCOM on a regular basis. The Commander, USFOR–A sends his advice and opinions on military operations to the Commander, CENTCOM, who, in turn, presents them to the Chairman.

MAJOR CHALLENGES

Question. What do you consider to be the most significant challenges you have faced in your first term as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Answer. We are experiencing a period of unprecedented uncertainty and multiple transitions that daily test our ability to meet our obligations, both in the security environment and across the Joint Force. We face a difficult fiscal correction to restore the economic foundation of our power. At the same time, we are transitioning from a decade of war to a contingency footing in response to an uncertain and dangerous security landscape. Importantly, we are transitioning a generation of veterans, as many in the Joint Force return to the homefront and their communities. Across the force, the issues of sexual assault, veteran suicide, traumatic brain injury/mental health are among our most challenging. In the security environment, continued operations and transition in Afghanistan, the crisis in Syria, and deterring global provocation are among the most complex national security priorities we have faced. The Nation is far from being immune from coercion in cyberspace. This said, I continue to believe that we have it within us to lead through this critical and defining period, and remain a strong global leader and reliable ally.

Question. What new challenges do you expect to face if you are confirmed for a second term?

Answer. We face a series of tough choices moving forward, given our fiscal reality and the increasingly unpredictable security environment. These will include, but are certainly not limited to, conducting a responsible transition in Afghanistan, responding to the dynamic and persistent threat from violent extremist organizations, deterring increasingly bold provocation from North Korea and Iran, and detecting and defeating cyber and other asymmetric attacks against the homeland. We are less ready today than we were 1 year ago, and our readiness continues to degrade. If current trends continue, our military power will become less sustainable, and therefore less credible. In this context, my challenge is to continue to provide our civilian leadership with realistic options and risk assessments that balance current obligations, future contingencies, and the reality of declining resources. Internally, I will face the challenge of restoring the versatility of the Joint Force at an affordable cost. I will need to lead the effort to renew commitment to our profession by making sure we value character as much as competence.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. We can only address these challenges together—jointly, across the interagency, and in partnership with Congress. If confirmed, I will work to strengthen the relationships—and specifically the bonds of trust—that have allowed us to make important progress in my first term. This trust permeates all levels. Our men and women on the front lines must trust that they will be the best trained, led, and equipped force on the battlefield. Our military families must trust that we will keep faith at home. The Services and combatant commands must trust their views will be fairly and accurately represented within internal JCS deliberations and at all levels of policy debate. Our allies and partners must trust in our sustained global leadership. The President, this Congress, and the American people must trust that their military will meet its sacred obligation to keep our Nation immune from coercion.

PRIORITIES

Question. Recognizing that challenges, anticipated and unforeseen, will drive your priorities to a substantial degree, if confirmed, what other priorities, beyond those associated with the major challenges you identified in the section above, would you set for your second term as Chairman?

Answer. If reconfirmed, I will continue to emphasize the focus areas I established in my 2012 Strategic Direction to the Joint Force to achieve our national security objectives today, build the Joint Force for 2020, renew commitment in our profession of arms, and keep faith with our military family. To do this, we will need to get four things right. The first is to achieve strategic solvency—this means establishing security priorities, aligning our aims and abilities, and balancing current and long-term requirements. Second, I will remain focused on keeping the Joint Force ready and balanced. To do so, we must restore readiness lost due to sequester, and ensure that future cuts do not undermine our ability to send our troops to war with the best training, leadership, and equipment. Third, we must prioritize investment in our people. This means valuing and strengthening character as much as competence, reinvesting in learning and leadership, advancing equal and ethical treatment for all of our servicemembers, and allowing no quarter for sexual violence in our ranks. Lastly, I will focus on maintaining the bond of trust between our men and women in uniform and the public they serve.

CHAIN OF COMMAND

Question. Section 162(b) of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the chain of command runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense and from the Secretary of Defense to the combatant commands. Section 163(a) of title 10 further provides that the President may direct communications to combatant commanders be transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and may assign duties to the Chairman to assist the President and the Secretary of Defense in performing their command function.

Do you believe that these provisions facilitate a clear and effective chain of command?

Answer. I believe that the current chain of command provides a clear and effective means for employing our Nation's military.

Question. Are there circumstances in which you believe it is appropriate for U.S. military forces to be under the operational command or control of an authority outside the chain of command established under title 10, U.S.C.?

Answer. Military forces should normally operate under the chain of command established under section 162 of title 10, U.S.C. However, an exception to that chain of command may be appropriate for certain sensitive operations. The military units supporting such an operation are still governed by the laws of armed conflict and, as an administrative matter, the military personnel remain accountable to the military chain of command, including for matters of discipline under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Only the President may approve such an exception, as also recognized in section 162. If confirmed, I will provide the President with my best advice regarding any operation where an exception to the established chain of command may be appropriate.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the authorities and agreements which are in place to allow U.S. military personnel to carry out missions under the authorities contained in title 50, U.S.C.? Do you believe any modifications to these authorities are necessary?

Answer. As noted above, consistent with title 50 of the U.S.C., the President may authorize departments, agencies, or entities of the U.S. Government to participate in or support intelligence activities. While I believe that all military forces should normally operate under a military chain of command, there are authorities and agreements that allow exceptions to this chain of command for title 50 operations. In some cases, the Secretary of Defense may approve this exception and in other cases only the President has approval authority. I believe the current authorities are sufficient to facilitate DOD's providing appropriate support under title 50 while ensuring necessary oversight.

ADVICE OF THE SERVICE CHIEFS, COMBATANT COMMANDERS, AND CHIEF OF THE NATIONAL GUARD BUREAU

Question. Section 163 of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff serves as the spokesman for the combatant commanders, especially on the operational requirements of their commands. Section 151 of title 10 provides for the other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to submit their advice or opinion, in disagreement with or in addition to the advice or opinion of the Chairman, and requires the Chairman to provide that advice at the same time that he presents his own advice to the President, National Security Council, or Secretary of Defense.

Having served as Chairman, what changes to section 151 or section 163, if any, do you think may be necessary to ensure that the views of the individual Service Chiefs, combatant commanders, Chief of the National Guard Bureau are presented and considered?

Answer. I see no benefit in changing section 151 or section 163. Section 151 and section 163 embody the spirit and letter of Goldwater-Nichols, a foundation of our Joint Force. I have made it a priority to hear from and be representative of the views of the combatant commanders and the JCS. I use their insights and collective experience to inform my best military advice. I recognize my responsibility and the value in my representing the views of the JCS and our senior commanders, even when they may vary.

SECURITY STRATEGIES AND GUIDANCE

Question. How would you characterize current trends in the range and diversity of threats we face today to national security?

Answer. The security environment is more uncertain and dangerous. It can be characterized as complex due to an increasing number of strategically significant actors, dynamic due to rapid rates of change, and uncertain due to shifting nodes of power and influence and an unclear U.S. fiscal and budget environment. Further, the proliferation of advanced technologies is resulting in middleweight militaries and non-state actors with unprecedented destructive and disruptive capabilities, particularly in the areas of cyber, terrorism, and missiles.

Question. In your view, is the Nation's defense strategy appropriate for the threats we face today and could face in the coming decades?

Answer. The strategy as articulated in the January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance, Sustaining U.S. Global Leadership: Priorities for 21st Century Defense, is necessary and appropriate to safeguard the Nation against threats to its interests. However I am increasingly concerned about our ability to properly resource the strategy and maintain the readiness of the Joint Force due to continued fiscal uncertainty and constraints. I have documented the specific concerns in my classified Chairman's Risk Assessment submitted in February, 2013.

Question. The Defense Strategic Guidance issued January 2012 took into account a $487 billion reduction in defense resources.

With the additional $500 billion in cuts to DOD as a result of sequestration is the Defense Strategic Guidance still valid?

Answer. The Department is still in the process of determining what revisions might be necessary to align ends, ways, and means given the additional $500 billion in cuts. The sequester was not expected or desired. The answer will depend a great deal on how the cuts are taken year by year (slope), the flexibility granted to the Department by Congress, and Congress' willingness to give the Department more scope for politically unpopular changes to infrastructure, benefits, and compensation.

Question. At the issuance of the Defense Strategic Guidance you said, "We will always provide a range of options for our Nation . . . ."

What options do you lose or what options are significantly altered and in what way if the $500 billion in cuts is enacted?

Answer. We will continue to provide a range of options. But, they may not be as robust or timely as they might have been, and they will entail a higher level of risk to the Nation and to the forces committed. In essence, we will be able to do fewer things simultaneously, and new contingencies may force us to take risk in other regions or for other security threats. The full implications of reduced option are unlikely to be appreciated until an unexpected contingency or strategic surprise occurs.

Question. What changes, if any, should be considered?

Answer. The recent Strategic Choices and Management Review affirmed the fundamental soundness of the Defense Strategic Guidance. However, it makes clear that we need to further prioritize missions within the context of a continued rebalance to the Asia-Pacific region. It also indicated that we are at risk of strategy insolvency if sequestration is implemented as currently prescribed by law. That is, there is a point at which a steep drawdown makes it difficult for us to meet the current and expected demands being placed on our military.

Question. In your view, is our broad defense strategy and current establishment optimally structured, with the roles and missions of the military departments appropriately distributed, and U.S. forces properly armed, trained, and equipped to meet security challenges the Nation faces today and into the next decade?

Answer. These are broad, overarching issues that the Department traditionally examines through its Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR). The recent Strategic Choices Management Review did, however, provide insight to changes that will need to be made in terms of capability and capacity to meet future security challenges. As a consequence of fiscal constraints, we are already losing readiness that will cost us more to restore. Therefore, I am concerned that our Joint Force will be increasingly less ready for future challenges unless we get budget certainty and flexibility.

Question. In March you said, "Recognizing longer-term uncertainty, I've also begun to reassess what our military strategy should be, as well as institutional reforms necessary to remain an effective fighting force." On the topic of Strategic Choices and Management Review, Secretary Hagel said, "There will be no rollout of any grand plan on this."

Will there be any changes in strategy to account for sequestration?

Answer. The Department is still in the process of determining what revisions might be necessary to align ends, ways, and means given the additional $500 billion in cuts. I concur with what the Secretary has stated. We still have considerable work ahead of us to determine the extent to which we have to change the Defense Strategic Guidance. That said, the Strategic Choices and Management Review indicated that the rebalance to the Asia-Pacific remains sound, but that we may need to further prioritize missions.

Question. Do you feel that we have passed or are approaching the line where military strategy is driven by resources rather than being based on objectives and threats?

Answer. Strategy is always informed by the resources available. To best protect the Nation, we must achieve the best possible balance of ends, ways, and means while assessing and mitigating risk. I am concerned that sequester in its current form prevents us from being able to achieve proper balance, pushing us closer to the line where our military strategy is out of balance with the resources needed to achieve it. If so, our military strategy will take some additional risk in achieving objectives, in the ways we achieve results, and in the way we apply resources. It is too early to determine if we will achieve the right balance or if we have crossed the line—but we will watch this carefully.

Question. What will the indicators be if we cross that line?

Answer. Unready forces, misaligned global posture, inability to keep pace with emerging threats, reduced security cooperation, and failure to maintain a high quality All-Volunteer Force are all becoming increasingly likely the longer sequestration in its current form persists. I am especially concerned about the All-Volunteer Force. We presently have the most seasoned, professional force in history. Budget reductions, inflexibility, and uncertainty will increasingly subject them to lower readiness, less education and fewer training events.

Question. If confirmed, what changes, if any, would you propose to the structure, roles, and missions of the defense establishment?

Answer. The upcoming QDR will enable us to look at these issues in a deliberate way. I will provide my best advice to the Secretary during the review and inform Congress as to my recommendations at the earliest opportunity. The lack of certainty in the budget environment makes it more difficult to make hard decisions about structures, roles, and missions, and more difficult to understand the impacts of those decisions.

STRATEGIC RISK

Question. Do you believe that the current and planned pace and scope of operations in Afghanistan in conjunction with current and planned end-strength and force structure reductions create increased levels of strategic risk for the United States based on the current or potential future lack of available trained and ready forces for other contingencies?

Answer. The answer depends somewhat on the President's decision on post-2014 presence in Afghanistan and on whether sequestration takes effect as current prescribed by law. Generally, end-strength and force structure reductions could entail greater military risk to any mission, during execution of future contingencies, as force reductions occur.

Question. If so, how would you characterize the increase in strategic risk in terms of the military's ability to mobilize, prepare, deploy, and employ a force for a new contingency? In your view, is this level of risk acceptable?

Answer. In an unclassified forum, I am reluctant to get into specifics on military risk. In general, a smaller Joint Force would become more reliant on rapid Reserve mobilization and on maintaining high readiness levels for its Active Forces. Implementing sequestration as currently prescribed by law will make it impossible to maintain the levels of readiness we have today for current contingencies, much less to make the investments needed to employ the force for more difficult future contingencies. The concerns expressed in the 32-star letter to the committee last year about the impacts of sequestration on readiness still stand. If anything, I am more worried today.

Question. What is the impact of the decision to decrease U.S. forces committed to Afghanistan on our ability to meet our security obligations in other parts of the world?

Answer. As we draw down the forces in Afghanistan, we intend to reset the force as well as provide for a greater range of options for contingencies in other parts of the world. This approach will become increasingly untenable if sequestration as currently prescribed by law persists.

Question. How and over what periods of time, if at all, will reductions to Army and Marine Corps end strength increase or aggravate this risk?

Answer. Reductions to land force end strength will increase risk based on our decreased ability to deter conflicts and to shape conditions overseas through Army and Marine security cooperation activities. Reduced end strength means that we will be able to "turn" the force less frequently, and under certain circumstances we may have to extend forces beyond the optimum and sustainable boots-on-the-ground dwell ratio.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the Army's recent announcement to inactivate 13 of its 45 brigade combat teams by the end of 2017?

Answer. First, it's important to note that these inactivations have nothing to do with sequestration. The inactivation of the 13 brigade combat teams will reduce that part of the force that the Army actually increased over the last 10 years to fight our wars. With the planned drawdown of these forces, and the conclusion of two long-term stability operations, we can manage our strategy with the reductions the Army has planned.

Question. If confirmed, what additional actions would you take, if any, to reduce or mitigate this strategic risk?

Answer. Military strategies consist of ends, ways, means, and risk. "Ends" are goals or objectives, "ways" describe how we intend to meet those objectives, and "means" are the resources available. If we cannot accept more risk, and the "means" are reduced, then we can only reduce our "ends", or change the "ways". Possible examples of changes to "ways" include adjusting our operational plans or global posture, modifying our operational concepts, reducing the scope and nature of the missions we take on, requesting new authorities, shifting the burden onto current alliances or undertaking new security cooperation mechanisms with current or new partners. Possible examples of changes to "ends" include lengthening the time it takes to resolve various contingencies and changing expectations about the speed with which we commit forces or the number of casualties we are prepared to accept. We could also reduce the scope of objectives in a particular region or contingency, or change the priorities of objectives and contingencies worldwide. The depth, breadth, inflexibility, and uncertainty of the budget reductions currently associated with sequestration will make any of these changes both more necessary and more difficult.

Question. Upon issuance of the January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance, you said "We do accept some risks in this strategy as all strategies must."

With the benefit of hindsight, what is your assessment of the areas where we assume the greatest strategic risk under the current Defense Strategic Guidance due to cuts of $487 billion?

Answer. The recently completed Strategic Choices Management Review outlined the magnitude of the challenges we could face and the difficulty of the decisions involved. But we have yet to make those choices or complete the staff level assessments for a fulsome answer. It did, however, indicate that the rebalance to the Asia-Pacific remains fundamentally sound. More directly, my sense is that the Nation will have a military that is increasingly unready, steadily losing technology overmatch to possible challengers, that is smaller but similar in terms of platforms and capabilities, and that will have an eroded global presence and posture. It is a military that will be viewed with increasing concern by our longtime allies and with increasing satisfaction by our potential adversaries. It is a military that will offer our civilian leaders fewer options and higher opportunity costs when they decide to employ military force. I will provide additional specifics in my next classified Chairman's Risk Assessment related to impacts of sequestration. But the present year-to-year magnitude of the $487 billion cut cannot be found within our existing budget without taking unprecedented action. Many of these actions that are simultaneously prevented by other laws, particularly with respect to excess infrastructure, compensation and pay, and procurement, as well as changing the balance between Guard/Reserve/Active Forces, adjusting the scope and scale of ground force reduction and allowing the retirement of unnecessary platforms. This is only a partial list.

Question. What are the additional risks associated with cutting an additional $500 billion under sequestration?

Answer. Please see previous answers, which outline the additional risks of fewer options and gaps in or security due to a force that will be out of balance and less ready than it should be.

CHAIRMAN'S RISK ASSESSMENT

Question. In your 2013 risk assessment, you identified for the first time six National Security Interests that were derived from four enduring interests contained in the 2010 National Security Strategy.

Please describe your rationale for assessing risk against these new interests that have not been incorporated into an updated national security strategy?

Answer. The four enduring interests in the National Security Strategy provided guidance for the entire U.S. Government, including the diplomatic, information, and economic instruments of power. The six national security interests derive from these and are focused explicitly on the military contribution to the four enduring interests. I have found this construct to be useful tool when articulating specific risks and prioritizing our military missions. They help us think through the options for using force and when/where to take risk and expend resources.

Question. Your April 2013 assessment identified several areas of broad and significant risk to national security as a result of current budget issues.

How would you characterize the trends of risk in these areas (whether they are increasing or decreasing)?

Answer. In an unclassified forum I am reluctant to go into much detail. Generally, those strategic risk trends have not changed since March.

As I have mentioned elsewhere, I see increasing strategic risk associated with sequestration as currently prescribed by law.

I will make note of any changes in my next risk assessment.

Question. What is your current assessment of the risk to combatant commanders in their ability to successfully execute their operational plans?

Answer. In my latest Chairman's Risk Assessment (CRA), I identified and characterized the ability of combatant commanders to successfully execute their operational plans and their ongoing missions. The CRA also included the combatant commanders' assessments of their most pressing challenges. In an unclassified forum I am reluctant to go into detail, however, I will say that all military operations entail risk, but we are committed to providing the President a range of options given any threat to U.S. interests.

TRANSFORMATION

Question. Military "transformation" has been a broad objective of the Armed Forces since the end of the Cold War.

In your view, what does military "transformation" mean?

Answer. Military transformation is really about adapting the Joint Force to meet future security needs. We must be able to adapt to rapid changes in technology, the global security environment, and our adversaries' capabilities. Uncertainty is the only thing certain today. We must be flexible in order to deter and defeat threats at every point along the spectrum of conflict, from asymmetric threats to a near-peer competitor. If confirmed, I will maintain the development of Joint Force 2020 as a focus area of my chairmanship, in order to ensure that our Nation's security is never uncertain.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the progress made by the Department, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Joint Staff, toward transforming the Armed Forces?

Answer. My 2012 Strategic Direction to the Joint Force identifies the development of Joint Force 2020 as one of the four focus areas of my chairmanship, and we've made progress in the past 2 years. We're working to advance interdependence, integrate new and specialized capabilities, promote versatility, and preserve readiness by valuing quality over quantity. For example, we've introduced the Joint Operational Access Concept to synchronize our efforts across all five domains—land, air, sea, space, and cyberspace. This concept provides a framework to ensure the Joint Force remains survivable and successful despite growth of anti-access and area-denial threats. We're also moving forward with the Joint Information Environment, implementing innovative industry-supported efficiencies across the Department to further enhance mission effectiveness and cyber security. Ultimately, my aim is a versatile, responsive, decisive, and affordable Joint Force. If reconfirmed, I look forward to working with you to achieve this.

Question. If confirmed, what goals, if any, would you establish during your next term as Chairman regarding military transformation in the future?

Answer. If confirmed, I will maintain as a priority the development of a superior Joint Force in 2020. Transformation during this period of fiscal constraint poses challenges for us, but also opportunities. We will be selective in the capabilities we reconstitute as we draw down in Afghanistan, and ensure that lessons learned over a decade of war are retained. We may get smaller, but we can be increasingly versatile and interdependent. We will be regionally postured, but globally networked. We will integrate new capabilities and leverage cutting-edge technologies that will provide a decisive advantage as we adapt to new ways of war. The economic situation demands that the future force be affordable, but keeping our military the best led, trained, and equipped force in the world is a non-negotiable imperative.

Question. Do you believe the Joint Staff should play a larger role in transformation? If so, in what ways?

Answer. The Joint Staff is contributing significantly to the transformation of the Joint Force in a closely coordinated effort with the Services and combatant commands. The Joint Staff's current focus is on concept, strategy, and doctrine development, and establishing joint requirements to address gaps in capability. I believe this is the correct role.

MILITARY CAPABILITIES IN SUPPORT OF DEFENSE STRATEGY

Question. The 2010 report of the QDR provided that military forces shall be sized to prevail in ongoing conflicts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and the war against al Qaeda as well as for conducting foundational activities that prevent and deter attacks or the emergence of other threats. The QDR report particularly emphasizes the requirement for improved capabilities in key mission areas such as counterinsurgency, stability, and counterterrorism operations, as well as building the security capacity of partner states. In contrast, the Defense Strategic Guidance of January 2012 asserts that the United States will no longer size its forces for long duration stability operations.

Understanding that the Department is currently embarked on a Strategic Choices and Management Review that is intended to inform the 2014 QDR, what is your understanding and assessment of the current ability of each Service to provide capabilities to support these mission requirements and, if confirmed, what changes, if any, would you pursue to improve these capabilities?

Answer. The Services are currently able to provide forces to support the missions identified within the Defense Strategic Guidance. Resource constraints, however, are eroding readiness and extending the timeline by which forces can be made available to fulfill combatant commanders' requests and respond to emerging requirements. We are reexamining the plans and scenarios that drive the size and capabilities of our force to ensure they are informed by the realities of our fiscal and operating environment. We will continue to closely manage the way we use our forces as they conduct day-to-day operations. Further, new fiscal guidance will ensure that the Department invests in those capabilities most needed to defend the Nation against likely future mission requirements.

Question. In your opinion, can the 2014 QDR be conducted without an updated National Security Strategy, which is required by law to be submitted annually?

Answer. Existing guidance is sufficient to inform my statutory requirement to contribute to the QDR. The enduring interests articulated in the 2010 National Security Strategy as well as the six national security interests outlined in the Chairman's Risk Assessment provide a consistent framework within which to conduct the next QDR. If national priorities shift in any future NSS, we will adapt our strategic documents and processes such as the QDR.

Question. Are you committed to meet the statutory date for delivery of a 2014 QDR to Congress?

Answer. Yes, in accordance with title 10, U.S.C., section 118, we plan to meet the statutory date to deliver a 2014 QDR to Congress.

FUTURE ARMY

Question. The Defense Strategic Guidance (DSG) of January 2012 articulated the need to shift strategic emphasis toward the Asia-Pacific region while continuing to engage in the Middle East.

Do you agree that future high-end military operations, as envisioned by the DSG, will primarily be naval and air engagements such that the Army will have difficulty justifying the size, structure, and cost of the number and equipment its combat formations?

Answer. America needs a capable and decisive Army. The size and structure of the Army will continue to adapt to the evolving security environment. Our most recent experience with war suggests that we cannot predict where or when we will be asked to fight. A global superpower needs to retain sufficient capability, capability, and readiness to win across all domains. As Chairman, my focus is on ensuring that the Joint Force as a whole is capable of executing decisive operations in support of our national interests, regardless of geography or the theater of operations.

Question. In your view, what are the most important considerations or criteria for aligning the Army's size, structure, and cost with strategy and resources?

Answer. Our Nation needs an Army that can conduct full spectrum operations as part of the Joint Force. It must be appropriately sized, structured, and equipped to in order to defend the Nation and defeat our adversaries. The Defense Strategic Guidance deemphasized long duration stability operations and reinforced the importance of defeating and denying the objectives of an adversary. The Army is realigning and resizing consistent with this guidance.

Question. If confirmed, what actions, if any, would you propose to properly align the Army's size and structure with the requirements of security strategies and the likely availability of resources?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support the ongoing realignment and restructuring of BCTs. These measures enhance the ability of the Joint Force to provide a full range of options to the President that meets diverse threats in an uncertain environment.

SEQUESTRATION

Question. Sequestration requires defense cuts totaling $37 billion over the last half of the current fiscal year.

What is your assessment of how the Department is managing these cuts in the current fiscal year?

Answer. The cuts required by sequestration in fiscal year 2013 are a self-inflicted wound to our national security. We have lost readiness that will take time and money to restore. We are out of balance due to the magnitude, mechanism, and pace of budget cuts. While the Department is shifting funds where possible to minimize the impact on warfighting capabilities and critical military readiness, sequestration to date has resulted in cuts to training, exercises, and deployments, civilian furloughs and hiring freeze, reduced base maintenance, disruption to modernization, and morale challenges. We are leading through these cuts by doing all we can to protect funding to our deployed forces, our nuclear enterprise, and our warrior and family support programs.

Question. What are your views on the impact these cuts are having on readiness?

Answer. We have lost readiness that will take time and money to restore. The impact of sequestration and other budget constraints are beginning to emerge in unit level readiness reports. The effects caused by the cancellation of large force exercises and deferred maintenance are harder to measure, but will also impose significant strain on long-term institutional readiness. The combined effect of reduced training cycles, deferred maintenance, and the pace of current operations is damaging to both readiness and morale. If current trends continue, recovery from several months of sequestration will take years. Eventually, our readiness problem will become a recruitment and retention problem.

Question. The fiscal year 2014 budget request and the fiscal year 2014 budget resolutions passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives all assume that sequestration will be avoided in fiscal year 2014. It appears possible that sequestration will not be avoided in fiscal year 2014 and DOD will have to cut $52 billion from its budget request. You have been involved in developing the most workable approach to meeting the $52 billion savings requirement established by the Budget Control Act.

What is your assessment of the Department's proposals for managing the additional $52 billion in cuts in fiscal year 2014?

Answer. The abrupt, deep cuts caused by the Budget Control Act caps in fiscal year 2014 will force DOD to make non-strategic choices. If sequester continues, the Department will have to make sharp cuts with far reaching consequences, including limiting combat power, reducing readiness, and undermining the national security interests of the United States. To limit adverse consequences, we need the certainty of a predictable funding stream, time to balance force structure, modernization, compensation, and readiness, and the flexibility to make trade-offs. The Secretary directed a Strategic Choices and Management Review to develop options that would accommodate these large cuts, but none of these options fully avoid an increase in risk to our national security.

Question. What are your views on the impact these cuts will have on readiness?

Answer. While DOD would attempt to protect the operation and maintenance funding most closely related to training and readiness, full protection will be impossible. Therefore, military training and readiness would remain at the currently degraded levels or, in some cases, would continue to decline in a sequester-level cut of $52 billion in fiscal year 2014. Ultimately, ongoing cuts will threaten our obligation to send only the best trained, led and equipped forces into harm's way.

Question. What are your views on the impact these cuts will have to military capabilities?

Answer. Given the difficulty of cutting fiscal year 2014 military personnel funding, DOD would be forced to disproportionately reduce funding for operations and maintenance; procurement; research, development, test, and evaluation; and military construction. Funding for hundreds of program line items, large and small, will be significantly reduced. We will buy fewer ships, planes, ground vehicles, satellites, and other weapons systems. Cuts in funding for research and development will ultimately slow discovery and advancement, eroding the technological superiority enjoyed by U.S. forces and translating into less desirable military outcomes in future conflicts.

READINESS FUNDING

Question. Given the reductions in readiness funding, what is your assessment of the current readiness of the Armed Forces to meet national security requirements across the full spectrum of military operations?

Answer. Despite a decade of strenuous demands on the force, we remain sufficiently ready to conduct current operations. The Joint Force faced the simultaneous challenge of reconstituting the force and focusing on a broad spectrum of operations prior to sequestration. Now, we must prioritize the readiness of our deployed and next to deploy forces at the expense of reconstituting the majority of the nondeployed force. This approach is unsustainable and cannibalizes longer-term reconstitution. Simply put, sequester hinders our ability to generate forces for contingency operations. If nothing changes, most operational units will have readiness deficiencies by fiscal year 2014. This lost readiness will cost more and take longer to recover.

Question. What is your assessment of the near-term trend in the readiness of the Armed Forces?

Answer. We have curtailed operations, maintenance, and training across the force because of sequestration cuts. Specific actions by Service include:

- Army—80 percent of ground forces training will be curtailed for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. Units will train to just squad-level proficiency. Half of all third- and fourth-quarter depot maintenance has been cancelled.
- Air Force—12 Active Duty combat aviation squadrons stood down.
- Navy—Ship deployments have been reduced. Steaming days and training opportunities for nondeployed ships as well as flying hours for nondeployed air wings have also been reduced, resulting in at least one air wing being at minimum safety levels by the end of fiscal year 2013.
- Marine Corps—Efforts remain focused on meeting near-term commitments for deployed and next-to-deploy forces. We are concerned about the availability of amphibious ships.

We are beginning to see the effect of these actions in unit level readiness reports and expect that trend to continue as time reveals the full impacts of sequestration. We are prioritizing the readiness of our deployed and next to deploy forces, but the decreased readiness of the nondeployed force and damage to production and training pipelines make this unsustainable.

Question. Given the impact of sequestration, do you support the additional sourcing of base defense funds to pay for unforeseen requirements in support of overseas contingency operations?

Answer. While under sequestration, I would support a source of funding in the base budget to pay for emergent contingency operations. We will inevitably face new contingencies as operations wind down in Afghanistan and associated funding for overseas contingency operations decreases. Without such relief in this or in the form of a supplemental, the Services will mortgage readiness to absorb the costs of these operations.

Question. How critical is it to find a solution to sequestration given the impacts we have already seen to DOD readiness in fiscal year 2013?

Answer. It is critical. I am deeply concerned about the loss of readiness across the Department. Lost readiness take longer and costs more to recover. It foreclosed options and compounds risk. We are repeating the mistakes of past drawdowns. The impact of sequestration and other budget constraints are beginning to emerge in unit level readiness reports. The longer term effects caused by the cancellation of large force exercises and deferred maintenance are harder to measure, but will impose significant strain on long-term institutional readiness.

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the methods currently used for estimating the funding needed for the maintenance of military equipment?

Answer. Requirements drive equipment maintenance based on factors that include force structure, operations tempo, schedule, nature and use of the equipment, and safety. The Services' detailed maintenance plans balance operational availability with maintenance requirements. Perturbations in the budget process and funding uncertainties have effects across the maintenance plan for months and even years.

Question. Given the backlog in equipment maintenance over the last several years, do you believe that we need an increased investment to reduce this backlog?

Answer. The Services have successfully managed their equipment maintenance backlogs in recent years. But funding shortfalls from successive Continuing Resolutions and sequestration in fiscal year 2013 have culminated in more depot maintenance deferrals across all Services. If sequestration continues, this backlog will grow, causing reduced availability rates, less reliable systems, and platforms not reaching their intended service life. We need budget certainty and flexibility to best equip the Services to achieve force readiness over time.

Question. How important is it to reduce the materiel maintenance backlog in order to improve readiness?

Answer. Very. Force readiness includes materiel. The remedy for the accumulating maintenance backlog is the same as the remedy for force readiness—time and money.

Question. How important is it to receive Overseas Contingency Operations (OCO) funding 2 or 3 years after the end of combat operations in order to ensure all equipment is reset?

Answer. Very important. OCO has been a necessary funding source to conduct ongoing operations and reset equipment to prepare for future operations. Equipment consumed in Iraq and Afghanistan remains relevant to unit readiness. OCO beyond the end of combat operations will help restore the readiness required to support the National Security Strategy. Lack of OCO for reset will delay the Services' ability to meet readiness requirements in the out years.

Question. In years past, we have based additional readiness funding decisions on the Service Chief unfunded priorities lists. However, in recent years those lists have either been nonexistent or have arrived too late in our markup process.

Do you agree to provide unfunded priorities lists to Congress in a timely manner beginning with the fiscal year 2015 budget request?

Answer. The provision of unfunded requirements lists to Congress is a longstanding practice. Given the budget uncertainty, it is difficult to project whether and when we might submit requirements for 2015. Should the Services have such requirements, the existing statutory framework provides the opportunity for the Joint Chiefs to make recommendations that are responsive to Congress after first informing the Secretary of Defense.

DEFENSE ACQUISITION REFORM

Question. Congress enacted the Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 (WSARA), without a dissenting vote in either House. WSARA is designed to ensure that new defense acquisition programs start on a sound footing, to avoid the high cost of fixing problems late in the acquisition process.

Having now served as the Chairman, what are your views regarding WSARA and the need for improvements in the Defense acquisition process?

Answer. The Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 has been instrumental in ensuring new defense programs start on a sound footing to avoid the high cost of fixing problems late in the acquisition process. It also jump-started a culture within the Department focused on the continuous improvement of our acquisition processes and their associated outcomes, which I strongly endorse.

Question. If confirmed, how would you improve all three aspects of the acquisition process (requirements, acquisition, and budgeting)?

Answer. There is an ongoing effort within the Department to continuously improve all aspects of the acquisition process. As recently as January of 2012 a new revision of the Joint Capabilities Integration and Development System (JCIDS) was published, and we are currently working with the Office of Secretary of Defense to revise DOD 5000.02, "Operation of the Defense Acquisition System." DOD 5000.02 will incorporate the initiatives outlined in Dr. Carter's 2010 "Better Buying Power: Guidance for Obtaining Greater Efficiency and Productivity in Defense Spending (BPP 1.0)" memo and Mr. Frank Kendall's 2012 initiative entitled "Better Buying Power 2.0: Continuing the Pursuit for Greater Efficiency and Productively in Defense Spending", all of which I strongly support, along with the improvements instituted in the new JCIDS instruction and manual.

Question. Do you believe that the current investment budget for major systems is affordable given increasing historic cost growth in major systems, costs of current operations, and asset recapitalization?

Answer. I am concerned that costs in acquisition and procurement will continue their historic growth profiles, further exacerbating shortfalls under a sequestered budget. We will continue to scrub our processes, including our warfighter requirements, to ensure they are aligned with strategy and available resources. But, it will likely be necessary to reduce some investments for major systems under full sequestration.

Question. If confirmed, how do you plan to address this issue and guard against the potential impact of weapon systems cost growth?

Answer. I will continue to partner with the Office of the Secretary of Defense to improve our inter-related processes, and work closely with our combatant commanders and our title 10 Service providers to mitigate cost growth impacts of and on our highest priority capability investments. I will be an advocate for major systems that provide versatility at an affordable and sustainable cost.

Question. If confirmed, what actions would you propose, if any, to ensure that requirements are realistic and prioritized?

Answer. The improvements put into place in the latest revision of the JCIDS process have been very effective. The Joint Requirements Oversight Council (JROC) is now more focused on weapon system cost, schedule, and performance, and uses greater analytical rigor to reach recommendations. The JCIDS process and the associated responsibilities of the JROC, Services, and the JROC advisors in support of the JCIDS process will continue to be refined throughout my tenure as Chairman.

CONTRACTORS ON THE BATTLEFIELD

Question. According to widely published reports, the number of U.S. contractor employees in Afghanistan often exceeds the number of U.S. military deployed in there. This was also the case during the operations in Iraq.

Do you believe that DOD has become too dependent on contractor support for military operations?

Answer. They have been part of our military force since the Revolutionary War. Contractors function in various roles and are a force multiplier. They provide rapid expansion of manpower when needed to fill critical gaps. The use of local contractors can be an important element of military objectives. With that in mind, I think we need to continuously evaluate the costs and necessity of contractors to make sure contractor support is properly structured for a period of fiscal correction.

Question. What risks do you see in the Department's reliance on such contractor support? What steps do you believe the Department should take to mitigate such risk?

Answer. We are in the process of analyzing lessons learned from Iraq and Afghanistan and updating doctrine to ensure that we can properly target capabilities that are optimum for contracting support. Contracting provides capabilities the military may not have readily available, but it is critical that we maintain effective oversight and introduce better cost controls.

Question. Do you believe the Department is appropriately organized and staffed to effectively manage contractors on the battlefield?

Answer. Yes. However, oversight is critical to ensure contracts are properly executed. We are in much better shape today than we were when the wars began over 10 years ago. We will continue to apply the lessons learned to improve our processes. We have expanded personnel two-fold and have a roadmap to move us to an appropriately staffed and organized contracting capability. I will remain focused on this challenge as we make resource tradeoffs in the sequestration process.

Question. What steps if any do you believe the Department should take to improve its management of contractors on the battlefield?

Answer. The Department will continue to mature the contingency capabilities of our contracting agencies and to provide dedicated unit contracting specialists for oversight. We will continue to adjust doctrine based on lessons learned and maintain our focus on training and education for this critical military capability.

TACTICAL FIGHTER PROGRAMS

Question. Perhaps the largest modernization effort that we will face over the next several years is the F–35 Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) program to modernize our tactical aviation forces with fifth generation tactical aircraft equipped with stealth technology.

Based on current and projected threats, what are your current views on the requirements for and timing of these programs?

Answer. Dominance in the air is essential to the success of our Joint Force. Since 1953, our ground forces have not been attacked from the air by our adversaries. We cannot let any other nation achieve parity with the United States in the ability to control the air. The projected threats from our adversaries include programs to build advanced aircraft that will challenge our current capabilities in the coming years. The F–35, which will replace several older generation aircraft across the Joint Force, will continue to ensure our air dominance well into the future.

Question. What is your current assessment of whether the restructuring of the JSF program that we have seen over the past 2 years will be sufficient to avoid having to make major adjustments in ether cost or schedule in the future?

Answer. The Department is committed to the JSF program and the acquisition adjustments we have made over the past 2 years. But, budget constraints and uncertainty may impact the program. To date, the F–35 has flown more than 3,000 flights totaling more than 5,000 flight hours and is largely tracking to our rebaselined plan. The program's estimate for major milestone events remains aligned to the 2012 acquisition baseline. Flight tests are also progressing close to plan.

BALLISTIC MISSILE DEFENSE

Question. Do you agree that the current Ground-based Midcourse Defense system, with interceptors deployed in Alaska and California, provides defense of the entire United States—including the east coast—against missile threats from both North Korea and Iran, and do you have confidence in that system?

Answer. Yes, I am confident that the Ground-based Midcourse Defense system, supported by other deployed and available ballistic missile defense capabilities, can protect the United States from both a limited North Korean and Iranian long-range ballistic missile attack.

Question. On March 15, 2013, Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel announced a series of initiatives to improve our homeland ballistic missile defense capabilities, including the planned deployment of 14 additional Ground-Based Interceptors (GBIs) in Alaska, to help stay ahead of the long-range missile threat from North Korea and Iran.

Do you support the initiatives announced by Secretary Hagel, and do you believe they will help us stay ahead of the threat from North Korea and Iran?

Answer. Yes, I support the initiatives announced by Secretary Hagel. The collective results of the initiatives will further improve our ability to counter future missile threats being developed by Iran and North Korea.

Question. As indicated in the 2010 Ballistic Missile Defense Review, the administration is pursuing a "fly-before-you-buy" approach to missile defense, and will test systems in an operationally realistic manner to demonstrate they will work as intended before we deploy them. Since a GBI flight test failure with the Capability Enhancement-II kill vehicle in 2010, the Missile Defense Agency has been working to fix the problem and plans to conduct an intercept flight test in the spring of 2014 to demonstrate the fix.

Do you agree with the "fly-before-you-buy" policy, and do you agree with Secretary Hagel that, before we deploy the additional GBIs, we need to test and demonstrate the fix so we demonstrate its capability and have confidence that it will work as intended?

Answer. Yes. I agree with the administration's approach to test systems in an operationally realistic manner. I also agree with the importance of achieving confidence in a capability before it is deployed.

Question. Section 227 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 requires an Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) for possible future homeland missile defense sites in the United States, in case the President determines to proceed with such a deployment in the future. That EIS process is expected to be complete in early 2016.

Do you agree that the EIS process should be completed prior to making any decision relative to possible deployment of an additional homeland missile defense site in the United States, including possibly on the east coast?

Answer. I agree that EISs should be completed to ensure compliance with the National Environmental Policy Act prior to the actual deployment of an additional missile defense site in the United States.

Question. Do you agree with the Director of the Missile Defense Agency and the Commander of the Joint Functional Component Command for Integrated Missile Defense that there is currently "no validated military requirement to deploy an east coast missile defense site"?

Answer. Yes. At this time, there is no validated military requirement to deploy an East Coast Missile Defense Site. However, analysis is underway to determine if such a site will be necessary to defend the Homeland.

Question. Do you agree with their assessment that "investment in Ballistic Missile Defense System discrimination and sensor capabilities would result in more cost-effective near-term improvements to homeland missile defense" than deploying an east coast missile defense site?

Answer. Given current fiscal constraints, investment in Ballistic Missile Defense Systems discrimination and sensor capabilities has the potential to be a cost-effective near-term approach to improving homeland missile defense. Deploying an East Coast missile defense site would likely be a lengthier process.

Question. Do you agree with the following statements regarding a potential East Coast missile defense site:

General Jacoby (Commander, U.S. Northern Command): "A third site, wherever the decision is to build a third site, would give me better weapons access, increased GBI inventory and allow us the battle space to more optimize our defense against future threats from Iran and North Korea."

General Formica (Commander Space and Missile Defense Command): "Certainly, it brings increased capacity and increased capability than we have at Fort Greely."

National Research Council: "A GBI site located in northeastern United States would be much more effective and reliable and would allow considerably more battle space and firing doctrine options.

Answer. Generally yes, but there is no guarantee of an increased GBI inventory or that it would be the most cost-effective option.

Question. Do you agree that Presidents Bush and Obama put in place policies that called for additional missile defense sites in Europe to better defend against threats to the United States from Iran?

Answer. Yes. The intention of additional missile defense sites in Europe is to better defend the United States as well as our treaty allies.

Question. Is this presidentially directed requirement still valid and, if not, what has changed to permit the elimination of this requirement for a third interceptor site?

Answer. Additional analysis remains to determine whether a third site is the optimum and most effective way of fulfilling that requirement.

SPACE

Question. China's test of an anti-satellite weapon in 2007 was a turning point for the United States in its policies and procedure to ensure access to space. As a nation heavily dependent on space assets for both military and economic advantage, protection of space assets became a national priority.

Do you agree that space situational awareness and protection of space assets should be a national security priority?

Answer. Yes. Space situational awareness underpins our ability to operate safely in an increasingly congested space environment. It is vital that the United States protect national space assets to maintain the benefits and advantages that are dependent on our access to space.

Question. In your view should China's continued development of space systems inform U.S. space policy and programs?

Answer. Yes. The U.S. Government ensures its space policy and programs address China's continued development of space systems as well as systems of other spacefaring nations. Our National Security Space Strategy reflects this domain's role in U.S. national security. Access to space underpins our ability to understand emerging threats and challenges, project power globally, conduct operations, support diplomatic efforts, and enable the global economy. The Department engages in cooperative opportunities and leads in the formation of rules and behaviors that benefit all nations. I support the development of U.S. space capabilities which preserve the use of space for the United States and our allies, while promoting the principles of the 2010 National Space Policy.

Question. If confirmed, would you propose any changes to National Security space policy and programs?

Answer. I do not recommend any proposed changes at this time. If confirmed, I would continue implementation of the President's 2010 National Space Policy, the supporting 2011 National Security Space Strategy, and the Department's newly updated Space Policy.

Question. What actions would you take to ensure that the Department continues to have access to radiofrequency spectrum that is necessary to train and to conduct its operations?

Answer. It is important that DOD preserve access to the 1755–1850 MHz band and open access to the 2025–2110 MHz bands. The Joint Force is dependent on tactical systems that operate in the 1755–1850 MHz band to operate and train its forces. DOD equities in this band include Satellite Operations, Air Combat Training Systems, Aeronautical Mobile Telemetry, Small Unmanned Aerial Systems, Electronic Warfare, Joint Tactical Radios System, and Tactical Radio Relay systems. Other agencies are seeking DOD to relinquish operations in this band, particularly the lower 25 MHz (1755–1780 MHz). These agencies also seek to have DOD Compress into the upper 70 MHz of this band (1780–1850 MHz). DOD analysis has determined that previously mentioned tactical systems cannot effectively operate in the compressed band. If compression of this band occurs, DOD would require access in the 2025–2110 MHz band and resources to modify systems to operate within this band. Some of the tactical systems could share spectrum with the commercial wireless industry within the lower 25 MHz without adversely effecting commercial systems, e.g. satellite operations.

STRATEGIC SYSTEMS

Question. Over the next 5 years DOD will begin to replace or begin studies to replace all of the strategic delivery systems. For the next 15 plus years, DOD will also have to sustain the current strategic nuclear enterprise. This will be a very expensive undertaking.

Do you have any concerns about the ability of the Department to afford the costs of nuclear systems modernization while meeting the rest of the DOD commitments?

Answer. The modernization of the strategic delivery systems and sustainment of the strategic nuclear enterprise is important to maintaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent. I support the continued investment in sustainment and modernization as a priority for defense spending. I am, of course, concerned about the impact of sequestration on our ability to meet these requirements. Therefore, I continue to request budget certainty, flexibility, and time to make sure we can modernize and sustain our strategic systems.

Question. If confirmed will you review the modernization and replacement programs to ensure that they are cost effective?

Answer. Yes, I will review both to ensure they are cost effective.

Question. The Department will begin to issue guidance from the recent decision to revise the Nuclear Employment Strategy.

Do you support this change in Strategy?

Answer. Yes, I do support the change in Strategy. Admiral Winnefeld and I participated in senior leader meetings, where we provided our best military advice to both the Secretary of Defense and the President on our nuclear capabilities.

Question. Will you keep Congress fully informed of additional guidance issued in response to this changed strategy?

Answer. I will work closely with the Secretary and the President to keep Congress fully informed as additional guidance is developed and issued with respect to the changes in our strategy.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY

Question. President Obama recently issued new guidance on nuclear weapons employments strategy, consistent with the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review (NPR).

Do you support the President's new nuclear weapons employment guidance, and did you have an opportunity to provide input to the formulation of the new guidance?

Answer. Yes, I support the President's new guidance. Both Admiral Winnefeld and I participated in senior leader meetings, where we provided our best military advice to both the Secretary of Defense and the President.

Question. Do you agree with the President's assessment that the United States can ensure its security, and the security of our allies and partners, and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent while safely pursuing up to a one-third reduction in deployed strategic nuclear weapons below the level established in the New START treaty? Please explain your views.

Answer. We can ensure our security and that of our allies and partners and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent while pursuing further reductions beyond the New START treaty central limits. However, to be very clear on this point, in order to maintain a credible and effective deterrent we must continue to adequately invest in the modernization of our nuclear infrastructure as long as nuclear weapons exist. Also, further reductions in strategic nuclear weapons, beyond the New START Treaty Central Limits, should occur as part of a negotiated position with Russia. Both Admiral Winnefeld and I have made this recommendation to the President and the Secretary of Defense.

Question. Is the current strategic balance between Russia and the United States stable?

Answer. I believe we currently have a stable and strategic balance with Russia, but we must be thoughtful to maintain that balance in such a manner that we never sacrifice our ability to credibly provide extended deterrence and assurance to our allies.

Question. What is the military rationale to pursue an additional one-third reduction in deployed U.S. strategic nuclear weapons?

Answer. Based on the results of the Post-NPR analysis, the Department concluded that we could further reduce the number of deployed U.S. strategic nuclear weapons, while still meeting the objectives of the revised policy guidance and strategy. From the military perspective, further reductions should occur as part of a negotiated position with Russia, and to ensure the credibility of a smaller deterrent force, our nuclear infrastructure modernization plans must be fully funded and supported. In following this approach, I am confident we can maintain a strategic and stable balance with Russia, while maintaining a viable extended deterrent for our allies and partners.

Question. What are the potential risks and benefits of pursuing additional nuclear force reductions?

Answer. I am confident that we can ensure our security and that of our allies and partners, and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent while pursuing further reductions beyond the New START treaty central limits. In order to maintain and effective and credible deterrent, we must continue to adequately invest in the modernization of our nuclear infrastructure as long as nuclear weapons exist. Also, further reductions in strategic nuclear weapons, beyond the New START Treaty Central Limits, should occur as part of a negotiated position with Russia to ensure stability. As we negotiate further reductions with Russia, to include their larger number of non-strategic nuclear weapons, I am encouraged by the initiative to expand the scope of those reductions to include both strategic and nonstrategic nuclear weapons that are both deployed and nondeployed. I believe this is a prudent approach that will maintain strategic stability with Russia.

Question. Do you agree it is necessary to address the disparity between Russia and the United States in tactical nuclear weapons, in a verifiable manner?

Answer. It is important for us to work with Russia to establish cooperative measures that will improve mutual confidence regarding the accurate accounting and security of tactical nuclear weapons. I support efforts to engage Russia in accordance with the Senate's Resolution to Ratification of the New START treaty.

Question. Do you agree that any further nuclear reductions should be done in concert with Russia and that such reductions be part of a formal agreement requiring the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate?

Answer. The Senate's Resolution to Ratification of the New START treaty sets forth principles I agree with. This includes the principle that further arms reduction agreements obligating the United States to reduce or limit the Armed Forces or armaments of the United States in any militarily significant manner may be made only pursuant to the treaty-making power of the President. This power is set forth in Article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States.

Question. Do you agree it is important to address any potential Russian non-compliance with existing nuclear arms control agreements?

Answer. Yes, we should address treaty compliance concerns. Treaty compliance determinations are provided to Congress in the report by the President on Adherence to and Compliance with Arms Control, Nonproliferation, and Disarmament Agreements and Commitments which is submitted pursuant to section 403 of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, as amended (title 22, U.S.C., section 2593a).

DOD'S COOPERATIVE THREAT REDUCTION PROGRAM

Question. The CTR program, which is focused historically on accounting for, securing or eliminating Cold War era weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and materials in the states of the former Soviet Union, has started to expand its focus to other countries. With this expansion the CTR program is widening its focus to biological weapons and capabilities including biological surveillance and early warning; and encouraging development of capabilities to reduce proliferation threats.

Do you think the CTR program is well coordinated among the U.S. Government agencies that engage in threat reduction efforts, e.g., DOD, the Department of Energy, and the State Department?

Answer. Yes. In the past year DOD, the Department of Energy, and the State Department have jointly decided how to use funds from the proliferation prevention program. Cooperation is "built in" because drawing from each Department's fund requires concurrence by the other Department's Secretary. Additionally, many agencies are now working closely together to reduce threats in particular regions. This cooperation extends across the Defense and State Departments Cooperative Threat Reduction programs, State's Nonproliferation Disarmament Fund, and the DOE Proliferation Prevention Program.

Question. The new umbrella agreement with Russia does not include work with the Russian ministry of Defense and recent efforts in the program have moved towards preventing proliferation in the Middle East and North Africa.

Do you support this transition to the Middle East and North?

Answer. I think transition to the Middle East and North Africa makes good sense. It builds the capacity for regional partners to improve WMD threat reduction through proliferation prevention. It increases safety and security of materials of concern, and it helps with border security and consequence management. The transition to these regions complements National Strategic objectives and geographic combatant commander priorities to meet those goals.

Question. What actions will you take to continue a proliferation prevention relationship with Russia?

Answer. If the agreements with Russia are extended, the project to transport and dismantle nuclear weapons would continue for some additional years. This program securely ships strategic and tactical nuclear warheads to dismantlement locations or to more secure storage sites until they can be dismantled. DOD plans to support approximately four secure shipments of legacy nuclear weapons per month and the associated maintenance for railcars and railcar security systems. While DOE projects to secure nuclear materials continue, direct DOD support to our partnership with Russia is critical to U.S. nonproliferation efforts.

Question. About 60 percent of CTR resources are proposed for biological programs.

With the very real threat of chemical weapons use and/or proliferation as we saw in Libya and are seeing in Syria, why is there such a large percentage of resources directed toward biological issues?

Answer. Dedication of 60 percent of CTR to biological programs is a necessary balance in order to deal with a pandemic, accidental release of a pathogen of security concern, or deliberate attack using a biological agent. All of these would have consequences in the United States and well beyond our borders and the obvious health impacts. There is an increasing availability of biological materials, and many countries are developing laboratory capacity to detect highly dangerous pathogens. This rapid expansion of poorly controlled infrastructure could lead to accidental exposure or release of highly contagious pathogens. An additional vulnerability at these laboratories is the inherently dual-use nature of biological activity. Legitimate infrastructure, materials, and expertise, therefore, can easily be manipulated or used for nefarious purposes if the appropriate safety and security measures are not in place. As a major hub of international travel, immigration, and commerce, the United States is directly threatened by this global danger.

PROMPT GLOBAL STRIKE

Question. The 2010 QDR concluded that the United States will continue to experiment with prompt global strike prototypes. There has been no decision to field a prompt global strike capability as the effort is early in the technology and testing phase.

In your view, what is the role for a conventional prompt global strike capability in addressing the key threats to U.S. national security in the near future?

Answer. We are exploring a range of ways to counter the threat posed as our adversaries increase the range and lethality of their weapon systems. There are potential future circumstances that may require a capability to address high value, time sensitive and defended targets from ranges outside the current conventional technology. We will continue to capture these evolving capability needs in our joint requirements process. We will also continue to evaluate ongoing analysis of a Conventional Prompt Global Strike capability in order to provide recommendations on its future development.

Question. What approach (e.g. land-based or sea-based or both) to implementation of this capability would you expect to pursue if confirmed?

Answer. If confirmed, I would expect to pursue a sea-based approach as directed by the Deputy Secretary of Defense in February 2012. I would, of course, remain open to additional analysis or factors that would suggest another approach.

Question. In your view what, if any, improvements in intelligence capabilities would be needed to support a prompt global strike capability?

Answer. Intelligence, Surveillance, and Reconnaissance (ISR) is an enabling capability for a wide range of important Joint Force capabilities to include global strike. A Conventional Prompt Global Strike weapon would likely require an advance persistent surveillance sensor constellation to enable and enhance its operational performance.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND STOCKPILE STEWARDSHIP

Question. Congress established the Stockpile Stewardship Program with the aim of creating the computational capabilities and experimental tools needed to allow for the continued certification of the nuclear weapons stockpile as safe, secure, and reliable without the need for nuclear weapons testing. The Secretaries of Defense and Energy are statutorily required to certify annually to Congress the continued safety, security, and reliability of the nuclear weapons stockpile.

As the stockpile continues to age, what do you view as the greatest challenges, if any, with respect to assuring the safety, security, and reliability of the stockpile?

Answer. To sustain a safe, secure, and effective stockpile today, we must prudently manage our nuclear stockpile and related Life Extension Programs (LEPs). We must also cultivate the nuclear infrastructure, expert workforce, and leadership required to sustain it in the future. If confirmed, I will consider the full range of LEP approaches to include refurbishment of existing warheads, reuse of nuclear components from different warheads, and replacement of nuclear components.

Question. If the technical conclusions and data from the Stockpile Stewardship Program could no longer confidently support the annual certification of the stockpile as safe, secure, and reliable, would you recommend the resumption of underground nuclear testing? What considerations would guide your recommendation in this regard?

Answer. Our current nuclear stockpile is assessed as effective. It is certified and does not require further nuclear testing. However, the stockpile is aging. I understand there are, and will always be, challenges in identifying and remedying the effects of aging on the stockpile. If confirmed, I am committed to working with the Department of Energy to maintain the critical skills, capabilities, and infrastructure needed to ensure the safety, reliability, and security of the stockpile within a constrained budget environment.

Question. Do you agree that the full funding of the President's plan for modernizing the nuclear weapons complex, commonly referred to as the 1251 report, is a critical national security priority?

Answer. I agree that the full funding of the 1043 report, which has replaced the 1251 report, is a critical national security priority. The President's fiscal year 2014 budget request again includes a significant commitment to support the long-term plan for extending the life of the weapons in our enduring stockpile and modernizing the nuclear weapon complex. I am committed to continuing the modernization and sustainment of our nuclear weapons delivery systems, stockpile, and infrastructure.

Question. Prior to completing this modernization effort, do you believe it would be prudent to consider reductions below New START treaty limits in the deployed stockpile of nuclear weapons?

Answer. Modernization efforts must be considered in any deliberations over the size of our deployed stockpile. Further analysis will be necessary to determine the extent to which it would be advisable to make further reductions prior to completing modernization efforts. Factors to be considered in such analysis include U.S. policy objectives as well as the need to maintain strategic stability with Russia and China while assuring our allies and partners.

Question. If confirmed, would you recommend any changes to the nondeployed hedge stockpile of nuclear weapons?

Answer. There may be opportunities to change the nondeployed hedge of nuclear weapons while still effectively managing stockpile risk. This would be considered as we complete life-extension programs that improve safety, security and reliability of the stockpile and as we modernize the infrastructure. I am committed to reducing the size of the stockpile consistent with deterrence objectives and warfighter requirements.

IRAQ

Question. With the withdrawal of all U.S. combat forces from Iraq at the end of 2011, the United States and Iraq began what the President called a new chapter in the bilateral relationship between the two countries. At the same time, the 2008 Strategic Framework Agreement continues to set forth a number of principles of cooperation governing the U.S.-Iraqi relationship. In December 2012, DOD and the Iraqi Ministry of Defense concluded a Memorandum of Understanding for Defense Cooperation.

In your view, what are the main areas of mutual strategic interest in the U.S.-Iraqi relationship?

Answer. We see areas of mutual strategic interest in partnership with a sovereign, stable and democratic Iraq in several areas to include: countering Iran's aggression and pursuit of nuclear weapons capability; mitigating destabilizing effects on the region from violence in Syria; counterterrorism cooperation to reduce al Qaeda in Iraq (AQI) capacity; stable production of petroleum exports; active participation in regional multilateral exercises; and involvement in the Gulf Cooperation Council.

Question. What are the main areas of bilateral defense cooperation between the United States and Iraq?

Answer. The main areas of defense cooperation are through Foreign Military Sales (FMS), Foreign Military Funding (FMF) programs, and International Military Education and Training (IMET). Iraq has begun to participate in regional exercises, highlighted by their recent activity in the International Mine Countermeasure Exercise and Eager Lion Counterterrorism Exercise. Under the U.S.-Iraq Security Framework Agreement—and given the lack of a Status of Forces Agreement—DOD is limited to non-operational training with Iraq. However, our Office of Security Cooperation-Iraq has helped facilitate bilateral training between Iraqi Security Forces and other regional militaries. All other defense training is conducted by contractor personnel through FMS cases.

Question. What is your assessment of the current threat posed by al Qaeda in Iraq?

Answer. AQI continues to pose a significant threat to internal stability in Iraq. Extremist elements responding to the crisis in Syria have bolstered AQI capability and motivation. Sectarian divisions, coupled with a lack of security in the Disputed Internal Boundaries, have allowed AQI to act as a destabilizing influence. The Iraqi Counter Terrorism Service (CTS)—one of the most professional and disciplined units in Iraq—nevertheless lacks the ability to develop actionable intelligence to effectively suppress the threat.

Question. What is your assessment of the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces to respond to the threat posed by al Qaeda and other security challenges?

Answer. Due to current sectarian violence and political discord among the ethnic groups in Iraq, the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) are reaching their operational limits. Additionally, the lack of a coherent border security strategy allows the flow of weapons and personnel to and from Syria. The Office of Security Cooperation in Iraq (OSC–I) is limited to non-operational training. However, Iraq's recent acquisition of intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance equipment will improve the ISF's ability to counter the AQI threat. Meanwhile, Iraq's external defense capabilities are extremely limited based on the focus on internal stability.

Question. What do you see as the principle role or roles of the Office of Security Cooperation within the U.S. Embassy in Iraq?

Answer. The principle role of the Office of Security Cooperation-Iraq (OSC–I), under Chief of Mission authority, is to conduct security assistance and security cooperation activities advancing the U.S. strategic goal of a sovereign, stable, and self-reliant Iraq. OSC–I trains the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) to meet Iraq's internal security requirements while leveraging Foreign Military Financing (FMF), International Military Education and Training (IMET) programs, and other security assistance authorities to complement Iraq's robust Iraqi-funded Foreign Military Sales (FMS) program.

Question. What do you see as the greatest challenges for the U.S.-Iraqi strategic relationship over the coming years?

Answer. The greatest challenge facing the U.S.-Iraq strategic relationship is the successful transition to a more traditional security cooperation relationship—with a robust bilateral and multilateral training and exercise program—despite persistent sectarian violence throughout the country and rising tensions over Iranian support to Syria.

Question. What are the lessons learned from the drawdown and post-combat operations in Iraq that should be applied to the drawdown and post-combat operations in Afghanistan?

Answer. First, we must improve communication and coordination between DOD and Department of State as we shift from a military-led program to a diplomatic-led program. In Iraq, the lack of a fully integrated civilian-military drawdown significantly complicated an already difficult transition. Second, we must clearly-define the missions and support for U.S. and coalition forces remaining in Afghanistan, with all authorities and agreements in place prior to completion of full transition. These authorities and agreements—a primary aim of U.S.-Afghan Bilateral Security Agreement negotiations—will provide assurance of the U.S. commitment and help preserve hard-fought gains as Afghanistan begins the critical post-2014 period. Finally, we must maintain an equilibrium among our campaign objectives, retrograde, and the protection of our forces.

STABILITY AND SUPPORT OPERATIONS

Question. The U.S. experience in Iraq and Afghanistan has underscored the importance of planning and training to prepare for the conduct and support of stability and support operations in post-conflict situations. In contrast, however, the January 2012 Defense Strategic Guidance asserts that the Department will avoid becoming involved in long duration stability and support operations.

What steps, if any, would you recommend to ensure that the lessons learned from stability operations in Iraq and Afghanistan are captured and appropriately institutionalized?

Answer. We've captured the lessons we have learned regarding stability operations in our Joint Doctrine. Specifically, we have a complete publication (JP 3–07) dedicated to the topic—the current version is dated September 2011. Later this year, we will formally assess this publication with the intent to update it as part of our routine doctrine process. Further, we will ensure the lessons and concepts are retained in our training and education.

AFGHANISTAN CAMPAIGN

Question. What is your assessment of the progress of the military campaign in Afghanistan?

Answer. The military campaign in Afghanistan continues to progress as illustrated by the recent Milestone 13/TRANCHE V announcement. In fact, the campaign has now shifted into a fundamentally new phase. For the past 11 years, the United States and our Coalition allies have been leading combat operations. Now, the Afghans are taking over, and ISAF is stepping back into a supporting role. The progress made by the ISAF-led surge over the past 3 years has put the Government of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan (GIRoA) in control of all Afghanistan's major cities and 34 provincial capitals and driven the insurgency away from the population. ISAF's primary focus is now shifting from directly fighting the insurgency to supporting the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF) in their efforts to hold and expand these gains.

Question. What is your assessment and prioritization of enablers that need to be built and sustained within the ANSF given the cessation of U.S. and North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) combat operations by the end of 2014?

Answer. We have invested considerably in developing the ability of the ANSF to sustain itself in the field with logistics and mobility. We will continue to accelerate the development of additional enabling capabilities to include route clearance and casualty evacuation.

TRANSITION OF SECURITY RESPONSIBILITY IN AFGHANISTAN AND U.S. TROOP REDUCTIONS

Question. In February of this year, President Obama announced that by February 2014 U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan will be reduced to 34,000. In June, the ANSF achieved Transition Milestone 2013, and assuming the lead responsibility for security throughout Afghanistan.

Do you support the President's decision to reduce U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan to 34,000 by February 2014? Why or why not?

Answer. Yes. Transition Milestone 2013 represents a significant shift for our mission in Afghanistan. Over the past 11 years, the United States and our partners have led combat operations. Now the Afghans are taking the lead for their own security. ISAF's primary focus has shifted from directly fighting the insurgency to supporting the ANSF. We match troop levels to the mission and our new mission requires fewer troops on the ground. The decision to drawdown U.S. forces was made based on the real and tangible progress of the ISAF military campaign and an assessment of an increasingly capable ANSF.

Question. What is your understanding regarding the pace of those reductions in U.S. forces?

Answer. We are on path to meet our objective of 34,000 troops by February 2014. This objective is based on a transition in our mission to support increasingly capable ANSF. The Commander ISAF will have the flexibility to meet his mission and sustain the right forces through this fighting season. He will also manage the glideslope as we settle into a supporting role.

Question. Do you support the June transition of lead responsibility for security throughout Afghanistan to the Afghan security forces?

Answer. I support the transition of responsibility for security to the ANSF. Security progress and the development of the ANSF into a capable and confident fighting force have enabled the security transition process to move forward. The ANSF continues to demonstrate its ability to defeat the Taliban and provide security to the Afghan people.

Question. Do you support the transition to the ANSF of full responsibility for security in Afghanistan by December 2014?

Answer. Yes. The ANSF continues to demonstrate significant improvement. We are seeing many encouraging examples where ANSF are gaining capability, confidence, leadership, and will to engage with the enemy. The ANSF is on a path to be capable of assuming full responsibility for security by December 2014.

Question. What is your assessment of the potential impact of withdrawing faster than the announced drawdown and of leaving zero troops in Afghanistan post-2014?

Answer. Withdrawing faster and leaving zero troops in Afghanistan would likely compromise the sustainability of the ANSF. It would also impact on our ability to retrograde all our personnel and equipment while ensuring the protection of the force. Therefore, I continue to support an enduring presence post-2014 to support ANSF development and meet our security interests.

AFGHANISTAN NATIONAL SECURITY FORCES

Question. What is your assessment of the progress in developing a professional and effective ANSF?

Answer. The ANSF continues to grow into a confident and capable force. We are focusing on leadership development as fundamental to the professionalization of the ANSF. Leadership ratings continue to improve and the National Military Academy of Afghanistan and the ANA Officer Academy will play a pivotal role in professionalizing the ANA. Additionally, the Minister of Defense (MoD) formed an Evaluation Commission that is responsible for identifying poorly performing commanders and removes them when required. This allows the MoD the opportunity to fix the poor/lacking command climate within and address leadership concerns. Further, the Afghan National Police Training Command focuses on delineating strategic level roles, literacy of the force and rule of law knowledge.

Question. Do you support maintaining the ANSF at the level of 352,000 beyond 2014 based on the security conditions on the ground in Afghanistan?

Answer. I recommended to the Secretary of Defense and the President that the 352,000 ANSF force level should continue beyond 2014. The extension of the ANSF "surge" force is crucial to put Afghans at the fore to provide their own security. At this time, it is premature to assess the duration of this surge, but at a minimum, this extension would likely be necessary for at least 2 years following the end of the ISAF mission to counter the possibility of a Taliban resurgence after the departure of coalition forces.

Question. What do you see as the main challenges to building the capacity of the ANSF and what recommendations, if any, would you make for addressing those challenges?

Answer. The main challenges we face in building the capacity of the ANSF are attrition, leadership, and limited literacy. Unfortunately, these issues continue to undermine positive recruiting, training, and professionalization goals. These are not problems that can be solved in the short term, but ISAF is continuing to work with the MoI and the MoD to address them. We must also continue to work on the support functions that will sustain the ANSF in the field such as logistics.

Question. A recent audit report by the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR) raised concerns about DOD plans to purchase PC–12 aircraft and Mi-17 helicopters for the Afghan Special Mission Wing and recommended suspending the contracts for these purchases. DOD and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Training Mission-Afghanistan/Combined Security Transition Command-Afghanistan did not concur with the SIGAR's recommendation on contract suspension.

What is your assessment of current plans to equip the Afghan Special Mission Wing (SMW) with PC–12 aircraft and Mi-17 helicopters?

Answer. Our strategy in Afghanistan includes reducing the number of and reliance on U.S. enablers by building capability in the ANSF. In part, this will rely on developing the Afghan Air Force and the SMW, and thus reducing our requirements for aviation assets.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact to Afghanistan counterterrorism efforts if Mi-17 helicopters are not acquired?

Answer. We need to support development of a helicopter capability for the ANSF. This capability allows for transporting combat-ready Afghan troops throughout the remote regions of Afghanistan. The Mi-17 is a proven, familiar, compatible, and is well suited for operating from remote locations with minimal ground support. It possesses superior vertical lift capabilities and is capable of operation in the high-altitude, mountainous terrain of Afghanistan. Previous analysis showed that the Mi-17 stands apart as an all-around helicopter capable of medium and heavy lift.

Question. Do you support the SIGAR recommendation to suspend the contracts to acquire these aircraft and helicopters for the Special Mission Wing? Why or why not?

Answer. No. It is important for the Afghans to operate and sustain a familiar platform to support the current war effort. The ANSF has over 30 years of extensive experience with this platform, with the vast majority of the seasoned Afghan helicopters pilots having flown and maintained this platform since the 1980s. The ANSF currently has over 150 trained Mi-17 pilots; to retrain the ANSF workforce (aircrew/maintainers) on an unfamiliar platform would take a minimum of 3 years and additional funds. Requiring the ANSF to retrain on any other platform than the Mi-17 would significantly impact the long-term success of the ANSF.

OPERATION RESOLUTE SUPPORT

Question. In early June, NATO defense ministers endorsed a concept of operations for the training and advisory mission, known as Operation Resolute Support, which the Alliance will maintain in Afghanistan after the ISAF combat mission ends in December 2014. The size of the mission is yet to be determined, but previously U.S. officials have said that a force of 8,000–12,000 troops was under consideration.

What do you consider to be the primary role or roles of the NATO Operation Resolute Support force in Afghanistan after 2014?

Answer. The primary role of the post-2014 NATO mission is to train, advise, and assist the ANSF at the national and institutional level, down to the Corps level. Resolute Support Mission may also contain limited enabler support as we continue to build ANSF capability.

Question. In your view, what factors should be considered in determining the size of the post-2014 NATO mission in Afghanistan?

Answer. A number of factors will be considered in determining the size of the post-2014 NATO mission. First, the continued progress of the ANSF and the level of training, advise, and assistance required to further that progress. Second, the number of bases required to support a regional approach and to assist other agencies of the U.S. Government will drive the size of the post-2014 force level. Lastly, any post-2014 mission will depend on completion of the BSA and the sustainment of international commitments.

Question. What is the impact on NATO ally commitments to Operation Resolute Support of the U.S. not announcing a post-2014 force commitment?

Answer. Our NATO allies are aware that the President is considering a range of options based on a number of factors to include the performance of the ANSF during this fighting season. At the NATO Defense Ministers meeting in June, allies and partners endorsed a concept of operations for the new mission for Afghanistan after 2014. This will guide NATO's operational planning over the coming months. A decision on our force commitment will be necessary soon in order for NATO members to source the plan in sufficient time to enable the deployment of forces.

PEACE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE TALIBAN

Question. In your view, what "redlines" should the United States and Afghanistan establish for any outcome from peace negotiations with the Taliban?

Answer. Historically, insurgencies end with some form of a political settlement. We continue to support an Afghan-led reconciliation effort with the goal of a negotiated a political settlement that also protects U.S. security interests. This will likely require elements of the Taliban that wish to reconcile to: (1) lay down their weapons and stop violence; (2) denounce al Qaeda; and (3) accept the Afghan constitution including the rights afforded women and children.

Question. How effective has the current program for reintegrating insurgent fighters been in removing fighters from the battlefield? What additional steps, if any, should be taken to improve the reintegration program?

Answer. The program has had some success in weakening the insurgency in some areas. Fighters that are not ideologically committed to the Taliban can sometime be persuaded to reintegrate. The program, however, is only successful if there is credible and effective governance. Any program can be improved, and this is no exception. We need to maintain oversight of the process of delivering projects and utilizing the allocated funds.

ENDURING STRATEGIC PARTNERSHIP WITH AFGHANISTAN

Question. Do you support maintaining an enduring strategic partnership between the United States and Afghanistan beyond 2014?

Answer. Yes. I remain committed to a long-term strategic partnership with Afghanistan. An enduring strategic partnership is needed to sustain Afghan forces and to counter transnational terrorist threats.

Question. How would you describe the main U.S. strategic interests regarding an enduring relationship with Afghanistan and in that region?

Answer. We remain committed to a long-term strategic partnership with the Afghan Government and the Afghan people. We have a strategic interest in making sure that Afghanistan never again becomes a safe haven for al Qaeda and its affiliates that pose a threat to the homeland. An enduring partnership with a stable Afghanistan also promotes regional stability.

Question. Do you support the conclusion of the Bilateral Security Agreement between the United States and Afghanistan?

Answer. I support the conclusion of the Bilateral Security Agreement. We are currently negotiating an agreement that will provide the basis for a continued American military presence post 2014. Such an agreement is necessary for us to maintain a mutually beneficial partnership.

Question. In your view, what redlines, if any, must the United States establish for the negotiation and conclusion of the Bilateral Security Agreement?

Answer. In my judgment, the United States must have Exclusive Criminal and Civil Jurisdiction over our personnel stationed in Afghanistan. This is fundamental protection we provide our servicemembers overseas. We must also ensure that we have necessary operational authorities to accomplish our mission.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. Special Operations Forces depend on general purpose forces for many enabling capabilities, including intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR); logistics; and medical evacuation. Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command, has said "I have no doubt that special operations will be the last to leave Afghanistan" and has predicted that the requirement for Special Operations Forces may increase as general purpose forces continue to be drawn down.

If confirmed, how would you ensure adequate enabling capabilities for Special Operations Forces as general purpose forces continue to draw down in Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure adequate enabling capabilities needed to support the SOF mission set by working collaboratively with ISAF, CENTCOM, and the NATO Special Operations Command-Afghanistan to determine requirements. These enabling capabilities would be tailored to support our post-2014 mission based on force levels that have yet to be decided.

Question. In April 2012, the United States and Afghanistan signed a Memorandum of Understanding on the "Afghanization" of direct action counterterrorism missions in Afghanistan—reflecting the shared intention of having Afghan security forces in the lead in the conduct of such operations with U.S. forces in a support role.

What is the status of efforts to put Afghan Special Operations Forces in the lead for such operations and why do you believe such a transition is important?

Answer. We continue to see ANSF SOF make significant progress in operational effectiveness, and their independence, capacity, and competence continues to grow. One hundred percent of ANA Special Operation Forces missions are Afghan led, and approximately 60 percent of Provincial Response Company police missions are Afghan led. This transition is important to demonstrate that GIRoA is capable of leading security operations needed to further the growth in governance and Development.

Question. The Village Stability Operations (VSO) and Afghan Local Police (ALP) programs—both U.S. Special Operations missions—have been consistently praised by U.S. military leaders as critical elements of the counterinsurgency strategy in Afghanistan.

What are your views on the value of these programs and do you believe they should be part of the long-term strategy in Afghanistan (i.e. post-2014)?

Answer. VSO and ALP represent a very visible expression of local security to many Afghans, particularly those in remote and isolated communities. GIRoA has identified VSO/ALP as a necessary pillar of their own long-term strategy. In November 2012, the MOI proposed that the ALP be designated a component of the Afghan Uniformed Police. Then in March 2013, the ALP was included in the MOI 10-Year Vision for the Afghan National Police.

U.S. STRATEGIC RELATIONSHIP WITH PAKISTAN

Question. What in your view are the key U.S. strategic interests with regard to Pakistan?

Answer. Our strategic interests and national security goals remain to disrupt, dismantle, and defeat al Qaeda and to prevent the return of safe havens in Afghanistan and Pakistan. This would not be possible without Pakistani support. We also have an interest in a stable Pakistan and the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and technology. On the security front, we have a more limited relationship than in the past, but I believe it is a pragmatic and constructive approach.

Question. Does the United States have a strategic interest in enhancing military-to-military relations with Pakistan? Why or why not?

Answer. Yes. Military-to-military ties with Pakistan are an important aspect of the broader bilateral relationship. Our engagements, and especially our security assistance programs, are essential for effective military cooperation between our two countries. I have engaged productively with General Kayani many times in the past, and the Office of the Defense Representative in Pakistan plays an important role in building and sustaining military-military ties at lower levels. These relationships allow us to engage Pakistan in clearly defined areas of shared concern such as maintaining regional stability, curbing violent extremism, and countering the threat of improvised explosive devices.

Question. If so, what steps would you recommend, if confirmed, for enhancing the military-to-military relationship between the United States and Pakistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue my close engagement with the Pakistan Military. As Pakistan democratic consolidation progresses, we must ensure that we maintain our military-to-military ties. I will continue a frank and respectful dialogue about our shared interests in countering extremist and promoting regional stability. Security cooperation cannot succeed without the buy-in of Pakistani leadership and continued support of the U.S. Congress.

Question. For several years, the United States has provided significant funds to reimburse Pakistan for the costs associated with military support and operations by Pakistan in connection with Operation Enduring Freedom.

What is your assessment of Pakistan's cooperation with the United States in counterterrorism operations against militant extremist groups located in Pakistan?

Answer. Pakistan's cooperation on counterterrorism has not always met our expectations. Since 2009, Pakistan has undertaken counterinsurgency operations against extremist organizations in the northwest, including Swat, North and South Waziristan, Mohmand, and Bajaur with mixed results. Security assistance, Coalition Support Fund reimbursements, and cross-border coordination with ISAF and Afghan forces have helped enable these operations. It is in our interest that Pakistan continues this campaign as effectively and comprehensively as possible.

Question. What is your assessment of Pakistan's efforts to maintain transit and provide security along the ground lines of communication (GLOCs) through Pakistan?

Answer. The key route to sustain forces has been movement via sealift to Pakistan and then ground movement through Pakistan to Afghanistan. This is the cheapest, fastest, most direct surface route. Since the reopening, the Government of Pakistan has provided security to U.S. and NATO cargo shipments through the PAK GLOC. Pakistan is maintaining security along the GLOCs through Pakistan to Afghanistan for the trans-shipment of equipment and supplies in support of U.S. military operations in Afghanistan and the retrograde of U.S. equipment out of Afghanistan.

Question. What is your assessment of Pakistan's efforts to counter the threat improvised explosive devices, including efforts to attack the network, go after known precursors and explosive materials?

Answer. Pakistan recognizes the IED problem is a shared problem. They also suffer significant casualties within Pakistan as a result of extremist attacks using IEDs. We are making progress in the area of C–IED cooperation. Pakistan is taking demonstrable steps to disrupt the IEDs, to include placing new restrictions on the distribution of precursor materials and hosting regional discussions to discuss the IED problem with international partners, including Afghanistan.

IRAN

Question. Iran continues to expand its nuclear program and has failed to provide full and open access to all aspects of its current and historic nuclear program to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

What is your assessment of the military and political threat posed by Iran?

Answer. Iran poses a significant threat to the United States, our allies and partners, and our regional and global interests. Countering Iran's destabilizing and malign behavior requires a comprehensive approach. Iran is actively investing in the development of a range of conventional capabilities, including air, missile, and naval assets. Iran continues to publicly threaten to use its naval and missile forces to close the Strait of Hormuz or target U.S. interests and regional partners. Iran is also one of the main state-sponsors of terrorism, proxy and surrogate groups. Iran continues to provide arms, funding, and paramilitary training to extremist groups. On the nuclear front, Iran continues to pursue an illicit nuclear program that threatens to provoke a regional arms race and undermine the global non-proliferation regime. Iran also continues to develop ballistic missiles that could be adapted to deliver nuclear weapons. Iran will seek to use its threat capabilities to enable greater influence in the region and threaten our allies.

Question. What is your assessment of U.S. policy with respect to Iran?

Answer. I support the U.S. policy of preventing Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. To this end, we are prepared with military options to include associated costs and risks. Moreover, we are pursuing a comprehensive strategy to confront Iran's malign behavior that includes diplomatic isolation, economic pressure through sanctions, diplomatic engagement through the P5+1, and military pressure through contingency preparations and exercises. In addition, we are reassuring our partners in the region by deepening our security commitments and building their capabilities.

Question. What more do you believe the United States and the international community can and should do to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons?

Answer. This policy question is best answered by the State Department. That said, it is clear that continued international unity on sanctions is crucial to bringing Iran to the negotiating table with a serious proposal. Further, we need to sustain a comprehensive strategy that includes diplomatic pressure through UN Security Council Resolutions, economic pressure through sanctions, diplomatic engagement through the P5+1, and military pressure through contingency preparations and exercises.

Question. In your view, what are the risks associated with reducing U.S. presence in the Middle East with respect to the threat posed by Iran?

Answer. The reduction of U.S. force presence in the Middle East—due to withdrawal from Iraq (and Afghanistan), rebalance to the Asia-Pacific, and in part from fiscal constraints—could impact our ability to deter aggression and assure our allies. That said, we retain a significant and ready presence in the region with high-end capabilities that should serve to mitigate against such concerns. Furthermore, our global reach and strike capabilities contribute to our ability to deter and assure.

Question. In your view, what has been the effect of sanctions against Iran—how effective have they been and should additional unilateral or multilateral sanctions be levied against Iran?

Answer. The United States has put in place against Iran tough, smart, and crippling sanctions. As a result of these sanctions, Iran's financial, trade, and economic outlook has deteriorated significantly. International financial institutions estimate that Iran's economy contracted in 2012 for the first time in more than 2 decades. International sanctions have hindered Iran's weapons procurement efforts and driven up the costs of obtaining necessary components for its military. Sanctions also appear to have slowed Iran's progress on its nuclear program, making it increasingly difficult for Iran to import needed materials or skills. The question of additional sanctions is best answered by the State Department.

Question. In your view, what role should DOD play in countering Iran's support of international terrorism?

Answer. Iranian support for proxy groups and terrorist activities constitutes a serious threat to our partners and allies as well as U.S. interests. In short, Iran's activities are malevolent and intentionally destabilizing. DOD continues to help counter Iranian malign activities in at least three ways. First, we support diplomatic and intelligence efforts to inhibit the activities of Iranian proxy and terrorist groups. Second, we leverage our military presence in the region to deter and, when directed by the President, disrupt Iranian malign activities. Third, we leverage our extensive security cooperation relationships with countries in the Middle East and around the world to build partner capacity and trust to counter Iranian destabilizing activities.

Question. Do you agree with President Obama that all options, including military options, should remain on the table with respect to Iran?

Answer. I do agree that all options must be kept on the table in order to achieve our policy objectives toward Iran. It is our responsibility to conduct prudent planning for all contingencies, and we will ensure that military plans are kept up-to-date. This preparedness will have the effect of reinforcing our overall policy.

Question. Do you assess that sanctions will prevent or dissuade Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons?

Answer. Continued international unity on sanctions is crucial to bringing Iran to the negotiating table with a serious proposal. Departments of State and Treasury have put in place the strongest and most comprehensive international sanctions in history, and we believe the sanctions are having a dramatic effect on the Iranian economy. I support continuing sanctions pressure on Iran; however, it is not yet clear if sanctions will ultimately prevent or dissuade Iran.

SYRIA

Question. What is your assessment of the situation in Syria and its impact on the region?

Answer. The crisis in Syria continues to be tragic, dynamic, and complex. The conflict reflects a sectarian fault line that extends across and is destabilizing the region. We are planning and engaging with Syria's neighbors—Israel, Turkey, Jordan, Lebanon, and Iraq—to contain the spillover effects that would render our allies and partners less secure. The competition among states with regional interests continues to fuel the violence with negative implications for deepening Sunni-Shia tensions within Syria and beyond.

Question. In your view, what is the most appropriate role for the United States in assisting regional friends and allies respond to the situation in Syria?

Answer. The United States provides leadership and support to the surrounding countries through multilateral planning efforts and humanitarian assistance. We are continuously engaged with key regional partners such as Jordan, Lebanon, Turkey, and Iraq to provide assistance, technical knowledge and military contingency planning.

Question. In your view, what—if any—role should the U.S. military play with respect to the situation in Syria?

Answer. We should and are pursuing a regional strategy along four lines of effort. First, we are working with our partners in the region. Second, we are supporting the moderate opposition. We are currently providing non-lethal assistance to increase the capability of the opposition. Third, we are providing humanitarian assistance to help with a massive refugee problem. Fourth, we are planning and posturing our forces for a wide range of military options.

Question. In your view, what role—if any—are Iran, Russia, and Hezbollah playing in the current conflict in Syria?

Answer. Iran, Russia, and Hezbollah continue to support the Assad regime. Russia continues to supply arms, and Hezbollah supports the regime operationally with personnel and weapons—as does Iran. Their continued support of the Assad regime has led to recent regime momentum and gains on the ground.

Question. In your view, what are the prospects of a negotiated solution in Syria?

Answer. A negotiated settlement is a preferred path to achieving our policy objectives. However, its prospects are diminished by the sectarian character of the conflict. Assad is further emboldened by Russia's continued support. The reality of disparate opposition groups, many at odds with U.S. values, also make it difficult to achieve a negotiated settlement.

Question. In your view, is the momentum currently on the side of the Assad regime or the forces fighting to overthrow Syria?

Answer. Momentum shifts are characteristic of this form of protracted conflict. The fragmentation of the opposition undermines their momentum. The Assad regime is supported by Hezbollah, Iran, and Russia, which has helped the regime regain some areas that they once ceded.

Question. Are there asymmetric options that bypass Syria's integrated air defense system rather than kinetically neutralize it, such as standoff weapons and/or stealth, and what is your assessment of those options from a military perspective?

Answer. We have a wide range of options. These details of these options are better discussed in a classified setting.

Question. What are the risks associated with doing nothing to alter the balance of military power in Syria between Assad and the armed opposition?

Answer. We have learned from the past 10 years that it's not enough to simply alter the balance of military power without careful consideration of what's necessary in order to preserve a functioning state. That said, we are taking actions to support the moderate opposition so that they can alter the balance of military power. If we were to end all our support to our allies and to the opposition, we might expect the suffering to worsen and the region to further destabilize.

THE 2001 AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF MILITARY FORCE

Question. What is your understanding of the scope and duration of the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF)?

Answer. The United States is in an armed conflict against al Qaeda and its associated forces. An associated force is defined as a group that: (1) is an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda; and (2) is a co-belligerent with al Qaeda in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners. These are the same terrorist threats that perpetrated the horrendous acts on U.S. soil on September 11, 2001, and the AUMF still serves as the legal basis under U.S. domestic law to employ military force against these threats.

Question. What factors govern DOD determinations as to where the use of force is authorized, and against whom, pursuant to the AUMF?

Answer. In May 2013, the President promulgated Presidential Policy Guidance (PPG) governing direct action against terrorist targets located outside the United States and areas of active hostilities. This document codifies and harmonizes the procedures necessary for DOD to conduct these types of military operations. The PPG and its derivative operational plans clarify, formalize and strengthen the standards, policies, and determinations of DOD concerning where, how, and against whom military force may be utilized outside the United States and areas of active hostilities. DOD meticulously follows the formalized procedures of the PPG to ensure we make well-informed decisions based on the most up-to-date intelligence and the expertise of our national security professionals. Senior commanders and their legal advisors carefully review all operations for compliance with U.S. and international law before a decision is rendered by the Secretary of Defense or the President.

Question. Are you satisfied that current legal authorities, including the AUMF, enable the Department to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities at the level that you believe to be necessary and appropriate?

Answer. The AUMF in its current form provides the necessary and sufficient authorities to counter al Qaeda and its associated forces. If a terrorist threat emerges that does not fit within the AUMF, DOD would consult with Congress and facets of the executive branch on the question of authorities.

AL QAEDA

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda affiliates to the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests overseas, and western interests more broadly? Which affiliates are of most concern?

Answer. Years of sustained counterterrorism (CT) pressure have degraded the ability of al Qaeda's Pakistan-based leadership to operate freely. Our efforts have made it difficult for al Qaeda to replenish its senior ranks with the type of experienced leaders, trainers, and attack planners it promoted in previous years. We have also limited the group's ability to mount sophisticated, complex attacks in the West. Despite these setbacks, al Qaeda retains its intent, though not the robust capability, to plan and conduct terrorist attacks against the West. Al Qaeda core continues to inspire and guide its regional nodes, allies, and like-minded extremists to engage in terrorism. Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula remains committed to attacking our interests in the region and is the most likely group to attempt an attack in the United States in the near-term.

YEMEN AND AL QAEDA IN THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

Question. What is your assessment of the current U.S. strategy in Yemen and what is your understanding of the role of DOD within that strategy?

Answer. Our overall engagement strategy with Yemen combines diplomatic, economic, and security initiatives to improve stability and security. DOD fills a critical role in this strategy primarily by supporting the development of the Yemeni armed forces. We are fostering a strong partnership with the Yemeni military to better address critical security threats, including the campaign against al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP). The security situation in Yemen remains fragile and we must continue our partnership in the fight against AQAP.

Question. Given the continuing political instability and slow progress of reforms to the military in Yemen, what are your views on the United States continuing to provide security assistance—most significantly DOD section 1206 funding—to Yemeni counterterrorism forces?

Answer. A stable, unified, and economically viable Yemen, free of violent extremists, remains in our best interest. We have just passed the first anniversary of a 2-year plan to complete the government and military transition from the Saleh regime to a new representative system. While progress has been slow, President Hadi and the military are taking steps to reform and restructure the military as part of the overall political transition process. President Hadi and senior Yemeni military figures actively engage the United States for support and advice on the military reorganization process. The 1206 funds are, and will remain, critical to building the capacity of the Yemeni counter terrorism forces to disrupt and degrade the AQAP operational space, securing their boarders, and disrupting maritime and land smuggling routes.

SOMALIA AND AL SHABAAB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Shabaab?

Answer. Al Shabaab remains on the defensive. The coalition among Somali Government, the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM), and Ethiopian National Defense Forces maintain pressure on the group. Despite its loss of territory in 2012, al Shabaab has demonstrated a continued ability to conduct complex attacks against Western interests and Somali Government targets in Mogadishu. The group also conducted small and medium scale attacks in Kenya. This trend will likely continue throughout the rest of 2013, despite increasingly public disputes amongst al Shabaab senior officials.

Question. In your view, does al Shabaab pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area?

Answer. Al Shabaab does not pose a direct threat to the Homeland or Europe at present. Nevertheless, the group poses an ongoing threat to U.S., Western, and other allied interests in East Africa. In February 2012, al Shabaab and al Qaeda leader Ayman Zawahiri announced al Shabaab's merger with al Qaeda. Although the group is aligned with al Qaeda's global jihadist objectives, al Shabaab focuses on defending territory in Somalia against the coalition of Somali Government, the AMISOM, and Ethiopian military forces—as well as conducting attacks in East Africa.

Question. What is your understanding of the current U.S. strategy in Somalia and the role of DOD in that strategy?

Answer. The current U.S. strategy in Somalia consists of three elements: (1) supporting the AMISOM to combat al Shabaab, increase stability and promote the institutional building of the Somali Federal Government; (2) strengthening the new Somali Federal Government with stabilization and economic recovery assistance in parallel with humanitarian assistance; and (3) building a durable and responsive central Somali Government while engaging with other Somali regional actors such as Somaliland and Puntland (the "dual track policy"). The DOD role in support of the State Department is to increase AMISOM capacity to combat al-Shabaab, engage with the new Somali National Army, and develop ways to increase security. These efforts enable Somali Government institutions and organizations to mature.

Question. Should the United States establish military-to-military relations and consider providing assistance to the Somali national military forces?

Answer. We are prepared to establish military-to-military relations with the new Somali National Army. This supports the State Department in recognizing and strengthening the Somalia Federal Government. We plan to continue assistance to our partner nations in the AMISOM while exploring ways to assist the Somali National Army. Short-term Somali stability depends on AMISOM, and long-term security requires a professional and accountable Somali National Army based on the rule of law.

AL QAEDA IN THE ISLAMIC MAGHREB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)?

Answer. AQIM and its allies have proven resilient despite the French-led military intervention in Mali. Although these groups no longer control key strategic towns, they retain the capability to launch sporadic attacks within Mali and neighboring countries, expand their safe haven, and attract recruits in pursuit of a hard-line Islamic state based on al Qaeda ideology. Further, AQIM will likely continue to bolster its ties to al Qaeda-associated terrorist groups throughout the region, such as Boko Haram in Nigeria, to influence and support attack planning. AQIM will continue to pose a local and regional threat into 2014, as North African Governments struggle to disrupt AQIM movement across expansive, porous borders.

Question. In your view, does AQIM pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area? What capacity has AQIM demonstrated to plan and carry out actions threatening U.S. interests?

Answer. AQIM does not presently pose a significant threat to the U.S. Homeland. We see no indications the group views conducting attacks outside North Africa and the Sahel as a priority in the near term. However, the group remains a credible threat to U.S. and western interests within North and West Africa, where it has conducted or attempted attacks in several countries (i.e. Mali, Niger, Algeria, Mauritania). AQIM will likely continue to bolster its ties to al Qaeda-associated terrorist groups throughout the region, such as Boko Haram in Nigeria, to influence and support attack planning.

Question. In your view, what has been the impact of the recent expansion of AQIM's area of operations in northern Mali on the group's capacities and aims?

Answer. The expansion of AQIM in Mali between early 2012 and January 2013 increased the group's capacity as it collaborated with splinter groups al-Tawhid wa al-Jihad in West Africa, al-Mulathamun battalion, and Tuareg rebel group Ansar al-Din (AAD). This expansion reflects an increase in the group's membership. This growth has not changed the group's regionally-focused aim of establishing shari'a throughout North Africa. We continue to work with allies and partners to provide a more permanent security solution to AQIM expansion into the Sahel by supporting several regional efforts, including: The French Operation Serval; the Economic Community of West African States African-led Intervention Force in Mali; and the Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali.

Question. What is your assessment of the importance of security assistance to address the growing AQIM presence in southern Libya?

Answer. North African countries struggle to cooperate and coordinate CT operations, creating exploitable security seams across expansive, porous borders. Preserving security assistance is critical to enabling Libya to build the internal capacity to address these challenges. Security assistance is just one piece of a larger effort that includes law enforcement, justice system reform, and border control. However, our ability to provide assistance will require patience. Tripoli currently lacks the institutions to integrate security assistance or the mechanisms to allocate aid. Tripoli primarily relies on armed militias for security, many operating outside of central government control and some which are complicit in AQIM-linked activities including weapons smuggling.

Question. What authorities will most quickly help address the threat in southern Libya?

Answer. For counterterrorism and border security efforts we are using 1206 and 1208 authorities, along with the Global Security Contingency Fund. No further authorities are needed at this time in order to address the situation in southern Libya.

Question. Does DOD require any new authorities for this situation?

Answer. No, our 1206, 1207, and 1208 authorities give us the appropriate means to provide targeted security assistance to address emerging threats. However, these authorities have not functioned as efficiently as they should. They have been constrained by the bureaucratic sluggishness that has often limited U.S. responsiveness to our partners, and has on occasion prevented us from taking full advantage of opportunities for stronger partnerships against common threats in North Africa and throughout the Middle East since the "Arab Spring" began. For example, the equipment from a 2009 1206 case for Tunisia was just delivered this past spring—though 1206 cases are meant to address near-term CT threats. Most of these delays are caused by the bureaucratic inefficiencies between DOD and the Department of State (DOS). We continue to pursue changes that will lead to greater responsiveness and bolster our efforts in Libya, and the region in general.

NATO

Question. At the NATO Summit in Chicago in 2012, President Obama called the Alliance the "bedrock of our common security" for over 65 years. At the same time, concerns have been raised about the decline in defense spending by a number of NATO member countries, resulting in the United States accounting for approximately 75 percent of defense spending among NATO member countries.

In your view, how important is the NATO alliance to U.S. national security interests?

Answer. The NATO alliance is of critical importance to the national security interests of the United States. The combined military capabilities of the 28 NATO members are second to none. NATO and its allies possess the capability to deploy and sustain highly trained, interoperable forces that are able to conduct full spectrum military operations anywhere in the world.

Question. In your view, what impact have national defense budget cuts had on the capabilities of the NATO alliance, and what do you believe needs to be done to address any capability shortfalls?

Answer. Cuts our allies are making to their defense budgets are reducing the alliance's ability to confront security challenges and placing at risk NATO's ability to sustain concurrent operations. NATO has mitigated this underinvestment by a heavy and growing reliance on U.S. capabilities, but this trend poses risks to the future strength of the alliance. Our allies need to focus their resources on alliance required capabilities. As their economies improve, they need to increase their defense spending.

Question. What are the greatest opportunities and challenges that you foresee for NATO in meeting its strategic objectives over the next 5 years?

Answer. The greatest opportunity for NATO to meet its strategic objectives over the next 5 years is to maintain the unprecedented level of readiness and interoperability achieved over the last 10 years of combat operations in Afghanistan. The Alliance is working to attain that goal through expanded education and training, increased number of exercises, and better use of technology. The greatest challenge of course lies within the ability of the 28 nations to provide the funding and resources required to implement those initiatives and to continue to develop the capabilities needed to meet future challenges.

Question. In your view, is there a continuing requirement for U.S. nuclear weapons to be deployed in NATO countries?

Answer. Yes. NATO's Strategic Concept states NATO's commitment to the goal of creating the conditions for a world without nuclear weapons. However, it also made clear that as long as there are nuclear weapons in the world, NATO will remain a nuclear Alliance. NATO's 2012 Deterrence and Defence Posture Review confirmed that nuclear weapons are a core component of NATO's overall capabilities for deterrence and defense alongside conventional and missile defense forces. The review showed that the Alliance's nuclear force posture currently meets the criteria for an effective deterrence and defense posture.

Question. What strategy, if any, do you feel should be used to address declining defense budgets, as a percentage of gross domestic product (GDP), in Europe?

Answer. The longstanding and agreed NATO guideline for each ally is to spend 2 percent of GDP on defense. This provides a basis for comparing defense spending, but what really matters is how each nation allocates its defense resources. It is important to assess whether alliance members are procuring the appropriate quantity and quality of capabilities to meet identified NATO requirements. During this period of fiscal constraint, allies need to rigorously prioritize their defense investment with a focus on Alliance capability requirements. When economies improve, they should increase their investment.

U.S. FORCE POSTURE IN EUROPE

Question. DOD continues to review its force posture in Europe to determine what additional consolidations and reductions are necessary and consistent with U.S. strategic interests.

How would you define the U.S. strategic interests in the European area of responsibility (AOR)?

Answer. NATO will remain our Nation's preeminent multilateral alliance and continue to drive our defense relations with Europe. Through the new Strategic Concept, we defined a clear role for NATO in the years ahead, including space and cyberspace security, Ballistic Missile Defense, counter-trafficking and nonproliferation.

Question. Do you believe that additional consolidation and reductions of U.S. forces in Europe can be achieved consistent with U.S. strategic interests in that AOR?

Answer. I fully support the U.S. Army Europe plans to reduce its footprint from 16 garrisons to 7 garrisons by 2017. Regarding any additional reductions, we must ensure that our posture adapts to changes in the international security environment. Currently, there are several studies reviewing U.S. posture in Europe to include an internal DOD European Infrastructure Consolidation study and a congressionally-directed independent assessment of the overseas basing presence (NDAA for Fiscal Year 2012, section 347).

U.S. FORCE POSTURE IN THE ASIA-PACIFIC REGION

Question. The Department continues the effort to rebalance toward the Asia-Pacific as announced in the January 2012 Strategic Defense Guidance.

Are you satisfied with the rebalance efforts to date?

Answer. Yes. Despite the impact of sequestration, we continue to make progress on our key priorities in the Asia-Pacific. We are modernizing and strengthening our alliances and partnerships through multi-lateral and bilateral exercises while enhancing our engagement with region-wide institutions. We are enhancing our presence in the region by maintaining a defense posture that is more geographically distributed, politically sustainable, and operationally resilient. We are strengthening our military capabilities by sustaining investments critical to our ability to project power in support of security commitments.

Question. What do you see as the U.S. security priorities in the Asia-Pacific region over the next couple of years and what specific capabilities or enhancements are needed in to meet those priorities?

Answer. Our security priorities are those inherent in the rebalance: modernizing and strengthening our alliances, enhancing our presence, and pushing more quality forward in terms of capabilities. These efforts will enable us to shape partnerships and deter and respond as necessary to the threats in the region. We will continue to deter North Korea's continued provocative behavior. We will leverage our presence to mitigate tensions and encourage responsible behavior in the land and maritime territorial disputes such as exist in the East and South China Seas. We will need to deter disruptive activities in space and cyber space that have and will continue to become more sophisticated and damaging. Our forward presence and engagements are our overarching ways to address these challenges. Our people are our most valuable asset for building relationships. Special Operations Forces, cyber, and intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance are key capabilities I see for the near future.

Question. Do the budget cuts and resource constraints associated with sequestration threaten your ability to execute the rebalance to the Pacific?

Answer. To this point, budget reductions have not threatened our ability to rebalance to the Asia-Pacific. However, full sequestration may limit or delay the strategic alignment of our engagement and capabilities. Some key relationships may take longer to develop due to constraints on education and exercises. At the same time, fiscal realities afford an opportunity to ensure we are putting the right resources in the right places, at the right times. We will continue our steady, thoughtful, and measured rebalance to the region.

Question. What is your assessment of the strategic consequences, including impact on relationships with partners and allies, if sequestration results in a "rebalance", that is, a net reduction in military assets in the U.S. PACOM AOR?

Answer. Rebalance is intended as a net increase in military capability to the Asia-Pacific region. That said, the essence of rebalance is about more than hardware. It is about more engagement and attention. With the looming impact of sequestration on readiness and engagement, our ability to expand military to military partnerships and build partner capacity will be reduced, limiting our ability to develop and expand the scope and quality of critical relationships.

SECURITY SITUATION ON THE KOREAN PENINSULA

Question. What is your assessment of the current security situation on the Korean peninsula and of the threat posed to the United States and its allies by the current state of North Korea's ballistic missile and nuclear weapons capabilities?

Answer. The security situation on the Peninsula is stable at the moment. However, I am concerned that we are in a period of prolonged provocation. North Korea military activity is at seasonal normal levels. North Korea has toned down rhetoric since the height of tensions in April of this year and appears to be engaged in diplomatic overtures, perhaps to win concessions. I remain concerned with North Korea's development of ballistic missiles, nuclear weapons and bellicose rhetoric threatening to use these weapons; however, we do not have any indications of imminent use of ballistic missile or nuclear capabilities at this time.

Question. In your view, are there additional steps that DOD could take to ensure that North Korea does not proliferate missile and weapons technology to Syria, Iran and others?

Answer. Currently, DOD is taking the appropriate steps to prevent proliferation. We support interagency efforts to prevent North Korea proliferation through WMD nonproliferation regimes including the Australia Group (CW/BW), Missile Technology Control Regime, Hague Code of Conduct Against Ballistic Missile Proliferation and Nuclear Suppliers Group. These regimes use customs and law enforcement practices such as export control lists to interrupt proliferation of WMD materials to Syria, Iran, and others from North Korea. Additionally, DOD supports interagency counter-proliferation efforts through involvement with the Proliferation Security Initiative and geographic combatant commander support for potential interdictions. I remain open to additional options for improving our contribution to countering proliferation.

Question. Are you satisfied that the U.S.-Republic of Korea (ROK) combined counter-provocation plan, which was finalized a couple of months ago, strikes the right balance between enabling the South Koreans to respond to and defend against a provocation from North Korea while ensuring that the United States is involved in any decisions that might widen the military action to include U.S. forces?

Answer. Yes. The plan allows for the sovereign right of self-defense by the Republic of Korea in a timely and proportional manner without undue escalation and without violating the terms of the Armistice Agreement. Should the circumstances require or justify additional response, a bilateral U.S.-ROK consultative mechanism is in place to reach a suitable decision together. However, the situation on the Peninsula is always rife for miscalculation on all sides. U.S. deterrent forces, and the close relationship USFK enjoys with the ROK Government, are our strongest mitigation against escalation.

Question. What is your view regarding the timing of transfer of wartime operational control from the United States to the ROK, currently scheduled for December 2015, and do you support the transfer as scheduled?

Answer. I support the transfer as scheduled. From a military perspective, the timing of the transfer of wartime operational control is appropriate. The conditions for the transfer are based on meeting capability-based milestones, including acquisition of weapon systems, command and control systems, ISR platforms, appropriate and adequate supply of munitions, along with the right certification process to validate the readiness for the transfer. The ROK military is a very capable force, but it has had some setbacks in funding to achieve these milestones. General Thurman and his team at U.S. Forces-Korea are working hard with the ROK Joint Chiefs of Staff to meet the certification and capability requirements.

CHINA

Question. In the past several months, the United States and China have had several high level engagements, including President Obama's meetings with President Xi last month and your visit to China in April.

In view of these engagements, what is your assessment of the current state of the U.S.-China military relationship and your views regarding China's interest in and commitment to improving military relations with the United States?

Answer. Healthy, stable, reliable, and continuous military-to-military relations are in both nations' interest and are an essential part of the overall relationship. There are recent examples where we have improved practical cooperation, such as counter-piracy, humanitarian assistance, disaster relief and military medicine exchanges. However, a deeper U.S.-China military-to-military dialogue is needed to address many of the sources of insecurity and potential competition that may arise as our two forces come into closer and more frequent contact.

Question. How has China's aggressive assertion of territorial and maritime claims, particularly in the South China Sea and East China Sea, effected security and stability in the region?

Answer. The United States has a national interest in the maintenance of peace, stability, respect for international law, freedom of navigation, and unimpeded lawful commerce. While the United States does not take sides in any territorial disputes, any such disputes must be resolved without coercion or the use of force. We strongly support dispute resolution on the basis of existing international mechanisms and in accordance with established international norms and institutions. At the same time, beginning serious negotiation on a Code of Conduct for interaction in disputed maritime territories will significantly reduce tension and potential for conflict across the region. We have made it clear to China that we have commitments to allies and partners and will continue our engagement while maintaining our posture across the Asia Pacific.

Question. If reconfirmed, what will be your priorities vis-a-vis China?

Answer. Positive and constructive engagement with China is a key part of our strategy in the Asia Pacific. In support of this, my priorities include a healthy, stable, reliable, and continuous military-to-military relationship. I will also work towards a model of relations where communications are not cut off when difficulties arise, which is precisely the time that communication and dialogue are the most important. Finally, we need increased cooperation, channels of communication, and interactions between the two militaries to improve our partnership and reduce the risk of miscalculation, miscommunication or accidents. I will give particular emphasis to improving the quality of our strategic dialogue and supporting the establishment of norms for behaviors in cyberspace.

INTELLIGENCE, SURVEILLANCE, AND RECONNAISSANCE (ISR) CAPABILITIES

Question. Despite the ongoing drawdown in Afghanistan, demand for intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance capabilities of every kind remains very high due to the enhanced situational awareness and targeting capabilities they bring to our commanders. Almost all of the geographic combatant commands still have validated ISR requirements that are not being met.

What is your assessment of the Department's current disposition of ISR assets across the various combatant commands?

Answer. I think we have maximized and optimized our ISR capability. We remain focused on our #1 priority, supporting the warfighters in Afghanistan. At the same time, we are supporting the rebalance to the Asia-Pacific region while provided necessary capabilities to counter emerging extremist threats in AFRICOM's AOR. Prioritization is key to providing flexible and responsive forces.

Question. As our forces are withdrawn from Afghanistan, will existing ISR assets be re-postured to support combatant command needs in other regions, or will the ISR capacity be reduced?

Answer. In short, both. The fiscal year 2015 Global Force Management Allocation Plan is the first in which we begin to "reposture" ISR forces. Full Motion Video, Signals Intelligence, and Imagery Intelligence, among others, are valuable in any AOR. But many of the assets are very niche, and it will be difficult to translate their applicability in Afghanistan to other parts of the world. Budgetary pressures further constrain meeting combatant command requirements. Because of this, our total ISR force, quantitatively, will be diminished in fiscal year 2015 and beyond. But the technologies developed and lessons learned in Afghanistan will build a decidedly more capable, if smaller, global ISR force.

Question. Most of the highest-value ISR assets acquired after September 11 are aircraft that were not designed to be survivable in high-threat air defense environments, although in some cases unmanned aerial vehicles were designed to be deployed in large numbers in the expectation of substantial combat attrition.

Do you believe that the Department needs a major shift towards ISR platforms that are survivable in high-threat situations, or merely an augmentation of the capabilities we now have, with the assumption that air superiority can be gained rapidly enough to operate today's assets effectively?

Answer. The ISR assets we have in the Joint Force today are ready to perform missions across a range of warfighting scenarios. As we move toward the Joint Force of 2020, we will increasingly need ISR platforms that are survivable and can counter sophisticated adversaries defenses.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES

Question. The previous two QDRs have mandated significant growth in our Special Operations Forces (SOF) and enablers that directly support their operations.

Do you believe that QDR directed growth in the size of SOF should be retained despite current budgetary pressures?

Answer. Growth in Special Operations Forces capability has been necessary to meet the demands of the global conflicts in which we have been engaged over the past decade. We will judiciously balance the need for further growth in SOF with our need to address other capability demands in light of increased budgetary pressures. As a consequence, I do not expect additional, significant growth beyond what has already been programmed.

Question. In recent years, Special Operations Forces have taken on an expanded role in a number of areas important to countering violent extremist organizations, including those related to information and military intelligence operations. Some have advocated significant changes to U.S. Special Operations Command's (SOCOM) title 10 missions to make them better reflect the activities Special Operations Forces are carrying out around the world.

What current missions, if any, do you believe can and should be divested by SOCOM, and why?

Answer. At this time, I do not advocate for significant changes to SOCOM's title 10 missions. I use a range of processes—such as the Unified Command Plan, Guidance for the Employment of the Force, and Joint Strategic Capabilities Plan—to review the mission sets and responsibilities assigned to SOCOM on a continuing basis. Additionally, the language in section 167 of title 10, U.S.C., includes "such other activities as may be specified by the President or the Secretary of Defense," which provides the President and the Secretary of Defense the flexibility needed to meet rapidly changing circumstances.

Question. Are there any additional missions that you believe SOCOM should assume, and, if so, what are they and why do you advocate adding them?

Answer. Pending a review of strategic planning documents, I do not advocate for SOCOM to assume any additional missions at this time. Special Operations Forces already provide a broad but uniquely specialized range of support to Joint Force Commanders. They are trained to conduct operations including counterterrorism, unconventional warfare, direct action, special reconnaissance, foreign internal defense, and counter-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, in areas under enemy control or in politically sensitive environments. In such environments, SOF provides unique and essential capabilities, and we will continue to leverage lessons learned in our Decade of War studies to enhance SOF and General Purpose Force integration.

Question. What can be done to ensure that indirect special operations missions with medium- and long-term impact, such as unconventional warfare and foreign internal defense, receive as much emphasis as direct action, and that they receive appropriate funding?

Answer. In addition to developing specific Joint Doctrine on Unconventional Warfare, I have placed considerable emphasis on many aspects of foreign internal defense in my Capstone Concept for Joint Operations. I appreciate the significant legislative support for the many security force assistance and training and equipping missions that SOF undertakes. One area that may require enhanced legislative authorities is for greater opportunities to leverage non-SOF units to undertake partner capacity building tasks.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS AUTHORITIES

Question. Reportedly, the Commander of SOCOM has sought more control over the deployment and utilization of Special Operations Forces. For example, the Secretary of Defense recently modified policy guidance for the combatant commands that gave SOCOM, for the first time, responsibility for resourcing, organizing, and providing guidance to the Theater Special Operations Commands of the geographic combatant commanders and Special Operations Forces assigned to them. It has been reported that the Commander of SOCOM is also seeking new authorities that would allow him to more rapidly move Special Operations Forces between geographic combatant commands.

Please provide your assessment of whether such changes are appropriate and can be made without conflicting with civilian control of the military, infringing upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raising concerns with the State Department.

Answer. Special Operations Forces do not undertake operations without the approval of the President, the Secretary of Defense, the geographic combatant commanders, and the Chiefs of Mission. The proposed changes enhance the ability of our global Special Operations Forces to network with our U.S. interagency counterparts as well as our foreign allies and partners. I fully support a more efficient and effective ability of our Special Operations Forces to more dynamically respond to global demands in the future.

COMBATING TERRORISM

Question. The administration recently released its National Strategy for Counterterrorism. This strategy highlights the need to maintain pressure on al Qaeda's core while building the capacity of partners to confront mutual threats. The strategy also underscores the need to augment efforts to counter threats from al Qaeda-linked threats "that continue to emerge from beyond its core safe haven in South Asia."

How do you view the DOD's role under the new National Strategy for Counterterrorism?

Answer. The United States pursues a comprehensive approach to counter terrorist networks that threaten our Nation. The military is one element of this effort. DOD works closely with interagency stakeholders and key partners and allies to combat those threats beyond South Asia in support of the strategy. Training, advising, and assisting partnered forces allows us to leverage our unique Defense capabilities outside of the Afghanistan theater of operations. The Department implements rigorous guidelines, standards and accountability for lethal action against terrorist networks who threaten our Nation.

Question. What is your understanding of the impact of the Presidential Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism on DOD's role within the U.S. Government's counterterrorism strategy?

Answer. The recently signed Presidential Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism is a codification of policies and procedures that have been applied for some time. The guidance clarifies, formalizes, and strengthens the standards and processes we use. Military capabilities are one part of our comprehensive counterterrorism effort. We will continue to enable our allies to develop the capability to counter terrorists within their borders. When necessary and after a robust and accountable review process, we can take direct action against those specific terrorist networks that threaten U.S. persons. Our current authorities are sufficient to defend the Nation against existing terrorist threats. The Department implements a rigorous, transparent and accountable review process. We will scrupulously adhere to the rule of law and the highest ethical standards in implementing the strategy and guidance.

Question. Will DOD see its role increase or decrease?

Answer. The best way to defeat terrorism is with a comprehensive approach. DOD will continue to play a significant role in counterterrorism. The presidential policy framework codifies rigorous guidelines, oversight and accountability for targeted, lethal action against specific terrorist networks that threaten our Nation. The military also conducts a range of activities to build partner capacity and support other government agency efforts.

Question. If the role increases, what, if any, are the commensurate increases in capabilities or capacities that are required?

Answer. DOD will continue to develop new capabilities, technologies, and tactics as well as streamlined processes and procedures to ensure we stay ahead of our enemies as they also adapt. Joint Force 2020 must include and integrate innovative capabilities such as cyber, Special Operations Forces and intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance platforms.

Question. Will DOD require any new authorities?

Answer. I believe that existing authorities are adequate. Should a new group threaten the United States, we can respond as necessary under U.S. domestic and international law. I have not encountered a situation during my tenure as Chairman in which we did not have the necessary and sufficient authorities. If confirmed and this occurred during my tenure, I would consult within the executive and with Congress to determine whether additional authorities or tools have become necessary or appropriate.

Question. Are there steps DOD should take to better coordinate its efforts to combat terrorism with those of other Federal departments and agencies?

Answer. Improving interagency coordination was a key finding in our Decade of War study. The Joint Staff regularly and actively participates in both the National Security Staff's Counterterrorism Security Group and the President's Counterterrorism Board of Directors. Our combatant commands support our efforts and work closely with U.S. Embassies, interagency partners, and local actors. Institutionally, the Department is deliberately and carefully integrating lessons learned in our doctrine, training, planning and operations. We seek to support similar efforts where and when they exist in other organizations.

Question. What do you view as the role of DOD in countering al Qaeda and affiliated groups in cyberspace?

Answer. Defense of cyberspace requires a public-private effort to provide the best protection possible for our Nation. We are making significant progress. Cyber is an essential capability for Joint Force 2020. DOD works with interagency and commercial partners in order to counter threats from non-state actors in cyberspace and other domains. We will continue to employ a robust defensive posture on our military networks. In the event of a cyber attack, DOD has processes in place to identify it with interagency partners, defend against the attack, and share information with industry to mitigate effects.

INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING CONTRIBUTIONS

Question. In testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs (July 29, 2009), Ambassador Susan Rice, then U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, stated that the United States "is willing to consider directly contributing more military observers, military staff officers, civilian police, and other civilian personnel—including more women I should note—to U.N. peacekeeping operations."

What is your view on whether the United States should contribute more military personnel to both staff positions and military observers in support of U.N. peacekeeping operations?

Answer. In Afghanistan, our military commitment is shifting from combat operations to maintaining a long-term relationship with the people of Afghanistan in concert with our NATO allies. This mission shift allows us to consider other opportunities for U.S. forces and personnel to contribute to U.N. peacekeeping missions around the world on a very selective basis and under the right conditions. Our experience shows that even a small number of U.S. personnel can play an out-sized role in improving the effectiveness of U.N. operations.

Question. If confirmed, would you support identifying methods through which the DOD personnel system could be more responsive to requests for personnel support from multilateral institutions like the United Nations?

Answer. We have been responsive to requests from the U.N. for personnel support. This year, for the first time in nearly 2 decades, a U.S. general officer is helping to lead peacekeepers in a U.N. field mission. By all accounts, this officer has done a terrific job in Liberia. He is even supervising members of the Chinese People's Liberation Army. Additionally, when the U.N. requested U.S. officers for the new mission in South Sudan, U.S. Africa Command provided three of its own staff officers to deploy immediately until the Services could provide long-term fills. We are currently working with Africa Command on a similar solution for the mission in Mali. As I told Secretary General Ban Ki-moon during his visit this spring, we look forward to exploring even more opportunities to offer our leaders in support of the U.N. and other multilateral institutions.

INTERAGENCY COLLABORATION

Question. The collaboration between U.S. Special Operations Forces, general purpose forces, and other U.S. Government departments and agencies has played a significant role in the success of counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations in recent years. However, much of this collaboration has been ad hoc in nature.

What do you believe are the most important lessons learned from the collaborative interagency efforts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere?

Answer. Among other lessons, it seems clear to me that we have learned that countering insurgent and terrorist threats demands the integration of all instruments of national power toward a common purpose. Over the past decade, our interagency coordination has been occasionally uneven due to policy gaps, inconsistent resources, and differences in organizational culture. While we struggled early on to harness the full extent of our whole-of-government effort, over time, our military and civilian organizations have learned to better leverage each other's strengths. If confirmed, I am committed to institutionalizing these lessons learned even as we reset and prepare for the future.

Question. How do you believe these efforts can be improved?

Answer. It begins with leadership. We've learned that we need to stress the value of interagency coordination at all levels. For DOD, this means exposing our military personnel to a range of interagency organizations to facilitate understanding of different agency cultures, equities, capabilities, and limitations. We also incorporate interagency partners into our training and education programs, building the kinds of relationships that increase our overall effectiveness. More can be done, and if confirmed, I will work with this Congress to enhance these programs.

Question. How can the lessons learned in recent years be captured in military doctrine and adopted as "best practices" for future contingency operations?

Answer. As Chairman, I led a "Decade of War" effort to examine this question and to ensure that we do not lose the lessons of 10 years of war. Codifying our work is key. Critical doctrinal publications such as Joint Pub 3–08, "Inter-organizational Coordination during Joint Operations," capture the best practices of our recent experience. The current version was published in June 2011, and importantly, our interagency partners contributed to writing it. If confirmed, I plan to begin a formal update of this publication in the coming year.

Question. Interagency collaboration on an operational or tactical level tends to address issues on a country-by-country basis rather than on a regional basis (e.g. international terrorists departing Mali for safe havens in Libya).

How do you believe regional strategies that link efforts in individual countries can best be coordinated in the interagency arena?

Answer. Our performance in crisis situations rests on how well we collaborate on a routine basis. Therefore, I support a whole-of-government planning, operations and resourcing framework to ensure our country plans are mutually-reinforcing. The military develops Theater Campaign Plans and Functional Campaign Plans that address regional and trans-regional issues. We seek input from interagency partners in the development of these plans to de-conflict, if not complement efforts. State is beginning to develop Joint Regional Strategies to address regional foreign policy priorities and drive country strategies. This new regional perspective will improve our ability to coordinate DOD plans with State plans.

RESPONSIBILITY TO PROTECT

Question. The U.S. Government has recognized the "responsibility to protect" (R2P)—that is, the responsibility of the international community to use appropriate means to help protect populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity, by encouraging states to protect their own populations, by helping states build the capacity to do so, and by acting directly should national authorities fail to provide such protection. In its 2010 QDR, DOD names "preventing human suffering due to mass atrocities" as one of a long list of potential contingencies that DOD might be called on to address. DOD has begun to explore some of the implications of R2P, by considering "mass atrocity prevention and response operations".

In your view, how high a priority should the "responsibility to protect" be for the U.S. Government as a whole?

Answer. Preserving the capacity of the United States and its partners to prevent human suffering is a means of promoting our values and strengthening our influence around the world. Although neither the United States nor any other country recognizes the "responsibility to protect" as a legal basis for the use of military force, the U.S. Armed Forces can carry out these types of missions if called upon to do so. Prioritization is not a decision for the military to make.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of DOD, if any, in fulfilling the responsibility to protect?

Answer. The role of DOD will be to support our government's policy decision. The whole-of-government approach should involve an appropriate mix of diplomatic, economic, and/or military measures. The role of DOD will be to provide options and assess the risk associated with those options. We will also make a recommendation on the strategy for any specific situation to include those involving atrocities.

Question. In your view, what is the proper application of R2P doctrine with respect to the situation in Syria?

Answer. The conflict in Syria is as complex as any I have seen. We have an obligation to think through the efficacy and consequences of any direct U.S. military action in Syria, especially if it could create conditions that would cause more civilian casualties, unleash chemical weapons, or bring the United States into a broader regional conflict. Even as we consider the use of force, we must continue to work with our allies and partners in the region to prevent their destabilization, provide humanitarian aid, and support the Syrian opposition. The United States is providing nearly $815 million in aid to help the victims of this conflict, including emergency medical care and supplies, food, and shelter.

OPERATION OBSERVANT COMPASS & THE LORD'S RESISTANCE ARMY

Question. Despite pressure by the Ugandan People's Defense Forces (UPDF) and efforts by U.S. Special Operations personnel to support them, elements of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA)—including Joseph Kony—continue to operate and commit atrocities against civilian populations in the Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and South Sudan. Some observers have identified operational concerns with this mission, including that: (1) supported forces are trying to find an elusive foe in an area roughly the size of California, much of which is covered in thick jungle; (2) technical support to U.S. forces and their UPDF partners from the defense and intelligence community continues to be inadequate; and (3) limitations continue to be placed on the ability of U.S. Special Operations personnel to accompany UPDF partners outside of main basing locations, thereby limiting the level of direct support they can provide.

In your view, what is the objective of Operation Observant Compass?

Answer. The strategy is comprised of four elements: (1) protect civilians; (2) promote DD/RRR (disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, repatriation, and resettlement); (3) increase humanitarian access/support; and (4) remove Joseph Kony and senior LRA leaders from the region. DOD plays a role in all four pillars but is the primary agent for implementing the fourth element.

Question. Do you support the continuation of DOD's current level of support to this mission?

Answer. In the near-term, the current level of military support is appropriate. DOD is currently weighing options to determine the future level of support. DOD must prioritize limited resources among numerous competing priorities, requirements and risks to other missions. Cost is another factor being considered given the current budget constraints.

HUMAN TERRAIN IN CONFLICT

Question. In 2009, then-Secretary Gates helped launch the Minerva Initiative and the Human Social Culture Behavior Modeling Program to develop deeper social, cultural, and behavioral expertise for policy, strategy and operational purposes in the Middle East and Far East.

How have these programs contributed to our understanding the complex human terrain of these parts of the world?

Answer. Yes. The Minerva Initiative examines the social and political dynamics of present and future conflict. Research conducted under its auspices validated the COMISAF policy of "courageous restraint" (e.g. exercise patience before using force); enriched our understanding of the radicalization processes, and produced a method for empirically characterizing tribal cohesiveness, a predictor of the susceptibility to al Qaeda influence. The Human Social Culture Behavior Modeling (HSCB) Program, which forecasts instability globally, has been fielded at PACOM, SOUTHCOM, STRATCOM, and SOCOM.

Question. Are we adequately resourcing these programs and how can we improve our capabilities to understand the perceptions, attitudes, ethnic identities, religious beliefs and predispositions of the audiences we seek to reach and interact with in these regions?

Answer. Although the HSCB Modeling program concludes its 4 year program in fiscal year 2013, we continue to fund many other social science research efforts. As we learned in Iraq and Afghanistan, cultural and regional skills are key to succeeding in Irregular Warfare. Accordingly, I have mandated that they be covered in at all levels of Joint Professional Military Education curricula and in Joint Doctrine publications on Stability Operations, Counterinsurgency Operations, and Special Operations.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. Criminal networks are not only expanding their operations, but they are also diversifying their activities, resulting in a convergence of transnational threats that has evolved to become more complex, volatile, and destabilizing. The Director of National Intelligence recently described transnational organized crime as "an abiding threat to U.S. economic and national security interests," and stated that "rising drug violence and corruption are undermining stability and the rule of law in some countries" in the Western Hemisphere. In July 2011, the President released his Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing DOD support to U.S. law enforcement."

What is your understanding of the President's strategy to combat transnational criminal organizations?

Answer. The President's Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime integrates all elements of national power to combat transnational organized crime and related threats to national security. Ultimately, the strategy seeks to reduce transnational organized crime to a manageable public safety concern.

Question. What is your understanding of the Department's role within the President's strategy?

Answer. DOD is not the lead agency responsible for combatting transnational organized crime. DOD instead plays an appropriate and critically important role supporting law enforcement to counter threats to national security.

Question. In your view, should DOD play a role in providing support to the U.S. law enforcement and the Intelligence Community on matters related to transnational organized crime?

Answer. DOD provides unique supporting capabilities to address the full range of transnational criminal threats, including military intelligence support to law enforcement, military-to-military capability development, and military operational activities against threats to the U.S. DOD supports U.S. law enforcement and the Intelligence Community as part of a whole-of-government approach, consistent with current authorities.

MASS ATROCITIES PREVENTION

Question. President Obama identified the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide as a core U.S. national security interest, as well as a core moral interest, in August 2011 under Presidential Study Directive 10.

Among interagency partners, what is DOD's role in addressing atrocity threats, and what tools does DOD have for preventing or responding to atrocities?

Answer. DOD has developed Joint Doctrine for conducting Mass Atrocity Response Operations. Based on this doctrine, atrocity prevention and response is now incorporated into DOD plans and planning guidance. In addition, DOD has conducted a comprehensive review of training in this area and is working to strengthen the capacity of UN peacekeeping operations to respond to atrocity events.

Question. Has DOD developed planning processes toward this effort so that it will be able to respond quickly in emergency situations?

Answer. Yes, DOD has developed planning processes toward this effort. All DOD components have been directed to integrate atrocity prevention and response into their policies and plans. Specific plans are further developed and implemented at the geographic combatant command level, in coordination with the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Staff.

Question. In your view, is the situation in Syria a mass atrocity?

Answer. In my view, the situation in Syria is tragic and an atrocity. By some estimates as many as 100,000 combatant and non-combatants have been killed, with over 5 million displaced.

COUNTER THREAT FINANCE

Question. Identifying and disrupting key individuals, entities, and facilitation routes enabling the flow of money that supports terrorism, production of IEDs, narco-trafficking, proliferation, and other significant national security threats could have an outsized impact on confronting these threats. In August 2010, the Department issued a Counter Threat Finance (CTF) Policy Directive which recognized the CTF discipline as an essential tool in combating criminal networks and terrorist organizations and called for the integration of CTF capabilities into future force planning and the continued support to interagency partners conducting CTF operations.

What is your assessment of the Department's efforts to date to institutionalize and support these capabilities?

Answer. Upsetting the financial supply lines of our adversaries is a proven way to disrupt threats to U.S. national security. DOD Threat Finance Cells already have a track record of success in Iraq and Afghanistan. We need this capability in the Department. DOD Directive 5205.14 (CTF), updated in November 2012, institutionalizes counter threat finance within DOD. Ultimately, our success in counter threat finance will depend on our ability to integrate efforts with other U.S. Government agencies, multinational organizations, and host nations.

Question. What is your assessment of the current ability of the Department to provide support to other U.S. Government departments and agencies conducting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. DOD currently supports the efforts of other government agencies with its unique capabilities, including long-term planning, network analysis, intelligence analysis and tools, and the integration of intelligence into operations. The result is a well-coordinated, capable, and robust counter threat finance posture. If confirmed, I will continue to remain fully engaged in the interagency process to counter threat finance activities.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to DOD's current counter threat finance efforts?

Answer. The Department is examining its current counter threat finance efforts. We are focused on incorporating lessons learned from Iraq and Afghanistan and further strengthening and institutionalizing our counter threat finance capability. We may recommend additional training and education for the force.

SECTION 1208 OPERATIONS

Question. Section 1208 of the Ronald Reagan National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2005 (Public Law 108–375), as amended by subsequent bills, authorizes the provision of support (including training, funding, and equipment) to regular forces, irregular forces, and individuals supporting or facilitating military operations by U.S. Special Operations Forces to combat terrorism.

What is your current assessment of this authority?

Answer. Combatant commanders continue to view section 1208 as a key tool in the ongoing fight against terrorism. The ability for Special Operations Forces to leverage willing partners who possess access to areas, people, and information denied to our forces is critical to tactical and strategic success. This authority has allowed us to respond quickly to global challenges while maintaining appropriate civilian oversight, including Secretary of Defense approval and congressional notification. The Department is appreciative of Congress' continued support for this authority. If confirmed, I will continue to keep you informed through our annual report and briefings.

ACTIVE-DUTY AND RESERVE COMPONENT END STRENGTH

Question. Last year, DOD announced its 5-year plan to reduce Active-Duty end strengths by over 100,000 servicemembers by 2017, and the Reserve components by another 21,000 over the same period. These cuts do not include any additional personnel reductions that could result from sequestration or any agreement to avoid sequestration.

What is your view of the role of the Reserve components as the Active components draw down?

Answer. Twelve years of combat operations has transformed our Reserve component from a strategic reserve to a full-spectrum force critical to our overall military readiness. Recent combat deployments, as well as peacekeeping, humanitarian relief and homeland defense missions, have resulted in our Reserve component being far more operationally capable and experienced than before. We have yet to determine the final steady-state balance between the Active and Reserve component, in part because of continuing budget uncertainty. But going forward, the Reserve component will be an essential part of the total force.

Question. What additional military personnel reductions do you envision if the sequester continues into 2014 and beyond?

Answer. Because military personnel cannot be reduced quickly, a continuation of sequester funding levels would require DOD to take disproportionate cuts from the modernization and readiness portions of the fiscal year 2014 budget. To ensure these accounts do not bear an excessive portion of budget reductions, DOD would seek to significantly draw down the size of the military after fiscal year 2014.

Question. In your view, what tools do DOD and the Services need to get down to authorized strengths in the future, and which of these require congressional authorization?

Answer. In my view, DOD's existing force management tools provide the necessary flexibility to enable the Services to get down to authorized end strength. At this time, the Services are not requesting additional force management tools.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. In your view, do policies concerning religious accommodation in the military appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs, including individual expressions of belief, without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Yes. Our official policy states, "DOD places a high value on the rights of members of the Military Services to observe the tenets of their respective religions or to observe no religion at all." (DODI 1300.17, "Accommodation of Religious Practices Within the Military Services"). By both policy and practice, commanders are committed to ensuring members of the Joint Force of deep religious faith, as well as those of no religious faith, can serve in a climate of mutual respect and trust.

Question. Under current law and policy, are individual expressions of belief accommodated so long as they do not impact unit cohesion and good order and discipline?

Answer. Yes. Commanders consider requests for accommodation of individual expressions of belief, to include apparel, grooming and worship practices. Requests are given equal consideration as long as they do not negatively impact mission accomplishment, military readiness, unit cohesion, good order, discipline, or any other military requirement.

PREVENTION OF AND RESPONSE TO SEXUAL ASSAULTS

Question. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3,000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports (restricted, meaning that, in accordance with the victim's request, they were handled in a confidential manner and not investigated). Moreover, a recent survey conducted by DOD indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of active duty women and 1.2 percent of active duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months.

What is your assessment of the current DOD sexual assault prevention and response program?

Answer. We have taken swift, deliberate action to change a military culture that had become too complacent of discrimination, harassment, and assault. The Secretary and I, along with the Joint Chiefs, remain personally committed to eradicating sexual assault within our ranks and to improving processes and programs as part of our comprehensive approach. The Services have achieved significant progress in many areas. They have added specialized training for investigation and litigation, provided broader access to victim's advocates and Special Victim's Counsel, and hired Highly Qualified Experts to evaluate our progress. We are focused on taking care of victims, preventing the conditions that make assault possible, and enforcing respectful unit environments.

Question. What is your view of the provision for restricted and unrestricted reporting of sexual assaults?

Answer. Our primary concern remains the safety and well-being of the victim. We are taking swift and deliberate action to reinforce a professional work environment, prevent and respond to predatory and precursor behaviors, and better protect victims. Should a sexual assault occur, we prefer the victim come forward with an unrestricted report, to allow for thorough investigation and litigation. However, confidential reporting, or restricted reporting, allows a victim to access services to meet their personal needs without the additional anxiety of a criminal investigation. Moving initial disposition authority to O–6 commanders or higher has increased unrestricted reporting, and access to Special Victim's Counsel has increased victims' willingness to change a restricted report to an unrestricted report. However, both restricted and unrestricted reporting options remain essential to our response to sexual assault.

Question. What is your understanding of the adequacy of DOD oversight of military service implementation of DOD and Service policies for the prevention of and response to sexual assaults?

Answer. The Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) oversees the Department's sexual assault policy and works with the Services' offices to execute the Services' sexual assault prevention and response plans. SAPRO also works with the civilian community to develop and implement innovative prevention and response approaches to the programs. They continue to lead on this issue by informing and advising commanders at all levels. Despite their best efforts, we have not yet turned the tide on this crime in our ranks. Therefore, I will continue to support initiatives for strengthening oversight and accountability.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. The commander is central to our ability to effect institutional change. We must hold commanders accountable at every level for reinforcing the highest standards of respect and trust that all of our men and women in uniform—and the American people—deserve. The sexual assault crisis in the military is a result, in large part, of a climate that had become too complacent. We have already refined our assessments of command climate by updating the surveys that specifically enable servicemembers to evaluate their commanders on unit climate and sexual assault response. Additionally, we have moved initial disposition authority for incidents of sexual assault to the O–6 commanders or higher. We will not let up in our efforts to drive the crime of sexual violence from our ranks.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted?

Answer. The commander's role in the military justice process is longstanding and essential to the effectiveness of our Joint Force. Our commanders are responsible for the efficiency of their units first, but more broadly, it is in their hands that the defense of the Nation rests. Because of the tremendous responsibility placed in commanders, they must also have broad authority to enforce discipline and execute their duties. This is a foundational element of the military justice system. The central imperative in commanders' responsibility to accomplish their assigned missions, in peacetime and in war, is the good order and discipline of the men and women they lead. Commanders regularly consult with their judge advocates, including when deciding whether to prosecute alleged offenses. Removing commanders from the military justice process in this way would send the message that there is a lack of faith in the officer corps and that commanders cannot be trusted to mete out discipline. Such a message would surely undermine good order and discipline. Absolving commanders of their role in the military justice system would potentially undermine the military's ability to adequately address this issue. Commanders must be held accountable for maintaining a climate that does not tolerate sexual assault. Responsibility and accountability go hand-in-hand: in order to hold commanders accountable for the good order and discipline of their units, they must hold that responsibility and be empowered by the system. Disempowering commanders will not help the military tackle this problem.

Question. Article 60 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) requires the convening authority to take action on the sentence issued by a court-martial and authorizes a convening authority, in his sole discretion, to take action of the findings of a court-martial, including setting aside a finding of guilty or changing a finding of guilty to a finding of guilty of a lessor included offense.

What is your view about the authority of a convening authority to set aside or modify findings of guilt and authority to reduce a sentence imposed by court-martial?

Answer. Article 60 of the UCMJ currently grants broad authority and discretion to convening authorities to dismiss findings of guilt after trial. That authority, which dates back well over 200 years, was necessary when the military justice system lacked many of the procedural safeguards inherent in the system today. In the past, the military justice system lacked attorneys serving as trial and defense counsel, independent trial judges, and an appellate process. Article 60 was necessary so that commanders, with the advice of their staff judge advocates, could ensure the proceedings, and in particular the findings, were fair and just. Many changes to the military justice system, which began with the Military Justice Improvement Act of 1968, now provide the necessary due process and safeguards. Licensed military attorneys now serve as prosecutors and defense counsel, independent military judges preside over courts-martial, and convicted servicemembers are entitled to a robust appellate process. Due to these changes, there is little or no need for a convening authority to dismiss the findings after a panel (jury) has found the accused guilty. A convening authority should have the discretion, however, to dismiss minor offenses under appropriate circumstances, such as to prevent an accused from the burden of a felony conviction when found guilty of minor misconduct but acquitted of major offenses. Examples of such minor misconduct include underage drinking and brief absences without leave, which on their own would not normally be adjudicated by courts-marital. Rather, a convening authority should have the flexibility to adjudicate such offenses in an alternate fashion. Convening authorities should also retain the ability to modify sentences, which is an essential component of our plea bargain process.

ASSIGNMENT POLICIES FOR WOMEN IN THE MILITARY

Question. The Department, in January, rescinded the policy restricting the assignment of women to certain units which have the primary mission of engaging in direct ground combat operations, and has given the Military Services until January 1, 2016, to open all positions currently closed to women, or to request an exception to policy to keep a position closed beyond that date, an exception that must be approved by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense. The Services are working now to develop gender-free physical and mental standards for all military occupations, presumably with the goal of allowing individuals, regardless of gender, to serve in those positions if they can meet those standards.

If confirmed, what role will you play in the development of these standards?

Answer. Women continue to serve with distinction throughout the Armed Forces, and the successful integration of women into currently closed positions requires thoughtful planning and deliberate action as we proceed. I am working with the Services to provide quarterly reports to the Secretary of Defense on the progress of requirements review and validation, the timeline for opening closed occupations, limiting factors to executing implementation, positions being considered for an exception to policy, and an assessment of newly integrated positions. All our standards should be reviewed to make sure they are essential to the occupation and task. Full implementation should occur by January 1, 2014. Ultimately, we're acting to strengthen the Joint Force.

Question. Will you ensure that the standards will be realistic and will preserve, or enhance, military readiness and mission capability?

Answer. The Service Chiefs and I identified guiding principles to better align our policies with the experiences we have had over the past decade of war. This means setting clear, essential, gender-neutral standards of performance for all occupations based on what it actually takes to do the job. With the Joint Chiefs, I am closely monitoring each of the Services as they develop their implementation plans and providing quarterly reports to the Secretary of Defense. Effective planning and implementation requires that we appropriately integrate women into the organizational culture of certain military occupations.

Question. Do you believe that decisions to open positions should be based on bona fide military requirements?

Answer. Yes. Performance standards exist to ensure individuals can accomplish the tasks required of the mission. Eligibility for training and development should consist of qualitative and quantifiable standards reflecting the knowledge, skills, and abilities necessary for each occupation as required by Public Law 103–160, section 543 (1993).

Question. If so, what steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that such decisions are made on this basis?

Answer. I will continue to work with the Joint Chiefs to ensure changes are carefully reviewed and implemented so our service women are set up for long-term success with viable career paths. This deliberate process will anticipate second- and third-order effects while guarding against unintended consequences. Our force deserves our full faith and commitment that we get this right.

Question. Some family members have expressed concerns about assigning women to what are currently male-only combat units.

To what extent do you believe that this will be a problem in the implementation of this policy?

Answer. I think families recognize the bravery and sacrifice of women in combat, especially over the past decade of war. The successful integration of women into currently closed positions requires we be thoughtful and deliberate in planning. One of my guiding principles is to also ensure a sufficient cadre of midgrade and senior female enlisted and officers are assigned to commands, to become established members of the command and to act as mentors to younger women as they integrate into the unit. These mentors will help establish a climate of trust and support.

Question. If it is a problem, what steps would you take if confirmed to address it?

Answer. I will continue to hold the Services accountable to open all specialties, as the Secretary of Defense and I must personally approve any request for exceptions to policy. If members of our military can meet the qualifications for a job, then they should have the right to serve, regardless of creed, color, gender or sexual orientation.

RISING COSTS OF MEDICAL CARE

Question. In testimony presented to Congress in February 2009, the Assistant Director of the Congressional Budget Office asserted that "medical funding accounts for more than one-third of the growth projected for operations and support funding between 2009 and 2026." In April 2009, then Secretary of Defense Gates told an audience at Maxwell Air Force Base that "health care is eating the Department alive." In recent years, the Department has attempted to address the growth in overall health care costs by identifying efficiencies as well as by proposing increased cost shares for military retirees.

What reforms in infrastructure, benefits, or benefit management, if any, do you think should be examined in order to control the costs of military health care?

Answer. Quality health care is a critical component to having a fit and ready force. We are examining fiscal year 2014 options to slow the growth of health care costs while preserving the quality and enhancing the range of health care services available to the Military Family. Reform to control costs is essential to making healthcare more sustainable. If confirmed, I will continue to assist the Secretary of Defense in this comprehensive review of benefit payment structures, organizational structure, systems, and policies to improve affordability.

Question. What is your assessment of the long-term impact of rising medical costs on future DOD plans?

Answer. Health care costs consume 10 percent of the department's budget. In real terms, costs have tripled since 2001 and are forecasted to nearly double again by 2030. Increasing health care costs will inhibit future force readiness as competing requirements confront a decreasing top line. Health care is key to retaining high quality servicemembers and to keeping faith with our entire military family. I will continue to work closely with DOD leadership and Congress to find reasonable and responsible ways to slow this growth.

Question. If confirmed, what actions would you initiate or recommend to mitigate the effect of such costs on the DOD top-line?

Answer. Over the last several budget cycles, Congress has permitted small, necessary increases in the TRICARE Prime enrollment fees. These adjustments were an important step to managing costs, but they are not enough to sustain the benefit in the long term. Given today's budget environment, we must find a mutually acceptable compromise to reduce health costs while still maintaining the quality of care our force and our veterans deserve. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Secretary of Defense and this Congress to do so.

SYSTEMS AND SUPPORT FOR WOUNDED WARRIORS

Question. Servicemembers who are or have been wounded and injured in combat operations deserve the highest priority from their Service for support services, healing and recuperation, rehabilitation, evaluation for return to duty, successful transition from active duty when appropriate, and continuing support beyond retirement or discharge. Yet, as the revelations at Walter Reed Army Medical Center (WRAMC) in 2007 illustrated, the Services were not prepared to meet the needs of significant numbers of returning wounded servicemembers. Despite the enactment of legislation and continuing emphasis, many challenges remain, including a growing population of servicemembers awaiting disability evaluation.

What is your assessment of the progress made to date by DOD, the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA), and the Services to improve the care, management, and transition of seriously ill and injured servicemembers and their families?

Answer. We have made substantial progress in medical care over the last 12 years of war. From first responder care to joint battlefield surgical care, from the Air Force's enroute care to advanced rehabilitation provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs, the medical advances we've made are, quite literally, lifesaving and world changing. In other arenas, particularly those surrounding family and transition, we have been slower to make progress. We are structured to fight and win wars, but are not as well prepared to manage a large population of transitioning servicemembers. We are making progress within the boundaries of law, but I am committed to improving our efforts and results.

Question. What are the strengths upon which continued progress should be based?

Answer. We can make further progress by leveraging the collaboration on research and treatment between the private medical research and healthcare sectors and our Centers of Excellence. These partnerships have made significant strides in the care of our Wounded Warriors and on the health of our Total Force. We have successfully returned many of our Wounded Warriors to service. We have also established robust, day-to-day collaboration with the Department of Veterans Affairs. It is not uncommon for VA providers to speak directly to battlefield providers, and such end-to-end feedback directly benefits veterans' care. We also have uniformed servicemembers working in VA facilities and VA benefits personnel working in our medical facilities, to better serve the large population of servicemembers transitioning to civilian life.

Question. What are the weaknesses that need to be corrected?

Answer. Individual case management needs further improvement. This involves a servicemember transitioning from the Active Force to DOD retiree or eligible veteran status. The key components of this process remain the implementation of a single electronic health record, which follows the servicemember through transition, and a single tracking tool for case management. Our ability to communicate across our individual bureaucracies continues to be an area requiring our full attention and effort.

Question. If confirmed, are there additional strategies and resources that you would pursue to increase support for wounded servicemembers and their families, and to monitor their progress in returning to duty or to civilian life?

Answer. As the conflict in Afghanistan winds down, I recognize the importance of preserving the knowledge, skills, and advances made in caring for our wounded servicemembers over the past decade. Last month, I asked the Defense Health Board to make a high priority the ability to sustain current practices and continuing advancements in treatment and rehabilitation for our seriously wounded servicemembers and their families.

Question. Studies conducted as a result of the revelations at WRAMC pointed to the need to reform the disability evaluation system (DES). The Integrated Disability Evaluation System (IDES) was established to integrate DOD and Department of Veterans Affairs disability systems to improve and expedite processing of servicemembers through the disability evaluation system.

What is your assessment of the need to further streamline and improve the DES?

Answer. In addition to the changes we have already made, Senator Dole's and Secretary Shalala's commission recommended further statutory changes to limit DOD to the "ability" business and of the VA to the "disability" business in keeping with each department's core competencies. I support their commission's recommendations. Barring legislative change to establish a single system, we have gone about as far and as fast as we can with separate processes and systems.

Question. If confirmed, how will you address any need for change?

Answer. I will continue to do my very best to expedite transition and disability processing within the bounds of law and my authorities. I will advocate for governance process improvements and other system upgrade to streamline and simplify the process.

SUICIDE PREVENTION AND MENTAL HEALTH RESOURCES

Question. The numbers of suicides in each of the Services continues to concern the Committee.

In your view, what role should the Joint Chiefs of Staff play in shaping policies to help prevent suicides both in garrison and in theater and to increase the resiliency of all servicemembers and their families, including members of the Reserve components?

Answer. The Joint Chiefs have a shared responsibility to address military suicides with the same devotion we have shown to protecting the lives of our forces in combat. I am working closely with the chiefs, our interagency partners, and the White House to increase our understanding of the factors leading to suicide and how to best leverage care networks to keep our servicemembers and veterans alive.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to ensure that sufficient mental health resources are available to servicemembers in theater, and to the servicemembers and their families upon return to home station?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to champion the fielding of effective treatments for mental health issues, traumatic brain injury, and combat stress. This includes the robust system of behavioral health care resources that are already available in the Afghanistan Theater of Operations. I will also continue my support of the Services to reduce the stigma and remove barriers to seeking mental health services for both servicemembers and their family members. This effort must include steps to ensure subordinate commands praise help-seeking behavior and promote reaching out by providing examples of servicemembers who have benefitted from mental health assistance or counseling.

MILITARY QUALITY OF LIFE

Question. The committee is concerned about the sustainment of key quality of life programs for military families, such as family support, child care, education, employment support, health care, and morale, welfare and recreation services, especially as DOD faces budget challenges.

If confirmed, what further enhancements, if any, to military quality of life programs would you consider a priority in an era of intense downward pressure on budgets, and how do you envision working with the Services, combatant commanders, family advocacy groups, and Congress to achieve them?

Answer. The entire enterprise is under scrutiny, and we are seeking a way to balance the needs of providing security to the Nation and ensure the long-term viability of the All-Volunteer Force. Part of our evaluation has focused on providing a quality of life for servicemembers and their families that fosters successful recruitment, retention, and career progression. We are also looking to modernize and achieve fiscal sustainability for the compensation and retirement systems. The mental health of our servicemembers is also a priority. We will work to ensure that the downward pressure of budgets does not adversely impact this vital area. I have my Joint Staff positioned on working groups, task forces and other venues to work together with the Services and other concerned parties to ensure we keep faith with our military family in these areas.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Military members and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of growing concerns among military families as a result of the stress of frequent deployments and the long separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for servicemembers and their families?

Answer. According to recent Family Readiness surveys, military families are most concerned about pay and benefits and retirement. DOD is fully engaged through the Pay and Retirement Working Group, which feeds recommendations to the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Executive Committee to address these concerns. In my judgment, families are also attuned to the need for our compensation system to be sustainable.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support the Services as they assess military family needs and program effectiveness. Unsustainable costs and smaller budgets mean we must examine every warrior and family support program to make sure we are getting the best return on our investment. We must promote the most effective programs across the force and carefully reduce duplicative efforts. This ongoing effort includes current studies—via DODEA, DECA, and a number of university partnerships—to identify best practices and evaluate the value of existing programs. This effort also includes: the restructuring of medical facilities [included in the fiscal year 2014 budget] to make them more efficient, without sacrificing quality or continuity of care as well as fee adjustments that exempt disabled retirees, survivors of servicemembers who died on active duty, and their family members.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. As stated above, if confirmed I will continue to work with the Services to meet the changing needs of our military families. Part of this effort involves working with the White House and the Services to support community-based partnerships to improve education, employment, and wellness support for current and transitioning members. The Services have also adjusted force size and rotation, redoubled transition support, and invested in world-class health care for our wounded. This includes the fielding of effective treatments for mental health issues, traumatic brain injury, and combat stress. It also entails the push to reduce the stigma and remove barriers to seeking mental health services for both servicemembers and their family members.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to active duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. We have a duty to ensure every family has access to quality resources, regardless of component or location. If confirmed, I will continue to support the Services' effort to leverage public-private partnerships within the communities. We will also continue to leverage the State Joint Force Headquarters of the National Guard to help members access child care, mental health services, employment opportunities and many other services that bolster family readiness.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to enhance family support?

Answer. In my 2012 Strategic Direction to the Joint Force, I identified "Keeping Faith with our Military Family" as one of my four focus areas during my tenure as Chairman. Keeping faith with our military family recognizes the military family's extraordinary contributions, preserves trust, and supports them in the ways they need most. If confirmed, I will continue this focus with the Services. Today, we are actively involved in Family Support Working Groups, Resource Management Decision Working Groups and other venues to ensure program effectiveness, share best practices, and reduce duplication of efforts. America's citizens have also stepped forward. From the local to the national level, thousands of organizations, higher learning institutions, and businesses have partnered to support our Military Family.

OPERATIONAL ENERGY BUDGETING

Question. Since Congress created the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Operational Energy Plans and Programs, much progress has been made in a few short years in these programs.

In what specific areas, if any, do you believe the Department needs to improve the incorporation of energy considerations into the strategic planning and force development processes?

Answer. We have a comprehensive Department strategy which addresses energy challenges and leverages opportunities for the current and future force. For all new weapon systems, there is now an Energy Key Performance Parameter that must be considered during the system requirements process. Operationally, we are making strides to improve electrical generation efficiency in Afghanistan through the use of micro-grids, reducing the individual soldier battery requirements through solar power technology, and testing advanced renewable energy technologies in the battlefield environments. We have made much progress and will continue to focus on incorporating energy considerations in wargames and joint exercises in order to improve our strategic planning and force development.

Question. In what specific areas, if any, do you believe the Department should increase funding for operational energy requirements, energy efficiency, alternative energy, and renewable energy opportunities?

Answer. Each Service has invested significant resources to address operational energy requirements. My primary emphasis remains on reducing operational energy dependence to provide increased operational flexibility, combat effectiveness, force protection, and mobility options for Joint Commanders. I am focused on fully understanding the energy requirements of our Joint Force and will continue to support the Service initiatives to reduce our energy demands across the force.

LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

Question. You have previously expressed your support for U.S. accession to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Do you still believe that the United States should join the Law of the Sea Convention (LOSC), and, if so, why?

Answer. Yes, I testified in support of the United States becoming a party to the LOSC before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in May 2012. Being a party to LOSC enhances the United States' security posture by reinforcing freedom of navigation and over flight rights vital to ensuring our global force posture and demonstrating our commitment to the rule of law. It strengthens our credibility and brings the full force of our influence in challenging excessive maritime claims.

DETAINEE TREATMENT POLICY

Question. Do you support the policy set forth in the July 7, 2006, memorandum issued by the Deputy Secretary of Defense stating that all relevant DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures must fully comply with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the revised Army Field Manual on Interrogations, FM 2–22.3, issued in September 2006, and in DOD Directive 2310.01E, the Department of Defense Detainee Program, dated September 5, 2006?

Answer. Yes.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that all DOD policies promulgated and plans implemented related to intelligence interrogations, detainee debriefings, and tactical questioning comply with the Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and the Army Field Manual on Interrogations?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you share the view that standards for detainee treatment must be based on the principle of reciprocity, that is, that we must always keep in mind the risk that the manner in which we treat our own detainees may have a direct impact on the manner in which U.S. soldiers, sailors, airmen, or marines are treated, should they be captured in future conflicts?

Answer. I continue to share the view that the way in which we treat detainees may have a direct impact on the manner in which U.S. forces are treated should they be captured in future conflicts.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KAY R. HAGAN

ARMY CAMOUFLAGE PROGRAM

1. Senator HAGAN. General Dempsey, I understand the Army has conducted an extensive development program for the next-generation of camouflage patterns for combat uniforms. I commend the Army for working to ensure our warfighters have the best possible signature management and concealment in their combat ensembles. My understanding is that a decision has been made on the family of patterns that will be issued to Army soldiers but that the announcement has been delayed.

As we remain deployed in Afghanistan, I am concerned that this delay is preventing our soldiers from having the best camouflage possible. I am further concerned as this delay is having a severe impact on what is left of the industrial base in the United States that manufactures the textiles and uniforms that support the armed services. Orders for the current Army camouflage pattern have slowed dramatically, as procurement officers have slowed purchasing so as to not have inventory of a soon-to-be obsolete pattern. This is causing layoffs and possible plant closings across the United States. What is the status of the Army camouflage program and when do they plan on making the announcement?

General DEMPSEY. Soldiers in Afghanistan are not at risk of harm associated with the current camouflage pattern. Deployed forces are provided the Operation Enduring Freedom Camouflage Pattern (OCP) uniform, with matching individual equipment. The OCP is the optimal camouflage solution for that operating environment and has proven effective in providing our soldiers with the necessary concealment capability.

The Army is nearing completion for the scientifically-based camouflage study, which constituted the most extensive uniform camouflage study ever undertaken with extensive soldier involvement. No final decision has been made regarding any camouflage pattern or the Army's timeline for introducing a future pattern uniform.

We recognize and are sensitive to the issues facing industry while this decision is pending. In anticipation of a potential pattern change, the Army has taken fiscally prudent steps to avoid building large inventories of uniforms and Organizational Clothing and Individual Equipment in the current Universal Camouflage Pattern (UCP) that would otherwise be rendered obsolete and require disposal. The Army's objective is to spend wisely, and thereby avoid having a large stockpile of items in UCP that may not be used.

AFGHAN WOMEN

2. Senator HAGAN. General Dempsey, Afghan women have made remarkable hard-fought strides since 2001. During my recent trip to Afghanistan and through other discussions here in Washington, I recently learned that we are beginning to terminate or descope many programs that are intended to build Afghan society, specifically programs involving women and domestic issues. The targets established by the Afghan Government for female recruitment to the Afghan National Security Force (ANSF) are 5,000 women in the Afghan National Police (ANP) by the end of 2014 and 10 percent of the overall Afghan National Army (ANA) force size. While cultural factors have made recruiting and retaining Afghan female police officers and army personnel more challenging, the effort to expand female participation in the ANSF is under-resourced and under-prioritized. Recent hearings have identified that there are numerous examples of descoping and cancellation of programs to support, recruit, professionalize, and train women in the ANSF.

Please provide your views on how best we can sustain and enhance our earlier efforts to recruit, train, and mentor women into the ANSF so that these hard-won gains will continue to benefit Afghanistan after our drawdown.

General DEMPSEY. There is no simple solution to an issue directly related to the cultural and social realities of Afghanistan. Current measures to ensure the continued recruitment of women for all elements of the ANSF must remain in place. Financial incentives and international encouragement will be the primary tools to promote the recruitment, support, and training of women in the ANSF. I see two elements that must be addressed to maintain progress. The first is maintaining the standards within the ANSF to ensure it remains a positive and respected organization with critical roles for women in the Army and Police. The second is sustainment and enhancement of ANSF public messaging and efforts to recruit and train women. Eventually, this could help to change the cultural acceptance of women serving in these roles within Afghan society. In any case, our continued involvement in the development of the ANSF is our best chance to encourage positive change in this issue over time.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

SEQUESTRATION AND A HOLLOW FORCE

3. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your professional judgment, are defense budget cuts currently hollowing out the readiness and training of our Armed Forces?

General DEMPSEY. Prior to sequestration, the Joint Force faced the simultaneous challenge of reconstituting the force and restoring its ability to conduct the full spectrum of operations—much broader operations than the limited mission conducted in Afghanistan. Now, with sequestration, we are prioritizing the readiness of our deployed and next to deploy forces at the expense of reconstituting the majority of the nondeployed force. While this approach provides ready forces to meet current and near-term force requirements, it comes at the expense of modernization and future readiness. In broad terms, current defense budget constraints are creating a gap between our strategy and the means required to accomplish it. The cuts are deep. More challenging, they are historically steep. We are in fact hollowing out the readiness of the force.

4. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, has the President been made aware of this assessment?

General DEMPSEY. Yes.

5. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, if sequestration continues into 2014, will the hollowing out of the armed forces accelerate?

General DEMPSEY. I am very concerned about the loss of readiness across the Department. This challenge may not accelerate, but it is sure to persist.

The fiscal year 2013 sequestration cuts were not strategy based or strategy uniformed. The impact of sequestration and other budget constraints are beginning to emerge in unit level readiness reports. The longer-term effects caused by the cancellation of large force exercises and deferred maintenance are difficult to measure at this time but will certainly impose significant strain on long-term institutional readiness. The continuation of sequestration into 2014 will compound these effects since readiness and modernization are essentially the only levers available to achieve the magnitude of cuts required by the sequestration mechanism. By definition, continuation of sequestration will result in a less ready, less modern force. Due to the reality that it takes longer to restore readiness than it does to lose it, continued sequestration will pose institutional challenges far beyond 2014.

6. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, do you currently have a plan to reverse this deteriorating trend?

General DEMPSEY. One of the overarching priorities of the Strategic Choices and Management Review (SCMR) was to look first at savings gained from reducing overhead and structural costs ("tail") in order to minimize the impact on the capability and readiness of the force ("tooth"). As stated by the Secretary, a top priority in future year budget plans is to build a ready force. We have a responsibility to defend the country, no matter the size of our budget. The Services and defense agencies are now in the midst of determining the shape, size, and readiness of a military operating with severely reduced long-term funding.

A plan to "reverse" deterioration would depend on how long the sequestration mechanism remains in effect, how small we make the force, and how much savings we can harvest from institutional reform.

7. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what has the Secretary's Strategic Choices review found with respect to risk for our military under sequestration? In other words, under sequestration, what can't we do that we must do?

General DEMPSEY. The SCMR showed that we will not be able to implement immediate significant cuts strategically. If significant and abrupt cuts are directed, we will risk fielding an unprepared force.

We are looking for ways to make these immediate cuts in the least damaging way, but because up to half of the Department's budget is placed off limits from savings—for example, we cannot generate quick savings from cutting personnel and infrastructure—the only way to implement an abrupt 10 percent reduction is to impose disproportionate reductions in training, maintenance, and investment. Readiness, in some cases, would continue to decline beyond current degraded levels. We would also be forced to make disproportionately large cuts in funding for modernization programs, eroding our technological superiority and damaging our Better Buying Power initiatives.

8. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in addition to devastating readiness, how will the sequester in fiscal year 2014 impact the Department of Defense (DOD) plans in the Pacific? Army and Marine Corps end strength? The Joint Strike Fighter? Shipbuilding? Missile Defense? Military space programs?

General DEMPSEY. Over a longer term, sequester in fiscal year 2014 through fiscal year 2021 would seriously disrupt our forces and programs, requiring that we substantially modify and scale back the new defense strategy.

Continued sequestration would inevitably disrupt DOD's investment programs, including the Joint Strike Fighter, Shipbuilding, Missile Defense, and Military space programs. Under current mechanical rules that govern the sequester process, every one of our more than 2,500 procurement programs, research projects, and military construction projects would be indiscriminately reduced. Some military managers would be forced to buy fewer weapons. Reductions in quantities will likely cause unit costs of weapons to rise, which will in turn demand further cuts in quantities.

9. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your advance policy question response you said: "The recent Strategic Choices and Management Review affirmed the fundamental soundness of the [January 2012] Defense Strategic Guidance," but you also said, "The Department is still in the process of determining what revisions might be necessary to align ends, ways, and means given the additional $500 billion in cuts," and " . . . we are at risk of strategy insolvency if sequestration is implemented as currently prescribed by law." You seem to be saying simultaneously that in the context of sequestration, our current strategic guidance works fine, is under revision, and doesn't work. Will sequestration require a new defense strategy? Please answer yes or no and explain why.

General DEMPSEY. Yes. Full sequestration will cause us to relook the Defense Strategic Guidance (DSG) in terms of changing objectives and timelines. The missions that the military is called to do were re-affirmed in the SCMR. However, to complete these missions successfully, with further reduced means resulting from sequestration, we will need to rebalance our ends, ways, and means. For example, there may be things that can no longer be done simultaneously due to readiness or availability of units at a given time. If we fail to adjust the ends and ways with the sequestration cuts that require $50 billion every year, the resulting decrease in readiness and modernization could render the existing strategy insolvent.

10. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your professional opinion, should defense strategies continue to be adjusted to meet diminishing budgets or should defense budgets be guided by a sound defense strategy that meets our national security objectives?

General DEMPSEY. We need to have a budget informed strategy, not a budget driven strategy. Our budget should be guided by an agreed upon strategy that meets our national security objectives. Adjusting our ends, ways, and means in order to maintain an acceptable balance is a part of any strategy; however, the strategy should not be derived solely from the budget.

11. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your view, do we have adequate and ready forces today to be able to simultaneously carry out operational plans for two major contingency operations? If not, how does this impact your assessment to commit forces to a major regional contingency?

General DEMPSEY. It would depend on which two major contingency operations, and the nature, size, and scope of the simultaneity and desired end states. We regularly conduct "bundled" plan assessments to determine our ability to meet simultaneous requirements of specific operational plans. In certain high priority, resource demanding and high consequence scenarios, we are challenged to meet the demands of our operational plans with adequate and ready forces. In these instances, we review the mitigation options and residual risk resulting from delayed timelines and modified objectives to assess the risk to forces and successful plan execution.

My assessment on the feasibility of committing force to contingencies is always informed by other global commitments and the degree to which our most important national security interests are effected.

DEFENSE STRATEGY

12. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, you talk about strategy in terms of balancing ends, ways, and means, and the need to balance ambition and means. This sounds eerily similar to the rationalization used by European nations to reduce defense spending to the extent that defense spending at 2 percent of Gross Domestic Product (GDP) is a distant memory and we are looking at an average of our allies that will approach 1 percent of GDP. Our defense strategy must address threats to national security. Do you agree that sequestration will result in unacceptable risk to the military's ability to address national security threats creating a situation of strategic insolvency?

General DEMPSEY. Sequestration's mechanism and magnitude, unmitigated, will increase risk to the military's responsibilities as they are currently defined and create unacceptable risk to our national security. My sense is that if sequestration continues the Nation will have a military that is increasingly unready, steadily losing technology overmatch to challengers and unable to maintain global presence and posture. It is a military that will be viewed with increasing concern by our longtime allies and with increasing satisfaction by our potential adversaries. It is a military that will offer our civilian leaders fewer options and higher opportunity costs when they decide to employ military force. I will provide additional specifics related to impacts of sequestration in my next classified Chairman's Risk Assessment submitted with PB15.

13. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, if we continually rebalance ends, ways, and means due to resource constraints, our military strategy becomes resource-driven and not threat-driven, eventually resulting in a strategy that only works at the level of unacceptable risk. The Quadrennial Defense Review (QDR) is supposed to be threat driven by design. Are you committed to a QDR that provides recommendations that are not resource-constrained?

General DEMPSEY. I am committed to conducting the QDR in a manner that focuses on the threats in our current and predicted environment during the time horizon covered by the QDR.

14. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, how will you know when the risk to our national interests assumed by a reduction in defense budgets and a subsequent revised defense strategy becomes unacceptable?

General DEMPSEY. Risk to the strategy becomes unacceptable when we no longer have trained and ready troops to respond to contingencies that threaten our national security interests.

LEGACY

15. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your professional judgment, at full sequestration will the elimination of brigades, ships, and squadrons incur unacceptable risk to our national security by not having enough forces to carry out even one major contingency operation with enough reserves to deter a second adversary? For example, does a potential looming crisis or conflict with Iran constrain your options to take or propose other military actions due to resource limitations?

General DEMPSEY. I am concerned that full sequestration is significantly impacting military readiness, increasing risks especially in the event of multiple contingencies.

16. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, given the current path of the readiness of the armed forces, in your professional judgment, when will the Commander in Chief be at that point of making immoral decisions?

General DEMPSEY. Risk rises significantly when we no longer have trained and ready troops to respond to contingencies that threaten our national security interests. I am evaluating the impact of full sequester on readiness and plan to provide my assessment to Congress once complete.

17. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, while I understand that no military leader wants to shy away from a battle, whether it be with an adversary or otherwise, what would be your course of action if given an order to deploy troops into harm's way that are of insufficient numbers, degraded capability, or not ready?

General DEMPSEY. My military advice would depend on the nature of the threat. But let me assure you that if the Nation is threatened, we will deploy in its defense. That said, I am very concerned that we will have fewer options, that our deterrent effect will be diminished, and that military action will result in more casualties if we fail to maintain our high state of readiness because of budget uncertainty.

18. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, how will you know when this point has come?

General DEMPSEY. We are watching for several indicators. Sequester increases unready forces, misaligned global posture, reduced security cooperation, and decline of the All-Volunteer Force. I am especially concerned about the All-Volunteer Force. Today we have the most seasoned, professional military force in history. Budget reductions, inflexibility, and uncertainty increasingly threaten training, readiness, recruiting, and retention.

19. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, each American who is graced with the privilege to serve and sacrifice for this great Nation at some point becomes keenly aware of the history and legacy that they will leave to those that follow. What do you hope will be your legacy as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and how do we avoid the legacy of being in charge during the age of a hollow force?

General DEMPSEY. Every military leader—myself included—works tirelessly to preserve the culture of service you describe in defense of our Nation. During this period of historic transition, I want to set the conditions for the force of tomorrow. The fiscal pressures we face increasingly challenge our ability to field a future force that is balanced and has sufficiently levels of readiness. To achieve this, we need the certainty of an approved budget, the flexibility to make tradeoffs, and time to absorb budget cuts. The responsibility for tomorrow's force rests on the efforts of us all—those in uniform and our elected officials.

READINESS AND FLYING HOUR CUTS

20. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, due to a recently approved reprogramming, the Air Force was able to move $208 million into flying hour funds. Why couldn't DOD do this before April 9, 2013? Was it due to a lack of flexibility in moving funds within the DOD budget?

General DEMPSEY. Yes, both the NDAA and fiscal year 2013 enacted budgets were 3 and 6 months late respectively, which resulted in a 6 month Continuing Resolution that limited our flexibility (transfer authority) to move money between major budget categories and into flying hour funds. The Air Force's limited Operations and Maintenance transfer authority of $15 million was insufficient to restore any reasonable portion of the $591 million flying hour reduction resulting from sequestration in fiscal year 2013. Consequently, the lack of flexibility and reduction in Operations & Maintenance funds resulted in the Air Force grounding some flying squadrons on April 9, 2013. The reprogramming action completed in July gave the Air Force the authority to shift $1.6 billion from other appropriations into critical Operations & Maintenance funds to minimize the impact on readiness, $208 million of which was applied towards the Air Force flying hour program.

21. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, I believe DOD was short approximately $11 billion in overseas contingency operations (OCO) funding and has requested that $9.6 billion be reprogrammed from the base budget. If DOD received full funding for overseas contingency operations, what impact would that have had on DOD operations and readiness as a whole, to include Air Force flying hours?

General DEMPSEY. The President's fiscal year 2013 OCO budget fully funded wartime operations based on our best estimates 2 years ago. However, during execution of the fiscal year 2013 budget in the spring of 2013, the Department identified a shortfall of between $7–$10 billion, conservatively, in OCO funds due to a combination of sequestration reductions against both the Base and OCO O&M budgets and higher than forecasted wartime operating costs, including fuel, retrograde transportation, etc.

To ensure we could properly conduct wartime operations and to help minimize some of the devastating impacts to base budget readiness, the Department requested $9.6 billion in reprogramming authority from Congress. Because it was unclear how much of the reprogramming action would be approved, the Services continued scrutinizing their budget activities to find additional resources to address the funding shortfall. Ultimately, Congress approved the majority of the requested fiscal year 2013 reprogramming actions, allowing the Department to appropriately fund wartime operations and mitigate a portion of the impacts to readiness in the Air Force Flying Hour Program. Ultimately, the curtailed readiness activities will have a cumulative effect in fiscal year 2014, which will be amplified with further sequestration.

22. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, how many additional hours will have to be dedicated to bring all these units and its aircrews back up to mission-ready status?

General DEMPSEY. As of today, there are 18 squadrons in the Air Force still flying at reduced levels of readiness. An additional 7,000 flying hours at a cost of $116 million above the PB14 request and 3–6 months would be necessary to bring these remaining 18 squadrons from current (lower than Basic Mission Capable) flying rates back to pre-sequester mission status (Combat Mission Ready flying rates).

Prior to sequestration, a substantial number of Air Force squadrons were already operating at lower than optimal goals due to previous Budget Control Act (BCA) reductions and the effects of long-term high operations tempo. On 9 April, a total of 31 squadrons were stood down, including 13 combat-coded (fighter, bomber, and AWACS) units and 18 institutional units (Weapons School, Aggressors, Thunderbirds, etc.). Through efficiencies and the $208 million from the DOD reprogramming request, the Air Force was able to shift funds and increase the flying rates of the 13 combat coded units back to Combat Mission Ready (CMR) rates for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. It will take 3–6 months at this CMR rate before these squadrons return to pre-sequestration mission ready rates. The efficiencies and reprogramming also allowed the remaining 18 institutional units to resume flying, albeit lower than Basic Mission Capable (BMC) rates.

The Air Force will continue to have readiness challenges due to the BCA and sequestration, beyond the units that were stood down. To bring all Air Force flying squadrons back to full mission readiness goals needed to meet Defense Strategic Guidance requirements, it would take approximately 2 years, an additional $3.2 billion per year in fiscal year 2014 and fiscal year 2015, and a reduction in current deployment tempo (e.g. deploy-to-dwell at 1:3 or better).

23. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, how much will that cost?

General DEMPSEY. As of today, there are 18 squadrons in the Air Force still flying at reduced levels of readiness. An additional 7,000 flying hours at a cost of $116 million above the PB14 request and 3–6 months would be necessary to bring these remaining 18 squadrons from current (lower than Basic Mission Capable) flying rates back to pre-sequester mission status (Combat Mission Ready flying rates).

Prior to sequestration, a substantial number of Air Force squadrons were already operating at lower than optimal goals due to previous BCA reductions and the effects of long-term high operations tempo. On 9 April, a total of 31 squadrons were stood down, including 13 combat-coded (fighter, bomber, and AWACS) units and 18 institutional units (Weapons School, Aggressors, Thunderbirds, etc.). Through efficiencies and the $208 million from the DOD reprogramming request, the Air Force was able to shift funds and increase the flying rates of the 13 combat coded units back to CMR rates for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. It will take 3–6 months at this CMR rate before these squadrons return to pre-sequestration mission ready rates. The efficiencies and reprogramming also allowed the remaining 18 institutional units to resume flying, albeit lower than Basic Mission Capable (BMC) rates.

The Air Force will continue to have readiness challenges due to the BCA and sequestration, beyond the units that were stood down. To bring all Air Force flying squadrons back to full mission readiness goals needed to meet Defense Strategic Guidance requirements, it would take approximately 2 years, an additional $3.2 billion per year in fiscal year 2014 and fiscal year 2015, and a reduction in current deployment tempo (e.g. deploy-to-dwell at 1:3 or better).

24. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what happens to these units on October 1, 2013, when sequestration hits again?

General DEMPSEY. Given the nature of the cuts in fiscal year 2013, we had no flexibility in managing squadron readiness. If sequester hits in fiscal year 2014, we will be able to rotationally stand-down units, or fly them at reduced rates, similar to actions we took in fiscal year 2013. The net effect of cuts spread over the full fiscal year versus just 7 months will lead to readiness levels slightly higher than under sequester in fiscal year 2013, but still well below pre-sequester—and already sub-optimal—readiness levels. This will significantly erode our training and force development efforts, and increase risk in our ability to fill OPLAN and the Secretary of Defense ordered missions.

IRAN NUCLEAR WEAPONS

25. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your professional military opinion, do you think sanctions will prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons capability?

General DEMPSEY. The United States and its allies have put in place against Iran tough, smart, and crippling sanctions. However, sanctions alone were not designed to, nor will they, prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear capability. The purpose of these sanctions is to bring Iran back to the negotiating table with the P5+1.

26. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what timeline do you think Israel is on for taking kinetic action after Prime Minister Netanyahu's remarks this weekend?

General DEMPSEY. We do not think Israel has made a decision to strike Iran. We fully support Israel's right to self-defense.

27. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, does a potential looming crisis or conflict with Iran constrain your options to take military action in other parts of the world due to resource limitations? Specifically, are you concerned that taking action in Syria, combined with readiness and resource impacts due to budget cuts and sequestration, invites too much strategic risk if friction with Iran results in a conflict in the Gulf as well?

General DEMPSEY. The Department maintains a robust military presence in the region to deter or counter destabilizing activities, reassure allies and partners, and safeguard the region's vital links to the international community. We are currently postured to respond to contingencies in the Gulf and are watching Syria very closely. Military involvement in Syria may impact contingency plans for Iran. The impacts depend on the level of military intervention. A small-scale intervention along the lines of training and equipping an opposition force would likely have little effect on our readiness vis-a-vis Iran. However, a larger scale intervention that entails implementing a no fly zone, suppressing enemy air defenses, and/or executing punitive strikes against regime forces will likely draw from resources that could be used in an Iran contingency. So, depending on the nature of the Iranian contingency, heavy involvement in Syria could strain our ability to sustain our forces simultaneously in the Gulf. Moreover, the risk could increase when readiness and resource constraints from the budget cuts are entered into the equation.

In terms of sequestration, a reduction of U.S. force presence in the Middle East (due to sequestration) will degrade military options to respond to contingencies, place U.S. interests, citizens, and military forces at higher risk, and strain relationships with regional partners. This in turn, will reinforce Iranian beliefs that U.S. threats of military action lack credibility and may strengthen Iranian resolve in P5+1 negotiations and embolden Iran to increase activities that destabilize the region. These effects go well beyond Iran and will decrease DOD options to shape and react to future events as well as weaken mil-mil relationships with regional partners, which U.S. foreign policy has often leveraged for broader diplomatic gains.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO EGYPT

28. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, the Egyptian military seems to be the primary stabilizing institution in Egypt. What is your position on whether or not we should cut off aid to the Egyptian military?

General DEMPSEY. The situation in Egypt is rapidly evolving. Ultimately, the decision to extend military aid to Egypt rests with the President. I believe we must remain engaged with the Egyptian military at some level.

29. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, if aid is cut off, should we restore it as soon as possible?

General DEMPSEY. If the decision is made to terminate or suspend aid to the Egyptian military, we should make it clear from the start under which it will be restored.

MILITARY OPTIONS IN SYRIA

30. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, has the President given you specific objectives in Syria that your military options should support—or has he only asked you for military options?

General DEMPSEY. The President has articulated his priorities and what he views as our core national interests in Syria. Likewise, the NSS has described a set of objectives which were derived from these core national interests. In support of these objectives, we have developed a range of military options.

31. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, if no U.S. military action is taken to alter the balance of military power between Assad and the armed opposition, what does the military think the most likely outcomes are?

General DEMPSEY. The crisis in Syria is tragic, dynamic, and complex. It is a deeply-rooted, long-term conflict among multiple factions that will continue to fight after Assad's rule ends. The Syrian people face a long and difficult struggle. Potential outcomes could include the status quo, increased spillover in the Levant that compels a regional actor to attempt to alter the balance between the Regime and the opposition, or the fracturing of the country into sectarian based provinces.

32. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your professional military opinion, what are the military options that could best accomplish changing the balance of military power between the Assad regime and the armed opposition without boots-on-the-ground, assuming: (1) vetted rebels are provided with light arms and anti-tank weapons and training; (2) no kinetic action against Syrian integrated air defense system; (3) limited strikes in Syria would be allowed as would flight into Syrian airspace; (4) airstrikes would last no more than 2 weeks; (5) collateral damage to civilians is to be minimized. Under those parameters, assuming legal justifications were in place: (1) what could you accomplish in terms of altering the balance of military power; (2) what lines of military effort would you recommend; (3) what are the risks associated with those lines of effort; and (4) what is the cost of your recommended course(s) of action? Please provide an assessment of the impact on your ability to handle an Iranian conflict following such an action.

General DEMPSEY. Within the framework and the constraints and objectives articulated above, there are military options available, which we have fully briefed to the national security staff.

At the unclassified level, these options would include strikes with standoff weapons on key Syrian Regime infrastructure, logistics nodes, and combat forces command and control nodes that could degrade regime forces. Striking attack helicopters on their ramps with standoff weapons would have an important impact on regime close air support capability, though the locations of those helicopters varies. Contrary to what some have suggested, although fixed wing tactical aircraft are being used by the regime against the opposition, they are not the principal firepower element being used to target the opposition. For this reason, striking runways, again as some have suggested, is not an optimal use of expensive standoff weapons, to say nothing of the fact that the regime would rapidly repair runway damage and resume operations. While the above strikes would have an effect on the balance of military power, they are not likely to be decisive.

Rather, the regime is primarily targeting the opposition through artillery and rocket attacks and ground forces operations. We believe that suppressing these attacks would require a campaign that would roll-back certain (though not necessarily all) elements of the integrated air defense system and subsequently enable a campaign against Assad's ground forces. Details of such a campaign would be classified, but such a campaign is feasible. Contrary to depictions of our prior responses as involving a massive campaign, this would not require enormous resources, but would require a moderate number of ISR, tactical aviation, and traditional support aircraft such as tankers, AWACS and personnel recovery resources, as well as regional bases and defenses for those bases. Principal risks to this approach would be: (a) the risk of retaliation from Syria against regional partners and U.S. bases within those countries; and (b) the risk to U.S. aircraft from mobile surface-to-air missile systems.

To effect a positive and longstanding result, U.S. support should contribute to enabling a substantial number of moderate opposition fighters over an extended period of time. Such an endeavor to build a moderate opposition force capable of defeating regime forces and consolidating and holding territory would require at least 2 years. This extended large-scale train and equip effort is probably the wisest course of action; however, it is not without substantial obstacles. Preferably, strikes would be deferred until an opposition force is capable of maintaining and exploiting at least some of the gains provided by the strikes.

The two options outlined above could complement one another and cause the balance of military power to shift. However, we believe it is unrealistic to expect this shift to occur rapidly. Both sides are in an existential struggle for survival, and have demonstrated considerable resiliency. We are concerned that some consider such a campaign to be easy. Once the first 2 weeks pass without a clear solution to the conflict, there would most certainly be an appetite for more action. Thus, we need to understand that the United States would likely be drawn into a protracted conflict, and would need to be prepared for the expense and follow-on actions in a post-Assad Syria that would likely be demanded.

Finally, we need to be prepared to fund either or both options. Our initial estimate for a train and equip mission is in the hundreds of millions dollars per year. The cost of the strikes depends on the number of munitions expended, but costs would start in the tens of millions and could easily increase to hundreds of millions.

Regarding Iran, we are currently postured to respond to contingencies in the Gulf and we monitor Iranian actions very closely. If action against Iran were sequential to action in Syria, we would use forces already anticipated for such a conflict. If such action were to occur in parallel, some of the forces we would deploy would not be at optimal levels of readiness.

AFGHANISTAN POST-2014 TROOP PRESENCE AND BILATERAL SECURITY AGREEMENT

33. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, is the zero option of no U.S. troops in Afghanistan after 2014 a real option given the results we have seen in Iraq with a similar precipitous withdrawal?

General DEMPSEY. We have presented the President with a range of options to consider. I have not been asked to prepare a zero option, nor do I recommend one. Our post-2014 presence will be predicated on a number of things, including the ongoing Bilateral Security Agreement (BSA) negotiations, performance of the ANSF, and an invitation from the government of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan. We also developed a complementary drawdown plan that would support a range of options, with mitigating factors included.

34. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what mission sets and commensurate levels of troops do you recommend for Afghanistan post-2014?

General DEMPSEY. Our post-2014 mission will be to train, advise, assist, and counter terrorism. Several factors determine the size of the post-2014 mission, including the continued progress of the ANSF and the level of train, advice, and assist required to further that progress, the outcome of the BSA negotiations, and threat assessments. In addition, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) is currently in the planning stages for post-2014 Resolute Support Mission, of which the United States will be the leading troop contributing nation. We assess that a range of 8–12K will be required.

35. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, General Dunford says that above all, the Afghans need to know the United States is committed to an enduring partnership. It would seem that announcing a desired number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan post-2014, pending successful BSA negotiations, would send a strong message—when will the administration announce the desired troop levels for post-2014?

General DEMPSEY. The United States has been extremely clear in our commitment to the people of Afghanistan post-2014. I have recommended that the administration announce U.S. troop levels for post-2014 after the conclusion of the BSA and formal invitation by the President of Afghanistan to remain.

36. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, after letting the Taliban raise the flag and the country name they used when they governed Afghanistan on the political office the United States helped arrange in Doha, Qatar, the Afghan people and President Karzai were understandably upset. Are the chances for a U.S.-led peace process, or reconciliation process, dead?

General DEMPSEY. While the reconciliation process in Afghanistan has thus far been exceedingly complex and challenging, is has not stopped moving forward. It remains an important element of fostering stability in Afghanistan. We will continue to support our Afghan partners in their efforts to meet with the Taliban and reach a political settlement that provides peace and security for the people of Afghanistan.

37. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, are we forcing this issue and doing more harm than good?

General DEMPSEY. A reconciliation process inevitably introduces additional complexity into internal conflict in any nation, as well as uncertainty among the elements making up both sides of the conflict. There will be both progress and setbacks along the way in any such negotiation process. Afghanistan is no exception. Nonetheless, a political solution has been required to end most insurgencies (witness the ongoing process in Colombia), and we support reconciliation as a part of the end game solution in Afghanistan. The Department of State is taking the necessary measured steps to support the peace process. A reconciled Afghanistan is in the best interest of all parties involved. President Karzai acknowledges this, and continues to encourage the peace process, albeit on his terms.

U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

38. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what is your threat assessment of U.S. Africa Command's (AFRICOM) area of responsibility (AOR)—is the threat growing, stabilized, or receding?

General DEMPSEY. [Deleted.]

39. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, do you believe we have the forces in place in U.S. European Command (EUCOM) and AFRICOM to be able to both remain engaged in Africa and respond, if necessary, to threats as they evolve?

General DEMPSEY. DOD is prepared to respond to threats and crises as they arise while remaining engaged in AFRICOM and EUCOM.

AFRICOM forces remain engaged in priority missions such as countering violent extremist organizations and partnership building within Africa, in accordance with the President's priorities for the continent. Meanwhile, we have taken a number of steps to be better prepared for crisis operations, particularly in Northern Africa. For example, the Marine Corps has resourced additional Marine Security Guard (MSG) Detachments to meet regional threats and address Department of State security concerns. While relieving an embassy under attack is highly complex, we also maintain Marine FAST platoons and other forces in the region to be able to rapidly reinforce an embassy in advance of a problem. Among these forces is a dedicated Special Marine Air Ground Task Force-Crisis Response (SPMAGTF–CR) in Spain capable of quickly responding to a variety of threats in Africa or Europe.

DOD has also developed and adopted rules that will allow force sharing between combatant commands (COCOMs) for brief durations to ensure rapid response in the event of a crisis. DOD and the Department of State work together to ensure that high risk facilities are properly secured with DOD support, as required. Finally, DOD monitors specified crisis response forces throughout the world and makes adjustments to position and posture forces based on threat requirements.

40. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, do you believe we have dedicated enough intelligence assets to the continent of Africa?

General DEMPSEY. [Deleted.]

41. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what is you assessment of combining AFRICOM with EUCOM?

General DEMPSEY. Assigning combatant commands under the current structure has led to productive engagement, planning, and operations in the respective areas of responsibility. However, depending on the magnitude of budget cuts to DOD, we may need to consider combatant command consolidations among a number of other difficult staff consolidation and reduction decisions. Combining AFRICOM and EUCOM would be one of several options we would consider.

CIVILIAN FURLOUGHS

42. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what can DOD do to end civilian furloughs now?

General DEMPSEY. The Secretary of Defense instructed all components to monitor funding closely for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. On 6 August, the Secretary announced that this goal was accomplished, and reduced the total furlough days for most civilians from 11 to 6 days. None of us want to see this occur again in 2014, but the sequestration reductions will be more severe next year than this year.

43. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, will DOD use civilian furloughs next year to cut personnel costs?

General DEMPSEY. The $37 billion in fiscal year 2013 budget cuts mandated by sequestration, combined with short timelines that limited our options, were a major cause of these furloughs. We would hope to avoid furloughs in the future because of their deleterious effects on morale and their potential to cause our best civilians to seek employment elsewhere. However, a $52 billion sequestration top line cut in fiscal year 2014 would perpetuate our readiness shortfalls, likely requiring additional civilian personnel actions. These actions could include furloughs, but we believe under a longer-term view would more likely be weighted towards reductions in civilian billets leading to a reduction-in-force action.

44. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, how long will it take before you realize this is a penny-wise pound-foolish approach to cost savings?

General DEMPSEY. We already realize the drawbacks of civilian furloughs—they are as distasteful to us as any other budget reduction mechanism. However, in fiscal year 2013, sequestration was applied by congress on a short timeline, limiting our options and resulting in drastic measures like readiness stand-downs and furloughs that were not strategically or managerially sound. To avoid even more far reaching effects on training, we furloughed most of our civilian employees for up to 6 days. This impacted morale and productivity in most of our support operations, but we were left with no other alternative in finding $37 billion in savings in such a short period of time.

Going forward, the SCMR has defined the decision-space faced by the Department's senior leadership. This, in turn, will inform the Services and defense agencies in developing their fiscal year 2015–2019 budgets later this year, as well as ultimately inform the Department's next QDR early next year.

SEXUAL ASSAULT

45. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, at the hearing on June 4, 2013, concerning sexual assault, you committed to review what our allies have done to structure their military justice systems. Have you had an opportunity to review the military justice systems of our allies?

General DEMPSEY. My legal counsel has personally met with representatives from the UK, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Germany, and the Netherlands to discuss their military justice systems. He has briefed me and issued a written assessment of his review to Congress. In addition, I have spoken to several of my counterparts.

46. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what have you learned about those systems and why they were changed?

General DEMPSEY. In most or all of their systems, commanders retain the ability to deal with minor military infractions through summary proceedings, analogous to our nonjudicial punishment system or adverse administrative actions.

- None of our allies mentioned above retain the commander in the role of the convening authority; however, this was not done in response to sexual assault. Most or all of their systems were changed in order to better protect the rights of the accused, often in response to judicial challenges.
- There is no analytic evidence to suggest that the changes they made improved reporting, investigation, or prosecution.
- Our allies' militaries are much smaller, and thus do not handle the volume of military justice cases that the U.S. Armed Forces do. Many of their systems do not allow for expeditionary justice (in combat or deployed environments) or are incapable of doing so.

IMPACT OF SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE FUNDING REDUCTION FOR B–61 BOMB

47. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what are the military and geo-political implications of the Senate Appropriations Committee's recommendation to reduce funding for the B–61 Life Extension Program (LEP) by $168 million?

General DEMPSEY. A $168 million reduction to the B–61 LEP would slip the delivery of the first production unit past fiscal year 2019 and impact our commitment to our NATO and Asian allies. Additionally, the Commander of U.S. Strategic Command stated that the program is important to the long-term viability of the B–2A strategic mission and is needed regardless of changes to NATO commitments.

This reduction would also limit the DOD and Department of Energy from leveraging interoperable technology for other strategic weapons. We would need to adjust the budget and scope for those programs, resulting in delays to the overall Nuclear Weapons Council Baseline Plan.

RELIGIOUS EXPRESSION

48. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, have the Armed Forces gone too far in suppressing religious expression?

General DEMPSEY. No. DOD continues to place a high value on the rights of all military servicemembers to practice their faith and observe the tenets of their respective religions, to include the right to hold no religious beliefs. Whenever possible, commanders approve requests for accommodation of servicemembers' religious practices. This is both our policy and our practice.

49. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, if a soldier's religious faith is an important part of their resilience in dealing with the stresses of military service, is there any reason why they should be prohibited from fully exercising that faith and sharing it with others in the Services?

General DEMPSEY. We recognize that the spiritual dimension and religious faith do indeed play an important role in building and enhancing resilience for a number of our servicemembers. Commanders are conscientious about allowing them to practice their faith. We also know that some of our servicemembers do not hold to any particular religious belief, and we respect their rights as well. The only reason why a servicemember may be unable to fully exercise his or her faith or to share that faith with others is if doing so would have an adverse impact on mission accomplishment, military readiness, unit cohesion, standards, or good order and discipline. Servicemembers are free to share their faith with others, but must not force unwanted, intrusive attempts to convert others of any faith or no faith to one's beliefs.

50. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, since the Services still respect the rights of Americans to not bear arms in national defense because of sincerely held religious beliefs, is it not just as important to respect the rights of those to serve to express their religious beliefs?

General DEMPSEY. Yes. DOD does respect the rights of all servicemembers to hold and express sincere religious beliefs. Granting conscientious objector status, to which your question appears to refer, is but one example of how seriously U.S. military leadership takes the rights of its members to hold and express sincere religious, moral, and ethical beliefs. By both policy and practice, commanders are committed to ensuring members of the U.S. military of deep religious faith, as well as those of no religious faith, can serve in a climate of mutual respect and trust.

51. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, should a military chaplain be allowed to express the views of their faith in performing their official duties, even if those views are not shared by all?

General DEMPSEY. Yes. U.S. military chaplains are not restricted in expressing the views of their faith. They enter the military as fully qualified religious ministry professionals who represent specific religious organizations. Chaplains perform all the offices, functions, sacraments, ordinances, and ceremonies required of a ministry professional for that religious organization. Chaplains are also trained to offer religious ministry to, and be respectful of, those of all faiths and those of no faith. Chaplains volunteer for Military Service with the understanding that they will be required to function in a pluralistic environment. They willingly support the free exercise of religion by all members of the Military Services, their family members, and other persons whom they are authorized to serve.

WOMEN IN COMBAT

52. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, assuming a person meets the necessary high physical standards that the Services are developing for troops in frontline combat units, is it your professional military opinion that both men and women must be allowed to be assigned to those units?

General DEMPSEY. The elimination of the 1994 Direct Ground Combat Definition and Assignment Rule which provides greater flexibility assigning the best qualified individuals where they are needed most regardless of gender. Greater flexibility and wider pool of skilled personnel creates a more agile and responsive force generation model for greater readiness.

53. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, is it your professional military opinion that our Nation should put women, based solely on meeting objective physical standards, in frontline combat positions against a potential enemy that will seek to exploit captured American women soldiers in an unspeakably cruel fashion with the goal of undermining our national will to engage in combat?

General DEMPSEY. As the Services review their standards for each military specialty, they are considering several criterion. Physical capability is just one of those. Our women in uniform are vital to mission readiness. The Department is committed to removing any barriers that prevent servicemembers from rising to their highest potential, based on their ability and not constrained by gender-restrictive policies. This is also in part due to the realization that the character of warfare has changed. Combat is far more fluid and asymmetrical where the distinctions between frontline, direct combat areas and rear, support areas no longer exists. Any decision regarding the assignment of women to combat-related duties or to combat units should be based on our obligation to maintain a high state of mission readiness and should be approached carefully and deliberately.

54. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, is there any place in your analysis of the potential role of women in combat, to objectively consider women's health, privacy, and cultural issues in the ultimate decision whether to assign women to frontline combat units?

General DEMPSEY. Yes. The health, privacy and culture of women in combat are not new factors in determining how we employ women in the military and will be considered during our assessment. Ultimately the guiding principles we established at the onset will determine how we employ women in the future.

- Preserve unit readiness, cohesion, and morale.
- Ensure the opportunity to succeed with viable career paths.
- Retain the trust and confidence of the American people by promoting policies that maintain the best quality and most qualified people.

• Validate occupational performance standards, both physical and mental, for all military occupational specialties.
• Ensure a cadre of midgrade/senior women enlisted and officers are assigned to commands at the point of introduction to ensure success in the long run.

TRICARE FEES

55. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, prior to sending fee increase proposals to Congress, why doesn't DOD sit down with beneficiary associations and Congress to design fee increases that are reasonable and acceptable to everyone?

General DEMPSEY. Military health benefit reform has been shaped over the last 8 years by program and policy experts, Members of Congress, constituencies, and subject matter experts from within and outside of the Department. The Department's proposals have been and will continue to be based on sound principles, as well as feedback from these stakeholders.

56. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, it seems to me that DOD should wait on the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Commission to report its recommendations before asking Congress to make piecemeal changes to personnel benefits. Do you agree or disagree, and why or why not?

General DEMPSEY. The Commission has a unique opportunity to make real and substantive change. We also recognize that comprehensively reviewing all areas of military pay and benefits, developing recommendations for change, and vetting them within DOD and with other Departments takes time. We would like to take that time, but sequestration has radically changed the budget reality and demands more rapid action from the Department and Congress if we are to sustain long-term readiness and modernization.

57. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, wouldn't development of a comprehensive package of compensation and retirement benefit changes, to include health benefit changes, make more sense rather than a piece-meal approach that wouldn't get us to an optimal solution for controlling DOD's sky-rocketing personnel costs?

General DEMPSEY. If we had the luxury of time to allow development of a comprehensive package before making any changes, we would support it. However, given the enormous pressure the DOD budget is under, we need to act with urgency on both efficiencies and compensation reform if we are to maintain an acceptable level of military capability, capacity, and readiness to be able to conduct our military missions. I am not convinced that there is excessive risk in getting compensation and benefits under control through carefully, but quickly, considered individual actions.

ADEQUATE FORCES

58. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, in your professional judgment, how far can we go with the elimination of brigades, ships, and squadrons before we incur unacceptable risks to our national security?

General DEMPSEY. The SCMR's purpose was to look at these numbers. We are taking the SCMR results and continuing to analyze impacts and assess options. The QDR will use the foundations that the SCMR provided to best determine how far we can go without reaching unacceptable risk.

59. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, aside from the issue of the hollowness of our forces, will sequestration require the elimination of more brigades, ships, and squadrons to the point where we will not have enough forces to carry out even one major contingency operation with enough Reserves to deter a second adversary?

General DEMPSEY. No, I do not believe that we will reach that point. As long as we have access to the Reserves, we will have enough forces to deter a second adversary; however it will take time to ensure they are fully trained and ready for the contingency along with the time to get them from the homeland to the fight. In essence, we will be able to do fewer things simultaneously, and new contingencies may force us to take risk in other regions. We will be less flexible. That much is clear.

60. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, does a potential looming crisis or conflict with Iran constrain your options to take military action in other parts of the world due to resource limitations? Specifically, are you concerned that taking action in Syria, combined with readiness and resource impacts due to budget cuts and sequestration, invites too much strategic risk if friction with Iran results in a conflict in the Gulf as well?

General DEMPSEY. We are currently postured to respond to contingencies in the Gulf and are watching Iran very closely. Any use of additional forces than those that are deployed right now or those that are next to deploy will require time to train and equip to ensure they are ready to respond as replacements and this will cause increased stress on the force in regards to dwell time. However, our global reach and strike capabilities contribute to our ability to deter and assure, helping to mitigate this concern.

ARMY END STRENGTH AND MISSION EXECUTION

61. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, can you provide us an assessment of the impact of the reduction of 10 Brigade Combat Teams (BCT) on DOD's ability to meet the requirements of the National Military Strategy (NMS)?

General DEMPSEY. These BCT reductions will reduce the part of the force that the Army actually increased over the last 10 years to fight our wars. With the planned drawdown of these forces, and the conclusion of two long-term stability operations, we can manage our strategy with the reductions the Army has planned. Also, the Defense Strategic Guidance deemphasized long duration stability operations and reinforced the importance of defeating and denying the objectives of an adversary. The Army is realigning and resizing consistent with this guidance.

62. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what are your concerns with regards to the reduction of 10 Army BCTs?

General DEMPSEY. As these reductions are driven by the Army's drawdown of its temporary endstrength and are consistent with the Defense Strategic Guidance, I am not overly concerned with this reduction in forces. I am concerned that sequestration will force further reduction of ground forces end strength that decreases military options available to respond to contingencies and increase risk to the force.

63. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what is your position regarding a reduction of 100,000 soldiers should the full effects of sequestration go into effect?

General DEMPSEY. Our Nation needs an Army that can conduct full spectrum operations as part of the Joint Force to meet the NMS objectives. It must be appropriately sized, structured, and equipped in order to defend the Nation and defeat our adversaries. We grew ground forces to meet the large requirements of OIF and OEF. As this war period comes to a close, we are assessing what is needed for the future in the context of constrained resources. My instincts are that a reduction of ground forces to levels required by full sequestration would pose significant risk to our national security.

64. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, please provide an assessment of the impact of the reduction of 100,000 soldiers on DOD's ability to meet the requirements of the national military strategy.

General DEMPSEY. At full sequestration, our national military strategy will need to change.

65. Senator INHOFE. General Dempsey, what are your views regarding the mix of Active and Reserve Force structure should the Army be forced into reduction of another 100,000 soldiers?

General DEMPSEY. The Army uses an established, comprehensive, and transparent process to determine the optimal number and mix of Active and Reserve component forces. We will need to work together to emerge with the right mix of capabilities and capacity to accomplish core missions with acceptable risk in accordance with the Defense Strategic Planning Guidance (DSG).

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ROGER F. WICKER

UH–1N REPLACEMENT OPPORTUNITIES

66. Senator WICKER. General Dempsey, as evidenced by the recent relief of 17 officers at Minot Air Force Base and the reports of the Defense Science Board (DSB) Standing Task Force on Nuclear Weapons Surety, there is still a serious neglect of priority and budget for the sustainment of the Air Force's Priority One Nuclear Enterprise. This lack of prioritization and resourcing manifests in a nuclear enterprise that continues to conduct critical mission activities with outdated and insufficiently supported aircraft and ground vehicles, to include the woefully inadequate 40-plus-year-old UH–1N helicopter.

The Air Force has acknowledged the need to replace the UH–1N for over a decade. The aircraft's inadequate speed, range and payload, and obsolescent sensors and monitoring equipment are well-documented. The use of an antiquated airframe such as the UH–1N to provide security for Intercontinental Ballistic Missile (ICBM) sites reflects a lack of proper resource prioritization by DOD.

As Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, you are required to provide cross-Service oversight and recommendations that lead to the most effective and efficient use of the greater defense industrial capabilities. There are inexpensive and cost-effective solutions available to replace the Vietnam-era Huey being fielded by other Services that are far more reliable, capable, and safe.

As demonstrated in the Senate Armed Services Committee markup of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2014, I would like to understand the current plan for replacing the existing UH–1N fleet. In addition, I would like your commitment that this issue will be addressed in the upcoming fiscal year 2015 budget submittal. Despite being an Air Force priority for over 10 years, why has the replacement of the UH–1N fleet not been realized?

General DEMPSEY. The requirement for a more responsive capability to meet ICBM security needs remains valid, but budget constraints in both the near-term and the foreseeable future make committing to new acquisition programs challenging. A formal replacement strategy for the UH–1N is due to the SASC on February 1, 2014. As potential solutions, the Air Force is pursuing a variety of replacement options to include Excess Defense Articles at low or no cost. We remain committed to remaining involved and attentive to this requirement.

67. Senator WICKER. General Dempsey, the leadership of Air Force Global Strike Command (AFGSC) recently commented that: "I have had an urgent and compelling need since 1996 in terms of speed, range, and payload . . . the UH–1 does not meet the need. How much longer are we willing to wait and take this risk?" Has there been any change to the ICBM security force posture that you believe makes the replacement of the UH–1 less compelling or a more acceptable security risk?

General DEMPSEY. No, the ICBM security force posture has not changed. The requirement to replace the UH–1s remains valid. However, based on budget constraints, the Air Force currently plans to sustain the UH–1 for another 6–10 years vice replacing them. The Air Force will mitigate risk by upgrading UH–1 cockpits and making them night-vision-compatible combined with other critical safety improvements. The Air Force also recently received three UH–1s from the Marine Corps, which will increase capacity and availability. In addition, the Air Force and Army are examining options for the Army to transfer additional UH–1s to the Air Force.

68. Senator WICKER. General Dempsey, there are aircraft being fielded by DOD today that are significantly more capable and less costly to own and operate than the UH–1N. In your leadership role on the Joint Requirements Oversight Council (JROC), have you, or will you, direct the Air Force to prioritize consideration of in-production DOD aircraft as a replacement for the UH–1 rather than continue to assume the associated security risks?

General DEMPSEY. The JROC does not direct service acquisition decisions. Rather, it defines and validates Joint force requirements that are then submitted to both budget and acquisition processes. The JROC does validate the results of analyses of alternatives, and will be alert to consideration of all possible alternatives, including in-production aircraft. When the decision is made to replace the UH–1N, a full and open competition will be conducted to find the helicopter that meets the mission requirements and provides DOD the most capable replacement at the most economically feasible cost. This may ultimately be an aircraft that is already in production, but those efficiencies will be evident through the proper source selection process.

69. Senator WICKER. General Dempsey, the Combat Rescue Helicopter (CRH) mission requirements were determined to be overly robust and expensive to justify the CRH's use for the domestic support missions currently conducted by the UH–1N. There is concern that the lack of urgency regarding fielding of a UH–1 replacement may indicate an attempt to merge CRH and UH–1N missions in the future. Did the JROC review of the CRH program validate any requirement to provide site and convoy security for the Nation's ICBM force or for supporting the Air Force District of Washington VIP airlift/evacuation missions currently supported by the UH–1N?

General DEMPSEY. The CRH's primary mission is to recover isolated personnel from hostile or denied territory. It will also execute humanitarian missions, civil search and rescue, disaster relief, casualty/medical evacuation, and non-combatant evacuation operations. CRH is not being produced to replace the UH–1N; rather it will replace the Air Force's aging HH–60G Pave Hawk helicopter fleet. Thus, JROC review and validation of the CRH requirements did not include missions currently supported by the UH–1N, such as providing site and convoy security for the Nation's ICBM force or supporting the Air Force District of Washington VIP airlift/evacuation missions. However, this would not preclude the CRH from being called upon to execute missions currently being performed by other vertical lift platforms.

[The nomination reference of GEN Martin E. Dempsey, USA, follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 24, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

The following named officer for appointment as the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and appointment to the grade indicated while assigned to a position of importance and responsibility under title 10, U.S.C., sections 152 and 601:

To be General

GEN Martin E. Dempsey, 8511

[The biographical sketch of GEN Martin E. Dempsey, USA, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF GEN MARTIN E. DEMPSEY, USA

Source of commissioned service: USMA

Educational degrees:

U.S. Military Academy - BS - No Major
Duke University - MA - English
U.S. Army Command and General Staff College - MMAS - Military Arts and Sciences
National Defense University - MS - National Security and Strategic Studies

Military schools attended:

Armor Officer Basic and Advanced Courses
U.S. Army Command and General Staff College
National War College

Foreign language(s):

French

Promotions:

Promotions	Date of Appointment
2LT	5 Jun 74
1LT	5 Jun 76
CPT	8 Aug 78
MAJ	1 Sep 85
LTC	1 Apr 91
COL	1 Sep 95
BG	1 Aug 01
MG	1 Sep 04
LTG	8 Sep 05
GEN	8 Dec 08

Major duty assignments:

From	To	Assignment
Jan 75	May 76	Platoon Leader, B Troop, 1st Squadron, 2d Armored Cavalry, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany
May 76 ...	Sep 77	Support Platoon Leader, 1st Squadron, 2d Armored Cavalry, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany
Sep 77	Jun 78	S–1 (Personnel), 1st Squadron, 2d Armored Cavalry, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany
Jul 78	Jan 79	Student, Armor Officer Advanced Course, U.S. Army Armor School, Fort Knox, KY
Apr 79	Jan 80	Motor Officer, 1st Squadron, 10th Cavalry, 4th Infantry Division (Mechanized), Fort Carson, CO
Jan 80	Oct 80	Commander, A Troop, 1st Squadron, 10th Cavalry, 4th Infantry Division (Mechanized), Fort Carson, CO
Oct 80	Jun 81	S–3 (Operations), 1st Squadron, 10th Cavalry, 4th Infantry Division (Mechanized), Fort Carson, CO
Jun 81	Jul 82	Commander, Headquarters and Headquarters Troop, 1st Squadron, 10th Cavalry, 4th Infantry Division (Mechanized), Fort Carson, CO
Aug 82 ...	May 84	Student, Duke University, Durham, NC
Jun 84	Jul 87	Instructor, later Assistant Professor, Department of English, U.S. Military Academy, West Point, NY
Aug 87 ...	Jun 88	Student, U.S. Army Command and General Staff College, Fort Leavenworth, KS
Jul 88	Sep 89	Executive Officer, 4th Battalion, 67th Armor, 3d Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany
Sep 89	May 91	S–3 (Operations), later Executive Officer, 3d Brigade, 3d Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany and Operations Desert Shield/Storm, Saudi Arabia
Jul 91	Jun 93	Commander, 4th Battalion, 67th Armor, 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany
Jul 93	Jun 95	Chief, Armor Branch, Combat Arms Division, Officer Personnel Management Directorate, U.S. Total Army Personnel Command, Alexandria, VA
Aug 95 ...	Jun 96	Student, National War College, Fort Lesley J. McNair, Washington, DC
Jul 96	Jul 98	Commander, 3d Armored Cavalry Regiment, Fort Carson, CO
Jul 98	Oct 99	Assistant Deputy Director for Politico-Military Affairs, Europe and Africa, J–5, The Joint Staff, Washington, DC
Oct 99	Aug 01	Special Assistant to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, The Joint Staff, Washington, DC
Sep 01	Jun 03	Program Manager, Saudi Arabian National Guard Modernization Program, Saudi Arabia
Jun 03	Oct 04	Commanding General, 1st Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army Operation Iraqi Freedom, Iraq
Oct 04	Jul 05	Commanding General, 1st Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Germany
Aug 05 ...	May 07	Commander, Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq/Commander, NATO Training Mission-Iraq, Operation Iraqi Freedom, Iraq
Aug 07 ...	Mar 08	Deputy Commander, U.S. Central Command, MacDill Air Force Base, FL
Mar 08 ...	Oct 08	Acting Commander, U.S. Central Command, MacDill Air Force Base, FL
Dec 08	Mar 11	Commanding General, U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command, Fort Monroe, VA
Apr 11	Sep 11	Chief of Staff, U.S. Army, Washington, DC
Sep 11	Present	Chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Washington, DC

Summary of joint assignments:

Assignments	Date	Grade
Assistant Deputy Director for Politico-Military Affairs, Europe and Africa, J–5, The Joint Staff, Washington, DC	Jul 98–Oct 99	Colonel
Special Assistant to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, The Joint Staff, Washington, DC	Oct 99–Aug 01	Colonel
Commander, Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq/Commander, NATO Training Mission-Iraq, Operation Iraqi Freedom, Iraq	Aug 05–May 07	Lieutenant General
Deputy Commander, U.S. Central Command, MacDill Air Force Base, FL	Aug 07–Mar 08	Lieutenant General
Acting Commander, U.S. Central Command, MacDill Air Force Base, FL	Mar 08–Oct 08	Lieutenant General
Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Washington, DC	Sep 11–Present	General

Summary of operational assignments:

Assignments	Date	Grade
Executive Officer, 3d Brigade, 3d Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Operations Desert Shield/Storm, Saudi Arabia	Jan 91–Feb 91	Lieutenant Colonel
Commanding General, 1st Armored Division, U.S. Army Europe and Seventh Army, Operation Iraqi Freedom, Iraq	Jun 03–Oct 04	Brigadier General/ Major General

Assignments	Date	Grade
Commander, Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq/Commander, NATO Training Mission-Iraq, Operation Iraqi Freedom, Iraq	Aug 05–May 07	Lieutenant General

U.S. decorations and badges:
Defense Distinguished Service Medal (with Oak Leaf Cluster)
Distinguished Service Medal (with three Oak Leaf Clusters)
Defense Superior Service Medal
Legion of Merit (with two Oak Leaf Clusters)
Bronze Star Medal with "V" Device
Bronze Star Medal
Meritorious Service Medal (with two Oak Leaf Clusters)
Joint Service Commendation Medal
Army Commendation Medal
Army Achievement Medal (with Oak Leaf Cluster) Combat Action Badge
Parachutist Badge
Joint Chiefs of Staff Identification Badge
Army Staff Identification Badge

[The Committee on Armed Services requires certain senior military officers nominated by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial, and other information of the nominee. The form executed by GEN Martin E. Dempsey, USA, in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Martin E. Dempsey.

2. Position to which nominated:
Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

3. Date of nomination:
June 24, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
March 14, 1952; Jersey City, NJ.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married to Diane Sullivan Dempsey.

7. Names and ages of children:
Christopher, 34.
Megan, 33.
Caitlin, 30.

8. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary, or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed in the service record extract provided to the committee by the executive branch.
None.

9. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.
None.

10. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.
Member, Veteran of Foreign Wars.
Member, Association of the U.S. Army.

11. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements other than those listed on the service record extract provided to the committee by the executive branch.
None.

12. Commitment to testify before Senate committees: Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before any duly constituted committee of the Senate?
I, Martin E. Dempsey, agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

13. Personal views: Do you agree, when asked before any duly constituted committee of Congress, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?
I, Martin E. Dempsey, agree, when asked before any duly constituted committee of Congress, to give my personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–E of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–E are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

MARTIN E. DEMPSEY.

This 23rd day of May, 2013.

[The nomination of GEN Martin E. Dempsey, USA, was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on July 30, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on August 1, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to ADM James A. Winnefeld, Jr., USN, by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. On previous occasions you have answered the committee's policy questions on the reforms brought about by the Goldwater-Nichols Act, the last time being in connection with your first nomination to be Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Has your view of the importance, implementation, and practice of these reforms changed since you testified before the committee at your last confirmation hearing?

Answer. My views have not changed. I have served in various joint capacities throughout my naval career and I've now had the privilege to serve 2 years as Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. My recent experience confirms the tremendous advancements created by this landmark legislation. I do not see a need to change the provisions of this legislation at this time.

Question. In light of your experience as Chairman, do you see any need for modifications to Goldwater-Nichols? If so, what modifications do you believe would be appropriate?

Answer. Reflecting on my recent experience, I do not believe changes to Goldwater-Nichols are necessary at this time. However, if confirmed, I will remain alert to opportunities or shortcomings that might indicate that changes to the legislation are warranted.

DUTIES

Question. Based on your experience as Vice Chairman, what recommendations, if any, do you have for changes in the duties and functions set forth in section 154 of title 10, U.S.C., and in regulations of the Department of Defense (DOD), that pertain to the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the organization and operation of the Joint Staff in general?

Answer. If confirmed, I do not foresee recommending any changes to the law. I will, however, remain attuned to potential issues and opportunities for improvement.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. Please describe your understanding of the relationship of the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the following officials:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Vice Chairman performs the duties assigned to him and other such duties as may be assigned by the Chairman, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense. Additionally, in the absence or disability of the Chairman, the Vice Chairman acts as the Chairman and performs the duties of the Chairman until a successor is appointed or until the absence or disability ceases. These duties would include providing military advice to the Secretary of Defense. The Vice Chairman may also provide the Secretary of Defense advice upon the Secretary's request in his capacity as a military adviser.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. The Deputy Secretary of Defense has been delegated full power and authority to act for the Secretary of Defense on any matters upon which the Secretary is authorized to act. As such, the relationship of the Vice Chairman with the Deputy Secretary is similar to that with the Secretary.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Vice Chairman performs the duties assigned to him as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and such other duties as assigned by the Chairman, with the approval of the Secretary of Defense. When there is a vacancy in the office of the Chairman, or during the absence or disability of the Chairman, the Vice Chairman acts as Chairman and performs the duties of the Chairman until a successor is appointed or the absence or disability ceases. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing my close working relationship with the Chairman.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics (USD(AT&L)).

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C. and current DOD directives establish the Under Secretaries of Defense as the principal staff assistants and advisers to the Secretary regarding matters related to their functional areas. With particular regard to the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(AT&L)), the Vice Chairman serves on many deliberative panels focused on resource decisions, including the Deputies Advisory Working Group as its Vice Chair and as Chairman of the Joint Requirements Oversight Council (JROC). If confirmed, I look forward to continuing to work very closely with the USD(AT&L) on continuing improvements to the requirements process and providing senior-level focus on key acquisition programs.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) (USD(C)).

Answer. I recognize the importance of the Vice Chairman working closely with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) in appropriately managing and providing oversight of the budgetary and fiscal processes of the Joint Staff required to achieve the budgetary goals prescribed by the Secretary of Defense and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (USD(P)).

Answer. The Vice Chairman and USD(P) work together to represent defense and military interests in interagency affairs. They often co-lead or serve together on various ad hoc committees or projects as directed by Congress or as assigned from time to time by Secretary of Defense or by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, such as the Nuclear Weapons Committee or the Deputy's Management Action Group. The Vice Chairman and USD(P) also serve together on the Deputies Committee, monitoring the work of various interagency policy committees as well as supporting the Principals Committee and the National Security Council. If confirmed, I plan to continue my frequent interaction with the USD(P).

Question. The other Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. Within their assigned areas, Under Secretaries exercise policy and oversight functions and interact frequently with the Joint Staff. They may issue instructions and directive-type memoranda that implement policy approved by the Secretary. These instructions and directives are applicable to all DOD components. In carrying out their responsibilities, and when directed by the President and Secretary of Defense, communications from the Under Secretaries to commanders of the unified and specified commands are transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Under Secretaries of Defense.

Question. The Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation.

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C., and current DOD directives establish the Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation as a principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense and other senior officials of DOD on cost assessment and program evaluation. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing to work closely with the Director under the auspices of the Vice Chairman's resourcing and requirements functions, as well as benefitting from the extensive and independent analysis provided by the Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation office towards making informed resourcing decisions.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. With the exception of the Assistant Secretaries of Defense for Public Affairs, Legislative Affairs, and for Networks and Information Integration, all Assistant Secretaries of Defense are subordinate to one of the Under Secretaries of Defense. In carrying out their responsibilities, and when directed by the President and Secretary of Defense, communications from the Under Secretaries to commanders of unified and specified commands are transmitted through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Assistant Secretaries in a manner similar to that of working with the Under Secretaries.

Question. The Secretaries of the Military Departments.

Answer. Title 10, U.S.C., section 165 provides that, subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense, and subject to the authority of the combatant commanders, the Secretaries of Military Departments are responsible for administration and support of forces assigned to unified and specified commands.

The Chairman, or Vice Chairman when directed or when acting as the Chairman, advises the Secretary of Defense on the extent to which program recommendations and budget proposals of the military departments conform with priorities in strategic plans and with the requirements of the combatant commanders. The Vice Chairman has numerous interactions with the Service Secretaries in the various management forums within the Department. Finally, in his role as the Chairman of the JROC, the Vice Chairman has considerable interaction with the Service Secretaries' acquisition staffs. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing my close and productive working relationship with the Service Secretaries and their staffs.

Question. The Chiefs of Staff of the Army and Air Force and the Chief of Naval Operations.

Answer. The Service Chiefs serve two significant roles. First, they are responsible for the organization, manning, training, and equipping of their respective Services. Without the full support and cooperation of the Service Chiefs, no combatant commander can be ensured of the readiness of his assigned forces for missions directed by the President and Secretary of Defense. Second, as members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, they are advisors to the Chairman and the Secretary of Defense as the senior uniformed leaders of their respective Services. The Service Vice Chiefs play a key role on the JROC, chaired by the Vice Chairman. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Service Chiefs and their Vice Chiefs to fulfill the combatant commanders' warfighting and operational requirements, and on other relevant policy matters.

Question. The Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

Answer. The Chief of the National Guard heads a joint activity of DOD and is the senior uniformed National Guard officer responsible for formulating, developing and coordinating all policies, programs and plans affecting more than half a million Army and Air National Guard personnel. Appointed by the President, he serves as principal adviser to the Secretary of Defense through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on National Guard matters. He is also the principal adviser to the Secretary and Chief of Staff of the Army and the Secretary and Chief of Staff of the Air Force on all National Guard issues. As National Guard Bureau Chief, he serves as the department's official channel of communication with the Governors and Adjutants General. As a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau has the specific responsibility of addressing matters involving non-Federalized National Guard forces in support of homeland defense and civil support missions. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the Chief of the National Guard Bureau to provide support as required.

Question. The Combatant Commanders.

Answer. The combatant commanders fight our wars and conduct military operations around the world. The Chairman provides a vital link between the combatant commanders and other elements of DOD and, as directed by the President, may serve as the means of communication between the combatant commanders and the President or Secretary of Defense. When there is a vacancy in the office of Chairman or in the absence or disability of the Chairman, the Vice Chairman acts as Chairman when interacting with the combatant commanders. Having served as a combatant commander, I have clear insight into the capabilities and limitations of combatant command staffs. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with the combatant commanders to enable their warfighting capabilities and provide other support as required.

MAJOR CHALLENGES

Question. What do you consider to be the most significant challenges you have faced in your first term as Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Answer. In a world of accelerating change that is growing more rather than less dangerous, I have faced a number of challenges in what I have labeled the three portfolios of policy, investment, and people.

In the policy portfolio, we have been grappling with a host of threats to our national security interests . . . in Afghanistan, Iran, and the Korean Peninsula; with the continuing evolution of al Qaeda and its affiliates; in the aftermath of the Arab Awakening in Libya, Syria and Egypt; and within the increasingly complex cyber domain. Maintaining a balanced approach to securing our interests in these areas in a declining budget environment requires constant effort.

In the investment portfolio, we continue to struggle with budget challenges that are quietly eroding our readiness to defend this nation today and have impacted our ability to prepare for tomorrow. I was confirmed on the day the Budget Control Act was passed, and have discovered that the Vice Chairman has a unique role in encouraging the various elements of the Department in coming to grips with the reality of decreasing budgets

In the people portfolio we are trying to manage the enormous uncertainty to which our military and civilian members and their families are exposed as Congress struggles to come to agreement on a budget. We have also expended considerable effort to ensure proper care for our wounded, ill, and injured members, as well as finding every lever we can to eliminate the pernicious insider threat of sexual assault.

Much remains to be done in all three of these portfolios. If reconfirmed, I look forward to continuing to serve this great Nation in uniform, and pledge to work with this committee to strike the right balance among ends, ways, and means of protecting our country and its interests.

Question. What new challenges do you expect to face if you are confirmed for a second term?

Answer. If confirmed, my foremost challenge will be to continue supporting the Secretary and Chairman in guiding the force through fiscal contraction while sustaining readiness and protecting our Nation and its security interests. The challenges I listed above will persist—indeed, they may become worse as the Department's fiscal uncertainty deepens—and require constant attention and visionary leadership. As always, new problems will emerge: new crises and contingencies; new hurdles in tending to the capability, capacity, and readiness of the force; and new challenges faced by our most important resource, namely our people.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. If confirmed, I will renew my efforts to support the Chairman and Secretary. There is much to be done. There is more progress to be made balancing the ends, ways and means of strategy—particularly in preserving as many of our "ends" as possible by refining our "ways" as the "means" continue to decline—this means new ways of applying force and refreshing our plans on how and where we do it. We need to continue our press for a more efficient Department, leveraging congressional assistance where possible in doing so. We must ensure our people navigate the shoals of a changing financial and operational environment—and we need to remain persistent in our determination that they perform to the highest possible standards in terms of integrity, conduct, and respect for taxpayer dollars. Finally, I will use my leadership of the Joint Requirements Oversight Committee (JROC) and the budgeting and acquisition sides of the investment triangle to find the right balance among the capability, capacity, and readiness of our force. In these and other ways I will lend my best efforts to ensuring our Nation is safe.

PRIORITIES

Question. Recognizing that challenges, anticipated and unforeseen, will drive your priorities to a substantial degree, if confirmed, what other priorities, beyond those associated with the major challenges you identified in the section above, would you set for your second term as Vice Chairman?

Answer. There are a number of specific areas I will maintain high on a list of priorities. Among these are:

- Working closely with interagency stakeholders, U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) and International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) to ensure the trajectory of our efforts in Afghanistan remain on track.
- Ensuring the Department is fully prepared to support the President regarding any decision he may make regarding use of force in any of several areas where it may become necessary.
- Maintaining unrelenting emphasis on every possible aspect of conquering the insider threat of sexual assault in our ranks.
- Continuing to ensure the Department's budget decisions are based on strategy and that they emphasize improved efficiency before reducing military capability, capacity, or readiness.
- Highlighting the importance of readiness in an environment where it will be tempting to preserve politically-attractive capacity and capability at its expense.
- Maintaining emphasis on wounded warrior programs even as the number of new wounded members declines due to the transition in Afghanistan—these heroes require care long after they return home.
- Building on a good trajectory of requirements and acquisition reform and remaining vigilant regarding current and future programs—there is much to be done in this area.
- Ensuring the Department maintains a collegial and influential relationship with the National Nuclear Security Administration to ensure the needs of our nuclear infrastructure are met.
- Pressing for high-leverage technical innovation that is relevant to the current and future warfighting environment.
- Working closely with my fellow senior military leaders to ensure we all serve with distinction and integrity.

JOINT REQUIREMENTS OVERSIGHT COUNCIL

Question. The Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff serves as the Chairman of the JROC, which has the responsibility to review and validate Service requirements.

Are there any recommendations that you would make to modify the JROC or its authority or the requirements process?

Answer. I do not believe additional formal changes or modifications to the JROC, its authority, or the requirements process are needed at this time. The JROC's authority as detailed in title 10, U.S.C., section 181, is sufficient to allow the JROC to carry out its responsibilities for overseeing the joint military requirements process. We continue to make every effort within existing authorities to improve JROC processes and products.

Question. Has the 'trip-wire' process, to bring troubled programs back to the JROC for a review and to consider performance trade-offs to mitigate further cost growth and/or schedule delays before the program faced a Nunn-McCurdy review, been regularly employed on large programs that have experienced significant cost growth and schedule delays?

Answer. The trip wire process continues to function well. We have expanded the trip-wire process to include both schedule delays and quantity changes, in addition to cost growth, when validating capability documents. Only a few programs have recently exceeded trip-wire values. The most recent case was a review of the Warfighter Information Network-Tactical Increment 2 for an IOC schedule delay of greater than 12 months.

However, rather than waiting for trip-wires to be breached, we try to proactively engage programs and their requirements. I recently signed out a Key Performance Parameter (KPP) Relief JROCM (015–13) which was intended to encourage acquisition managers, in coordination with the appropriate requirements sponsors, to officially request requirements relief where KPPs appear out of line with a cost-benefit analysis. This has resulted in KPP changes for the Three Dimensional Expeditionary Long-Range Radar, Joint Light Tactical Vehicle, and Armored Multi-Purpose Vehicle.

Question. Has the JROC altered requirements, either for performance or procurement quantities, as a result of such reviews?

Answer. As previously stated, only a few program reviews have been required as a result of their exceeding trip-wire values. In the case of Warfighter Information Network-Tactical (WIN–T) Increment 2, the JROC acknowledged that the schedule delay was driven primarily by the extension of fielding schedules and funding alignment and no change was made to performance or procurement quantities.

On the other hand, there have been performance parameter changes due to cost-benefit analysis resulting from the KPP Relief JROCM, which encourages requirements reviews when appropriate. Whether for a trip-wire breach or a proactive scrub of the requirements, we have recently made KPP changes to the following programs: Long Range Strike-Bomber (LRS–B), Joint Strike Fighter, Joint Light Tactical Vehicle, Unmanned Carrier Launched Airborne Surveillance and Strike, Armored Multi-Purpose Vehicle, WIN–T, Three Dimensional Expeditionary Long-Range Radar, Common Point Ground System, Air and Missile Defense Radar, and Global Positioning System Modernization.

Question. Weapon Systems Acquisition Reform Act of 2009 (WSARA) required the Secretary of Defense to ensure that trade-off analyses are conducted on cost, schedule, and performance as part of the requirements development and approval process. Such analyses enhance DOD's understanding of what performance factors are the critical ones driving costs and schedules.

What is your view of the modifications to the JROC process made by WSARA?

Answer. I fully support the major revisions to the joint warfighting requirements process that were made in early 2012. This includes updates to governing documents and the means by which supporting bodies carry out their responsibilities in accordance with title 10, U.S.C., section 181, and applicable portions of the WSARA (primarily sections 105 and 201). We critically assess the impact of requirements on the cost, schedule and performance of programs as a matter of routine when those programs are in front of the JROC.

Question. What additional steps do you believe that Congress or DOD should take to ensure that trade-offs between cost, schedule, and performance objectives for major weapon systems are made at an appropriately early point in the acquisition process?

Answer. DOD is striving to push capability gap information out to industry earlier in the acquisition process. By partnering early with industry and providing timely insight into our vision for future capabilities, DOD is better able to leverage industry science and technology (S&T) efforts and, informed by early S&T development, provide feasible and affordable options for acquisition decisions. A recent example of this approach is the Army's Future Vertical Lift Initial Capabilities Document which defined capability gaps in the 2030 and beyond Joint Operational Environment. There is no doubt more we can do in this area.

The JROC also considers cost, schedule, and performance tradeoffs as early as the analysis of alternatives (AoA) review.

Question. Are there any other recommendations that you would make to modify the JROC or its authority or the requirements process?

Answer. I do not believe additional changes or modifications to the JROC, its authority, or the requirements process are needed at this time. The JROC's authority as detailed in title 10, U.S.C., section 181, is sufficient to allow the JROC to carry out its responsibilities for overseeing the joint military requirements process. That said, we continue to make every effort within existing authorities to improve internal JROC processes and products.

Question. How would you assess the effectiveness of the JROC in the DOD acquisition process?

Answer. The changes to the JROC process have enabled a much closer relationship with USD(AT&L) by ensuring that requirements and their associated costs are continually evaluated through the acquisition life-cycle. We currently have an excellent relationship with USD(AT&L), to include their participation as one of the statutory experts invited to JROC meetings. Their insights are most valuable as we consider requirements alternatives, while at the same time we work closely with them to ensure requirements are kept under control and, in some cases, prudently trimmed as informed by a cost, schedule, performance and warfighter needs.

Question. What is your vision for the role and priorities of the JROC in the future?

Answer. The JROC is our key body shaping the future Joint Force (title 10, U.S.C., section 181). The priorities for the JROC and the JCIDS process are to: (1) debate strategic and operational requirements and make difficult choices earlier; (2) strive for better upfront fidelity on cost/schedule/performance tradeoffs; (3) require greater analytic rigor and risk/portfolio analysis; and (4) ensure a more dynamic/iterative process throughout a program's lifecycle. Additionally, the JROC could play an important role in retuning system requirements in the face of the dramatic resource reductions stipulated by the full BCA caps.

Question. Do you believe the JROC process is sufficient to understand and identify where there are opportunities for multi-service collaboration or where programs could or should be modified to take advantage of related acquisition programs?

Answer. Yes. We developed and expanded opportunities for multi-service collaboration for several programs during the past couple of years, including ground and amphibious combat vehicles and long range air search radars. This is always a difficult issue for the individual Services, but we have managed to make progress in this area thanks to a group of open-minded Service Vice Chiefs.

Question. What principles guide your approach to inviting, and helping ensure the sufficient participation of other stakeholders in the JROC?

Answer. Over the past several years, the JROC has been refined into a more lean executive body where key leaders and advisors have frank and open discussions. In addition to the statutory members and advisors, combatant commanders participate when appropriate. I strongly believe in the importance of including these stakeholders, and I turn to them with an offer to speak on every issue, and they have been forthcoming. In short, we have created a smaller more intimate forum that still includes the major stakeholders, which has led to a more fulsome discussion of requirements issues.

JOINT CAPABILITIES INTEGRATION AND DEVELOPMENT SYSTEMS

Question. What is your perspective on the responsiveness of the Joint Capabilities Integration and Development Systems (JCIDS) process in addressing joint capabilities needs?

Answer. We work requirements based on urgency: life/death requirements for current conflicts are worked in days; requirements to address conflicts that appear to be imminent are worked in weeks to ensure that systems can be fielded in time; enduring warfghting requirements are worked as quickly as possible using our streamlined JCIDS. While we still look for ways to continuously improve the JCIDS process, it has been dramatically enhanced and addresses requirements through a more efficient and interactive process. Combatant commander input is better incorporated to ensure joint capabilities produced are more timely, precise and needs-based. The most recent changes to the process consolidate guidance documents, streamline procedures, mandate shorter document lengths, and reduce timelines to increase effectiveness and responsiveness.

Question. What level of involvement in the joint requirements process and the JROC do you believe is appropriate for the COCOMs?

Answer. As the primary customers for the capabilities delivered by acquisition, the combatant commanders play a critical role in the joint requirements process at all levels, to include the JROC. Combatant command input during the requirements-generation process helps ensure that joint-capability outcomes more accurately match the current and future needs of the dynamic security environment. As such, we closely review Combatant Commander Integrated Priority Lists and they are invited to participate in every meeting. It is the norm for these commanders to have a representative in a meeting that covers a topic of importance to them.

Question. Do you think that JCIDS needs to be changed? If so, what are your views on how it could be improved to make the process more responsive to users' needs while efficiently investing resources in a fiscally constrained budget environment?

Answer. Revisions made in early 2012 were a big step forward in improving JCIDS, and the next scheduled review and revision of key documents is ongoing. These documents include: The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Instruction (CJCSI) 5123.01 (JROC Charter), CJCSI 3170.01 (JCIDS Instruction), and the JCIDS Manual. Recent changes to JCIDS emphasize flexibility and speed in requirements generation, review, and validation. The changes also enable, when necessary, reassessment and adjustments to previously validated documents when poorly crafted requirements and timelines are identified. Preserving, and building upon, these JCIDS revisions will promote greater efficiencies and future success. In addition, we are working closely with USD(AT&L) to ensure that the Defense Acquisition System and the Joint Requirements processes are tightly synchronized and integrated to ensure that requirements are valid, feasible and affordable.

Question. The requirements development process is not a stand-alone process, but instead is required to work collaboratively with the acquisition and budgeting processes.

What steps are needed to better align the requirements development process with the acquisition and budgeting processes to make for a more efficient and effective process for delivering capabilities?

Answer. The pending update to the Department of Defense Instruction (DODI) 5000.02 and the revisions to JCIDS guidance documents will improve coordination between our requirements and acquisition processes. Additionally, I initiated and attend a quarterly leadership forum with USD(AT&L) and Director-CAPE to help align requirements, acquisition, and resourcing. These meetings have included macro discussions on the process as well as a few individual programs, and I look forward to expanding the concept. Developing a more synchronous and flexible relationship between military requirements, acquisition, and budgets will enable DOD to deliver its warfighter capabilities at more reasonable costs.

ACQUISITION REFORM AND ACQUISITION MANAGEMENT

Question. What is your view of the changes made by the WSARA?

Answer. The WSARA has been important in making sure new defense programs start on a sound footing to avoid the high cost of fixing problems late in the acquisition process. It also helped foster a culture within DOD focused on the continuous improvement of our acquisition processes and their associated outcomes. I am very encouraged by the cooperation we have built with USD(AT&L), which was encouraged by the tenets of the WSARA.

Question. What role, if any, do you believe the JROC should play in the oversight and management of acquisition programs after requirements have been established?

Answer. The JROC has an enduring title 10 oversight responsibility to ensure that an acquisition program's requirements are realistic and relevant throughout the life of the acquisition. The WSARA also required the Secretary of Defense—via the Chairman and the JROC—to ensure that trade-off analyses are conducted on cost, schedule, and performance as part of the requirements development and approval process. We are seeing this play out, as the JROC has made several midstride adjustments to requirements to reflect emerging realities during acquisition, always ensuring warfighter needs are fully considered.

Question. What role, if any, do you believe the JROC should play in reviewing the progress of major defense acquisition programs or other acquisition programs?

Answer. The progress of major defense acquisition programs is monitored by the JROC often through Milestone C. JROC oversight is required to ensure that an acquisition program's requirements throughout its life are realistic and relevant. The WSARA also requires the Secretary of Defense—via the Chairman and the JROC—to ensure that trade-off analyses are conducted on cost, schedule, and performance as part of the requirements development and approval process. A good example of this is the JROC's continuing interest in the F–35, to include the helmet associated with the aircraft. The JROC requires periodic and detailed updates on JSF performance, cost and schedule to ensure KPPs are appropriate in light of cost.

Question. Do you see a need for any change in the role of the Chairman or the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the requirements determination, resource allocation, or acquisition management processes?

Answer. No, I do not see a need for any change at this time.

Question. What is your view of the role played by Configuration Steering Boards (CSB) in preventing cost growth due to requirements creep?

Answer. CSBs provide an important senior level forum for acquisition and requirements officials to review and assess requirements to achieve balance between weapon system performance and affordability over a program's lifecycle. They institutionalize Military Service, Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD), and Joint Staff review of potential requirements trade-offs. While the CSBs are gathering momentum, my understanding is that USD(AT&L) is very supportive of using this process to help identify areas where requirements may need refinement.

Question. What do you see as the proper relationship between CSBs and the JROC in managing requirements for acquisition programs?

Answer. CSBs provide an important senior level forum for acquisition and requirements officials to review and assess requirements to achieve balance between weapon system performance and affordability over a program's lifecycle. A key output of a CSB could be a recommendation to the appropriate validation authority—the JROC in the case of KPPs—to review or relax a requirement in order to achieve a better balance between performance and affordability.

Question. What is your view of the Nunn-McCurdy requirements for Major Defense Acquisition Programs that fail to meet cost, schedule, and performance objectives?

Answer. The Nunn-McCurdy requirements have introduced rigor into our processes and better scrutiny of Major Defense Acquisition Programs regarding cost, schedule, and performance objectives. I particularly appreciate the flexibility within the process to account in particular for price increases solely due to quantity decreases.

Question. What do you see as the proper relationship between the JROC and those DOD officials charged with implementing the Nunn-McCurdy requirements?

Answer. I do not recommend any changes at this time. The current relationship between the JROC and DOD officials charged with implementing the Nunn-McCurdy requirements is appropriate. The JROC's role is to validate the criticality to national security of the systems based on the estimated increase in cost.

URGENT NEEDS PROCESSES

Question. In your view, what specific steps should the Department take to better manage the joint urgent needs process?

Answer. The Department exercises sound management of the Joint Urgent Needs process. DOD Directive 5000.71 (Rapid Fulfillment of Combatant Commander Urgent Operational Needs) was recently approved. It established the Warfighter Senior Integration Group to lead and facilitate agile and rapid responses to validated combatant commander urgent operational needs. In addition, we recently added the ability for combatant commanders to request rapid capability fielding if conflict is imminent (rather than ongoing) through a Joint Emergent Operational Needs (JEON) document. I believe we have struck the right discipline and balance between addressing truly urgent and emergent warfighter needs and merely using the system to circumvent the rigor of the deliberate process (while at the same time we are streamlining the latter process).

Question. What is your sense of where DOD might consolidate urgent needs entities and/or processes and how cost savings could be achieved through such consolidation?

Answer. This is an area where we have taken many steps, and seen important results, over the past several years. To further improve upon our efforts, the Department is reviewing the entities and processes that we use to fill urgent capability gaps in light of our drawdown from Afghanistan. Without pre-judging any results, it is possible we could consolidate these entities, and we will remain vigilant for such opportunities. The goal will be to ensure the Department is still poised to quickly address evolving threats as we draw down from our wartime footing, while ensuring the efforts are properly-scaled for anticipated future requirements.

Question. Do you believe that the Joint Staff should take steps to integrate the Joint Urgent Needs process with the individual services' processes? If so, please explain?

Answer. We are currently reviewing our urgent needs processes, to include seeking efficiencies and deconfliction between the Services' processes and joint processes. Despite the success of our joint processes, I believe we will find that each Service will still need a way to address critical needs that are specific to their component.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS COUNCIL

Question. If confirmed as Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, you will continue to serve as a member of the Nuclear Weapons Council.

What would your priorities be for the Nuclear Weapons Council (NWC)?

Answer. Sustaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal is a key priority in the 2010 Nuclear Posture Review (NPR), central to the responsibilities of the NWC. I have worked closely with the other NWC members to develop a plan for the Nuclear Enterprise that is responsible and affordable to ensure a safe, secure, and effective nuclear arsenal for the long term. The refinement and execution of this plan continues to be my priority. We will need to remain vigilant, as the effects of potential full sequestration levels of funding on the Enterprise are not yet fully understood.

Additionally, I will continue to work with other NWC members to ensure modernization of our aging nuclear facilities and investment in nuclear enterprise-related human capital, to accelerate dismantlement of retired warheads, and to improve our understanding of foreign nuclear weapons activities.

Question. What changes if any would you recommend to the organization, structure, or function of the NWC?

Answer. I have served as a member of the NWC for the past 2 years and have no firm change recommendations at this time. However, if confirmed, I will continue work with the NWC chairman and members to assess the organization, structure and function of the NWC, and where warranted, provide recommendations for changes to increase effectiveness and value in support of the nuclear mission for national security. I will also remain alert for any need to adjust governance of the Nuclear Enterprise's activities.

INTEGRATION OF SPACE PROGRAMS

Question. What is your view on the need to institute a more integrated approach to both the military and intelligence sides of the space community?

Answer. I believe we are making progress in this area. The military and intelligence space communities participate in a number of joint forums and joint program development. We expect senior leaders to be innovative in identifying and implementing integrated programs. This is necessary for efficacy and efficiency in a much more constrained budget environment. However, when the needs of either community diverge to the extent that joint solutions impose impractical cost and risk, careful consideration should be given to viable independent, yet complementary solutions.

SPACE PROGRAM MANAGEMENT

Question. In many instances the military and intelligence space programs have experienced technical, budget, and schedule difficulties. In some instances these difficulties can be traced to problems with establishing realistic, clear, requirements and then maintaining control over the integrity of the requirements once established. If confirmed as chairman of the JROC you will be involved in determining these requirements.

How in your view can or should the space systems requirements process be improved?

Answer. All weapon systems requirements are closely scrutinized to best meet the needs of the Joint Force in terms of cost, schedule, and performance. If confirmed, I will continue to work with senior leaders to improve early and continuous coordination between OSD, the military, and intelligence communities throughout the space acquisition requirements process. The active participation of the U.S. Strategic Command (STRATCOM) Commander has been most helpful in this regard.

Question. In general, space programs take many years to move from conception to launch. The result is that the technology in the satellites is significantly outdated by the time the satellites are launched and operational, which in turn, can lead to a decision to terminate a program early, and look to a newer technology. This vicious cycle results in significantly increased costs for space systems as sunk costs are never fully amortized.

How in your view can this cycle be addressed?

Answer. The WSARA is designed to help ensure that new defense acquisition programs start on a sound footing, to avoid the high cost and schedule impacts of fixing problems later in the acquisition process.

Some aspects of this phenomenon will be very difficult to fix, as satellites by nature of their complexity and rigorous requirement for reliability take considerable time to design, build, and launch. However, I believe we can make improvements in our space programs by ensuring early, ongoing and rigorous reviews of costs, requirements, and performance, and their alignment. Again, bringing the expertise available from the STRATCOM Commander will be a key element in placing this cycle on a tighter rotation.

SPACE COOPERATION

Question. Do you support arms control limitations on space capabilities?

I continue to support the principles outlined in the 2010 National Space Policy, which states that the United States will pursue bilateral and multilateral transparency and confidence-building measures to encourage responsible actions in, and the peaceful use of, space. The Department should only consider proposals and concepts for arms control measures that are equitable, effectively verifiable, and enhance the national security of the United States and its allies.

Question. Would you support the United States signing the so-called European Union Code of Conduct for Outer Space Activities?

Answer. The Department is currently supporting the State Department in negotiations on the European Union's proposed International Code of Conduct for Outer Space Activities. This is an effort to develop a pragmatic first set of guidelines for safe activities in space. If confirmed, I remain committed to continuing our support to evaluating proposed drafts of the Code and considering appropriate steps to establish rules of the road for space operations that are consistent with our national security interests and access to space.

OPERATIONALLY RESPONSIVE SPACE

Question. Do you support the concept of operationally responsive small satellites and what do you see as the most promising opportunities for small satellites?

Answer. I support resilience in space programs and we are continuing to review and support programs that best meet the needs of the Joint Force in future conflicts and given fiscal constraints. Given unlimited funding I would want to push further and faster on this program. Under the current environment we will need to be very selective in pursuing operationally responsive space, and should select only those that provide best value. The most promising concepts would be for rapid reinsertion of communications and surveillance capability in the wake of the initial stages of a conflict with a space-capable adversary.

Question. Do you believe that smaller less complicated less expensive satellites can play a role in providing resiliency or redundancy for space systems?

Answer. I support resilience in space programs and we are continuing to review and support programs that best meet the needs of the Joint Force in future conflicts, within fiscal constraints. Such programs could include smaller less complicated less expensive satellites, and it could also include adding payloads to other satellites.

PROMPT GLOBAL STRIKE

Question. DOD is currently working on technologies that if successful could lead to the decision to develop and deploy conventional, non-nuclear, prompt global strike capability.

Do you believe that a prompt global strike capability should be developed and deployed?

Answer. Although a decision has not been made to deploy such a capability, I believe it would have potential utility in a variety of time-sensitive scenarios and would thus provide greater flexibility to the President for taking kinetic action if required. There are potential future circumstances that may require a capability to address high value, time sensitive and defended targets from ranges outside the current conventional technology. Therefore, we continue to look for affordable technology risk reduction and maturation of engineering concepts.

Question. If your answer to the previous question is yes, what is your vision of the capability that should be developed for prompt global strike and the types of targets that would underpin the need to develop the capability?

Answer. If a decision is made to develop and deploy a capability, it should have specific attributes. The capability should influence, dissuade, or defeat an adversary using conventional weapons to rapidly penetrate or circumvent access-denied areas.

It could be useful in situations ranging from a rapid strike against a known terrorist leader, to hitting a rogue regime's mobile missile that is positioned for launch, to quickly interfering with the ability of an adversary to target one of our space assets. This is an example of how we are actually trying to constrain requirements so we don't end up with gold plated systems we can't afford. So while it should be both prompt and accurate, not requiring the capability to hit any target on the globe or hit hard and deeply buried targets should allow us to hold an adequate set of targets at risk at lower cost.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Question. If confirmed, you will continue to be a member of the Nuclear Weapons Council, and work closely with the National Nuclear Security Administration and its Stockpile Stewardship Program.

What, in your view, are the longer-term Stockpile Stewardship Program goals and what are the key elements that should be addressed from a DOD perspective?

Answer. Congress established the Stockpile Stewardship Program with the aim of creating the computational capabilities and experimental tools needed to allow for the continued certification of the nuclear weapons stockpile as safe, secure, and reliable without the need for nuclear weapons explosive testing. The Secretaries of Defense and Energy are statutorily required to certify annually to Congress the safety, security, and reliability of the nuclear weapons stockpile.

I believe these goals are appropriate and the program is effective; today's stockpile has been certified without a need for further nuclear testing. But the stockpile is aging. The Nuclear Weapons Council has developed a long-term plan that includes life extension programs to address aging concerns and enhance safety and security in a responsible manner. I believe the plan is executable and affordable. If confirmed, I will work across the interagency to ensure this plan is continuously updated and implemented.

Question. In your view is the Stockpile Stewardship Program providing the tools to ensure the safety, reliability, and security of the nuclear weapons stockpile without testing and if not what tools are needed?

Answer. I believe that the Stockpile Stewardship Program provides the requisite tools, as attested to by the national security lab directors in their annual assessment letters. These tools are critical as we life-extend our aging nuclear weapons. As we sustain the program, it is important these tools allow us to assess the full range of life extension programs to include: refurbishment of existing warheads, reuse of nuclear components from different warheads, and replacement of nuclear components.

Question. Do you believe the administration's 1251 report sets forth an appropriate road map for the modernization of the nuclear weapons complex and the strategic delivery systems?

Answer. The administration's section 1043 report, which has replaced the 1251 report, describes an appropriate roadmap for ensuring the future safety, security, and reliability of the nuclear stockpile and associated delivery platforms as well as for modernizing the nuclear weapons complex. The plan described in the 1043 report represents a strong commitment to the nuclear mission and is an important element of assurance that the U.S. deterrent remains strong. Additionally, this plan reflects the work of the Nuclear Weapons Council in developing an executable and affordable long-term plan for the Nuclear Enterprise.

Question. Do you agree that the full funding of the President's plan for modernizing the nuclear weapons complex, commonly referred to as the 1251 report, is a critical national security priority?

Answer. Funding of the 1043 report, which has replaced the 1251 report, is a critical national security priority. The President's fiscal year 2014 budget request again includes a significant commitment from DOD to modernizing the nuclear weapon complex and supporting the long-term plan for extending the life of the weapons in our enduring stockpile. If confirmed, I will support the continued modernization and sustainment of our nuclear weapons delivery systems, stockpile, and infrastructure.

Question. Prior to completing this modernization effort do you believe it would be prudent to consider reductions below New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) limits for either the deployed or nondeployed stockpile of nuclear weapons?

Answer. U.S. objectives in future negotiations with Russia must consider multiple factors. It is my view that any reductions in the numbers of deployed and nondeployed nuclear weapons, either strategic or non-strategic, would need to be negotiated in a manner that strengthens deterrence of potential adversaries, maintains strategic stability with Russia and China, and assures our allies and partners. The timing and size of reductions, if any, would have to be closely coupled to the status of the modernization effort. If confirmed, I will support the Department's continuing assessment of the proper force size and capabilities required for an effective nuclear deterrent.

NEW START TREATY AND FUTURE REDUCTIONS

Question. The New START treaty has now entered into force. Under the terms of the treaty both sides have 7 years to come into compliance with the treaty.

Do you believe that there is any opportunity to come into compliance in less than 7 years and what would be the conditions under which such compliance could be achieved?

Answer. I believe the United States will be compliant by the February 2018 deadline although we have not made a final decision on the compliant force structure. Continued funding support from Congress is required to ensure the required activities of the department and the Services can be executed in a timely fashion for compliance. While achieving the limits on delivery vehicles will take nearly the entire compliance period, it may be possible to accelerate other elements of compliance, such as achieving the total deployed warhead limit of 1550 up to a year early.

Question. Do you believe that reductions in the total number of warheads, both Reserve and operationally deployed, is feasible prior to the expiration of the New START treaty and, if so, under what conditions?

Answer. The treaty requires the Parties to ensure their strategic offensive forces are at or below the treaty's three central limits 7 years after entry into force, which will occur on February 5, 2018. DOD is on schedule to comply with this obligation. The treaty expires in 2021 and may be extended one time for 5 years if both the United States and Russia agree. Once we are in compliance with the central limits, it is technically feasible to further reduce the total number of warheads; however I would only recommend such reductions through negotiations with Russia.

NUCLEAR TRIAD MODERNIZATION

Question. Under the NPR, the administration has committed to begin modernization of each leg of the nuclear triad including development of new nuclear cruise missiles and extending the life of nuclear weapons. This process will continue over the next 30 years and longer, and will be very expensive.

If confirmed, would you agree to review the requirements and cost of these initiatives, identify any opportunities for cost savings, and report back to the committee on a periodic basis if you identify such opportunities?

Answer. Yes. This falls under my responsibilities as Vice Chairman, and I would be pleased, if confirmed, to report any opportunities for cost savings to the committee. I am currently paying close attention within the bounds of my authority to development of the Long Range Strike Bomber, and intend to do the same for the new SSBN. I serve as a member of the Nuclear Weapons Council and have contributed over the past 2 years at developing an affordable and executable strategy for the Nuclear Enterprise that includes life extension programs of nuclear weapons.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY

Question. President Obama recently issued new guidance on nuclear weapons employments strategy, consistent with the 2010 NPR.

Do you support the President's new nuclear weapons employment guidance, and did you have an opportunity to provide input to the formulation of the new guidance?

Answer. Yes. I support the President's new guidance. The Commander of STRATCOM and I and our staffs both participated in the analysis process. The two of us and General Dempsey participated in senior leader meetings during development of the guidance, where, based on the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Commander of STRATCOM we provided our military advice to both the Secretary of Defense and the President.

Question. Do you agree with the President's assessment that the United States can ensure its security, and the security of our allies and partners, and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent while safely pursuing up to a one-third reduction in deployed strategic nuclear weapons below the level established in the New START treaty? Please explain your views.

Answer. Yes. I agree with this assessment. We can ensure our security and that of our allies and partners, and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent while pursuing further reductions beyond the New START treaty central limits. However, to be clear on this point, we must continue to adequately invest in the modernization of our nuclear infrastructure as long as nuclear weapons exist. Further, my advice is that further reductions in strategic nuclear weapons, beyond the New START treaty central limits, should occur as part of a negotiated position with Russia. Both General Dempsey and I have made this recommendation to the Secretary of Defense and to the President.

Question. Please explain the risks and benefits of pursuing up to a one-third reduction in deployed nuclear weapons, including the implications of the vast disparity in tactical nuclear weapons between Russia and the United States.

Answer. From our post-NPR analysis and close work with STRATCOM, the Navy, and the Air Force, I am confident we can ensure our security and that of our allies and partners, and maintain a strong and credible strategic deterrent while pursuing further reductions beyond the New START treaty central limits. However, to be very clear on this point, we must continue to adequately invest in the modernization of our nuclear infrastructure as long as nuclear weapons exist. Also, further reductions in strategic nuclear weapons, beyond the New START treaty central limits, should occur as part of a negotiated position with Russia in order to preserve strategic stability.

As we negotiate further reductions with Russia, to include their larger number of non-strategic nuclear weapons, I'm encouraged by the administration's efforts to expand the scope of those reductions to include both strategic and non-strategic nuclear weapons that are both deployed and non-deployed. I believe this is a prudent approach that will maintain strategic stability with Russia and adequately meet the President's goals of reducing the role and number of nuclear weapons.

STRATEGIC SYSTEMS

Question. Over the next 5 years, DOD will begin to replace or begin studies to replace all of the strategic delivery systems. For the next 15 plus years, DOD will also have to sustain the current strategic nuclear enterprise. This will be a very expensive undertaking.

Do you have any concerns about the ability of the Department to afford the costs of nuclear systems modernization while meeting the rest of the DOD commitments?

Answer. Yes. I am concerned that in the current budget environment will we be challenged to complete these modernization programs; thus, if confirmed, I will be paying very close attention to these programs as they develop and mature. The modernization of the strategic delivery systems and sustainment of the strategic nuclear enterprise is important to maintaining a safe, secure, and effective nuclear deterrent and is essential to deterring potential adversaries and assuring our allies. As with any funding choices in a fiscally constrained environment we will make decisions that will provide the best possible systems that are fiscally prudent while managing appropriate risk.

Question. If confirmed will you review the modernization and replacement programs to ensure that they are cost effective?

Answer. Yes. This falls under the responsibilities of Vice Chairman and I will continue to review the modernization and replacement programs to ensure that they are cost effective. I am already closely monitoring the Long Range Strike Bomber program and am satisfied that it is currently on track.

Question. The Department will begin to issue guidance from the recent decision to revise the Nuclear Employment Strategy.

Do you support this change in strategy?

Answer. Yes. As Vice Chairman I had the opportunity to participate, along with the Commander, STRATCOM, in the discussion of the new strategy and to provide the inputs from the Joint Chiefs.

Question. Will you keep Congress fully informed of additional guidance issued in response to this changed strategy?

Answer. Yes. I have and will continue to fully inform Congress of additional guidance issued as a result of the change in the Nuclear Employment Strategy.

FUTURE TECHNOLOGIES

Question. During the Cold War, DOD pursued three key technologies to offset the numerical superiority of Soviet conventional forces: precision guided munitions, stealth technology, and satellite-based navigation. These three technologies have given U.S. forces unparalleled superiority until now. Our technology edge, however, in these areas is beginning to erode. Last year, DOD published seven strategic science and technology priorities.

Do you believe these priorities are still relevant today?

Answer. Yes. The Joint Staff participated in a DOD process in 2011 to publish seven strategic science and technology priorities: electronic warfare/protection, data to decisions, engineered resilient systems, cyber science and technology, counter

WMD, autonomy and human systems. These seven priorities are still relevant today in assuring our leadership and superiority in future conflicts.

Question. If not, what additional technology priority areas should DOD be pursuing?

Answer. These seven strategic areas remain fully relevant. We need to ensure that several key capabilities remain included within research and development in these areas, including greater cyber capability (with emphasis on network protection), fully protected precision navigation and timing that is semi-independent of the global positioning system constellation, high speed standoff weapons, and improved ability for intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance through adverse weather and foliage.

BALLISTIC MISSILE DEFENSE

Question. Do you agree that the current Ground-based Midcourse Defense system, with interceptors deployed in Alaska and California, provides defense of the entire United States—including the east coast—against missile threats from both North Korea and Iran, and do you have confidence in that system?

Answer. Yes. I agree that the Ground-based Midcourse Defense system, supported by other elements of the ballistic missile defense architecture, provides defense of the United States from both a limited North Korean and Iranian long-range ballistic missile attack. I am confident in the system and say this even in light of the recent failure of a CE I missile test, of which we have now had three of four tests execute successfully. We still believe in this program and are determined that it succeed.

Question. On March 15, 2013, Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel announced a series of initiatives to improve our homeland ballistic missile defense capabilities, including the planned deployment of 14 additional Ground-Based Interceptors (GBIs) in Alaska, to help stay ahead of the long-range missile threat from North Korea and Iran.

Do you support the initiatives announced by Secretary Hagel, and do you believe they will help us stay ahead of the threat from North Korea and Iran?

Answer. Yes. I support Secretary Hagel's initiatives and believe they will improve DOD's ability to counter future missile threats from Iran and North Korea, while maximizing the benefit from increasingly scarce taxpayer resources.

Question. As indicated in the 2010 Ballistic Missile Defense Review, the administration is pursuing a "fly-before-you-buy" approach to missile defense, and will test systems in an operationally realistic manner to demonstrate they will work as intended before we deploy them. Since a GBI flight test failure with the Capability Enhancement-II kill vehicle in 2010, the Missile Defense Agency has been working to fix the problem and plans to conduct an intercept flight test in the spring of 2014 to demonstrate the fix.

Do you agree with the "fly-before-you-buy" policy, and do you agree with Secretary Hagel that, before we deploy the additional GBIs, we need to test and demonstrate the fix so we demonstrate its capability and have confidence that it will work as intended?

Answer. Yes. I agree with the "fly-before-you-buy" approach to test systems in an operationally realistic manner. It is essential to correct system issues before they affect the deployed forces.

Question. Section 227 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 requires an Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) for possible future homeland missile defense sites in the United States, in case the President determines to proceed with such a deployment in the future. That EIS process is expected to be complete in early 2016.

Do you agree that the EIS process should be completed prior to making any decision relative to possible deployment of an additional homeland missile defense site in the United States, including possibly on the east coast?

Answer. I agree the Department must comply with the National Environmental Policy Act and conduct an EIS prior to the actual deployment of an additional missile defense site in the United States. It follows that it would be wise to obtain the results of the EIS before making any decisions.

Question. Do you agree with the Director of the Missile Defense Agency and the Commander of the Joint Functional Component Command for Integrated Missile Defense that there is currently "no validated military requirement to deploy an East Coast missile defense site"?

Answer. Yes. Technically there is currently no validated military requirement to deploy an East Coast Missile Defense Site. However, that could change based on the trajectory of the threat from Iran, so we continuously analyze this assessment and will update it as required if we conclude differently.

Question. Do you agree with their assessment that "investment in Ballistic Missile Defense System discrimination and sensor capabilities would result in more cost-effective near-term improvements to homeland missile defense" than deploying an east coast missile defense site?

Answer. Yes. The MDA Director has made a compelling case that, along with reliability improvements to the interceptor, better sensor and discrimination capability would reduce the number of interceptors required to engage a given target. Thus, I believe this is the more cost effective approach and so agree with their assessment, which is consistent with the Department's analysis. However, if the threat achieves a trajectory that would indicate greatly increased capacity for producing ballistic missiles, it could be necessary to deploy an East Coast missile defense site, so we continue to assess the requirement.

Question. Do you agree with the following statements regarding a potential East Coast missile defense site:

> General Jacoby (Commander, U.S. Northern Command (NORTHCOM)): "A third site, wherever the decision is to build a third site, would give me better weapons access, increased GBI inventory and allow us the battle space to more optimize our defense against future threats from Iran and North Korea."
>
> General Formica (Commander Space and Missile Defense Command): "Certainly, it brings increased capacity and increased capability than we have at Fort Greely."
>
> National Research Council: "A GBI site located in northeastern United States would be much more effective and reliable and would allow considerably more battle space and firing doctrine options.

I fully agree with the first two statements. The question is whether or not a third site will be required given the trajectory of Iran's ability to produce quantities of ballistic missiles that can threaten the United States. I generally agree with the third statement, except a GBI site in the United States will not increase reliability—only improved interceptors and sensors and other technical improvements will accomplish that objective.

Question. Do you agree that Presidents Bush and Obama put in place policies that called for additional missile defense sites in Europe to better defend against threats to the United States from Iran?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Is this presidentially directed requirement still valid and if not, what has changed to permit the elimination of this requirement for a third interceptor site?

Answer. We have subsequently determined that, while maintaining our commitment to the defense of our North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) allies in Europe, it would be wiser and more fiscally prudent to invest in ballistic missile defense capability in terms of improved sensors and increased capacity at existing sites, while we evaluate the need for a third site in the United States. Engagement geometry and cost both favor this approach.

Question. You have focused on improving the cost effectiveness and affordability of our major weapon systems, including missile defenses. Missile defense systems are limited in quantity primarily by their very high cost, which is exacerbated in the current financial environment that includes sequestration.

What are your views on whether and how we can make missile defenses more cost-effective and affordable, and how we can manage our missile defense capabilities in a manner that best meets the needs of our combatant commanders?

Answer. We remain mindful of the fact that we are on a negative economic glideslope regarding regional ballistic missile defense, in which the offense is able to use relatively cheap missiles that are countered by relatively expensive defensive systems. In this regard, we should apply greater emphasis on more economic passive defense measures such as dispersal and hardening in order to make the most of our more complex defensive assets. We should also emphasize interoperability on a joint and coalition basis in order to use the full spectrum of offensive and defensive capabilities in a comprehensive joint manner so as to provide the best defense with the most economical use of resources. Candidly, we have more work to do in this regard, but are making progress. I have favored encouraging our coalition partners, including those in the Arabian Gulf region and the Western Pacific, to invest in ballistic missile defense capability in order to free resources for our own ballistic missile defense needs. Finally, I also favored moving a Terminal High Altitude Area Defense battery to Guam, which not only provides defense for Guam but also yields an asset that is globally deployable operating day-to-day in an actual operational environment in which it defends U.S. territory.

U.S.-IRAQ STRATEGIC RELATIONSHIP

Question. What is your assessment of the development of the U.S.-Iraq strategic relationship since the withdrawal of U.S. military forces at the end of 2011 consistent with the 2008 U.S.-Iraq Security Agreement?

Answer. The development of the U.S.-Iraq strategic relationship since 2011 has been a slow and deliberate process. The conflict in Syria, the Arab awakening, internal sectarian divisions, and Iran's ambitions for influence have dominated Iraq's focus. Sectarian violence and authoritarian moves by Prime Minister Maliki have also hindered some efforts. In many areas, U.S. and Iraqi strategic goals align, but in areas with less common ground such as Syria we continue to engage the Iraqis in order to transform them into true regional partners. Iraq's Foreign Military Sales (FMS) program offers a strong foundation to develop this strategic relationship, and the $14.3 billion in committed Iraqi national funds to FMS cases is a clear indication of the desire to continue to nurture our strategic relationship.

Question. What areas, if any, do you see for the enhancement of the military-to-military relationship between Iraq and the United States?

Answer. The main areas to enhance the U.S.-Iraq military-to-military relationship are the FMS program, the International Military Education and Training (IMET), and bilateral or multilateral exercises. The FMS program provides an avenue for Iraqi Security Forces to train on U.S. equipment and, in part, inside the United States. The IMET program helps develop Iraqi leaders through intermediate and senior level development education and long-term relationships with counterparts in the U.S. military. Both programs offer the opportunity to continue and enhance our military-to-military relationship. The U.S.-Iraq Strategic Framework Agreement and Joint Military Cooperation Agreement help ensure our military-to-military relationship remains on track.

Question. In your view, does the Office of Security Cooperation within the U.S. Embassy in Iraq have the right staffing levels and personnel to carry out its mission?

Answer. Based on assessments from the Chief of the Office of Security Cooperation in Iraq (OSC–I) and the U.S. Ambassador, I believe we have sufficient personnel to execute a coherent strategy between the Department of State and DOD. With the transition of Office of Security Cooperation in Iraq training sites during calendar year 2013 and the continued transition to FMS funded training, the previous need for 250(+) personnel in OSC–I has dissipated. I think we are on track to have the right number of personnel at the end of September 2013, using the glide path plan agreed upon by DOD, the U.S. Mission Iraq, and Main State. The Chief of OSC–I and the Ambassador will reassess the manning requirements once the last four sites transition later this year.

Question. What safeguards can be used to ensure Iraq does not employ F–16s in a way that increases sectarian strife within Iraq?

Answer. In addition to political influence based on our bilateral relationship, we would also retain the option of withholding F–16 training, support equipment, spare parts, or munitions. Iraqi misuse of F–16 aircraft would also complicate and potentially jeopardize FMS, Foreign Military Financing (FMF), and Individual Military Education and Training—which provides a credible deterrent. However, this issue offers no easy solution, and it is a challenge we face to some degree when we sell weapons systems to any partner.

SECURITY SITUATION IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. What is your assessment of the current security situation in Afghanistan?

Answer. The security situation in Afghanistan continues to improve, and the ANSF is proving they are willing and capable of assuming the lead in security operations. U.S. and coalition forces, working side by side with our Afghan partners, have reversed the Taliban's momentum and pushed insurgents out of population centers. The ANSF and ISAF continue to deprive the insurgents of key safe havens, command and control nodes, and support zones. They are now less capable, less popular, and less of a threat to the Afghan Government than a year ago. Despite this degradation, safe havens in Afghanistan and sanctuaries in Pakistan continue to provide Taliban senior leadership some freedom of movement and freedom of action. Additionally, Afghan Taliban and all its subgroups, including the Haqqani Network, remain capable of conducting isolated high profile attacks that, as intended, capture disproportionate attention. However, sustained counterterrorism pressure continues to degrade this ability.

TRANSITION OF SECURITY RESPONSIBILITY IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. In February of this year, President Obama announced that by February 2014 U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan will be reduced to 34,000. In June, the Afghan National Security Forces achieved Transition Milestone 2013, assuming the lead responsibility for security throughout Afghanistan.

Do you support the President's decision to reduce U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan to 34,000 by February 2014? Why or why not?

Answer. Yes. Transition Milestone 2013 represents a significant shift for our mission in Afghanistan. Over the past 11 years, the United States and our partners have led combat operations. Now the Afghans are taking the lead for their own security. ISAF's primary focus has shifted from directly fighting the insurgency to supporting the Afghan National Security Forces (ANSF). We match troop levels to the mission and our new mission requires fewer troops on the ground. The President's decision to drawdown U.S. forces was made based on the ISAF Commander's input, the real and tangible progress of the ISAF military campaign, and a comprehensive assessment of conditions on the ground, including an increasingly capable and confident ANSF.

Question. What is your understanding regarding the pace of those reductions in U.S. forces?

Answer. Troop reductions are based on our mission, ANSF capability and conditions on the ground. We are on path to meet our objective of 34,000 troops by February 2014, to include troops, bases, and equipment. It is important for the ISAF Commander to have the flexibility to meet his mission and sustain the right forces through this fighting season and he has the latitude to manage the glideslope from now to the end of the year as we settle into a supporting role.

Question. Do you support the June transition to the Afghan security forces of lead responsibility for security throughout Afghanistan?

Answer. I support the transition of responsibility for security to a capable and confident ANSF. ANSF improvement has enabled us to achieve transition Milestone 2013. There are occasional setbacks and deficiencies, but the ANSF continues to demonstrate its ability to defeat the Taliban and provide security to the Afghan people.

Question. In your view, is the campaign on track for the completion of the ISAF mission and the assumption by Afghan security forces of full responsibility for the country's security by December 2014?

Answer. Yes. The ANSF are at the forefront of the fight and are now responsible for maintaining and expanding security in the face of the insurgency. In late 2009, a concerted effort to grow the ANSF was initiated with the goal of generating and fielding trained and equipped Afghan combat elements and getting them into the fight. Unit partnering between Afghan and ISAF forces—enabled by the U.S. troop surge ordered by President Obama—provided the ANSF the space to develop combat capabilities and leadership skills from the tactical level on up. Moving into the 2013 fighting season, the insurgency now confronts a combined ANSF and Afghanistan Local Police (ALP) force of nearly 350,000 personnel who have secured over 87 percent of Afghanistan's population, and are leading 93 percent of all conventional operations. The only conventional operations they are not leading are a small number of unilateral conventional operations including security patrols around ISAF bases, route clearance patrols, and retrograde operations. These forces are operating with growing confidence, improved leadership, warfighting capability, and a vision for the future. They are a source of security, confidence, and pride for the Afghan people—factors the insurgents must consider as their influence and effectiveness in Afghanistan wanes.

BUILDING THE AFGHAN NATIONAL SECURITY FORCES

Question. In your view, is the current end strength level of 352,000 for the ANSF the appropriate level to provide security and stability in Afghanistan beyond 2014?

Answer. In my view, the 352,000 ANSF force level should continue beyond 2014. The extension of the ANSF "surge" force has been instrumental in breaking Taliban momentum. This force structure also enables our own troop reductions and retrograde operations. It is too early to assess the duration of this surge, but at a minimum, this extension would likely be necessary for at least 2 years following the end of the ISAF mission.

Question. What in your view are the greatest challenges to completing efforts to build the capacity of the ANSF to assume responsibility for Afghanistan's security?

Answer. Although not insurmountable, the main challenges we face in building the capacity of the ANSF are attrition, leadership, limited literacy and low technical competence. Low literacy rates, in particular, hamper the ANSF ability to meet goals in more technical areas. This is of greatest concern in the Afghan Air Force. Under current conditions, the creation of a fully functional Afghan Air Force is still 4 to 5 years off. ANSF has made great strides and is showing significant improvement, but these issues continue to undermine positive recruiting, training, professionalization, and competency goals. These are not problems that can be solved in the short term, but ISAF is continuing to work with the MoI and the MoD to address training the force in areas of professionalism, leadership, literacy, and technical competency. Over time, and with our assistance, we are confident that the ANSF address these challenges.

Question. A recent audit report by the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR) raised concerns about DOD plans to purchase PC–12 aircraft and Mi-17 helicopters for the Afghan Special Mission Wing and recommended suspending the contracts for these purchases. The Department of Defense and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Training Mission-Afghanistan/Combined Security Transition Command-Afghanistan did not concur with the SIGAR's recommendation on contract suspension.

What is your assessment of current plans to equip the Afghan Special Mission Wing with PC–12 aircraft and Mi-17 helicopters?

Answer. Our strategy in Afghanistan includes reducing the reliance on U.S. enablers by building the capability of the ANSF. Developing the Afghan Air Force and the SMW is a key element in reducing our requirement to provide aviation support to the ANSF. The fact is that Afghans are better able to fly and maintain these systems, which will be a necessary capability for the ANSF to prevail over the Taliban.

Question. What is your assessment of the impact to Afghanistan counterterrorism efforts if Mi-17 helicopters are not acquired?

Answer. It is critical for us to support a robust helicopter capability within the ANSF. Analysis shows that the Mi-17 is the best all-around helicopter for them. The ANSF is familiar with the Mi-17, which is well suited for transporting combat-ready Afghan troops throughout remote, high, hot, and rugged terrain with minimal ground support. It is easier for the ANSF to maintain this helicopter than more sophisticated aircraft. While it is unfortunate that the Mi-17 is the optimal vertical lift solution for the ANSF, we view it as critical for successful transition of security to the ANSF.

Question. Do you support the SIGAR recommendation to suspend the contracts to acquire these aircraft and helicopters for the Special Mission Wing? Why or why not?

Answer. We support the SIGAR audit in general but not the specific recommendation to suspend contracts for the Special Mission Wing. We, to include COMISAF, believe that we can overcome the difficulties of maintenance, training and personnel that were identified in the audit. It is in both Afghan and U.S. interest that the Afghans develop their own counterterrorism and counternarcotics capability on a timeline that supports our transition. These aircraft are essential for these tasks. That said, we acknowledge the maintenance and operational challenges that SIGAR identifies. We will work through these in concert with COMISAF. We cannot afford, however, the sequential approach that SIGAR recommends. Training, maintenance, personnel and aircraft procurement will continue apace with governing management to ensure coordinated fielding of ready capability. Notably in this context, the Mi-17 is the best aircraft to meet the SIGAR identified challenges. The Afghans have over 30 years of experience with the Mi-17 to include current operations. Any other aircraft would substantially worsen the challenges reported in the audit and set back fielded capability by years.

ENDURING STRATEGIC PARTNERSHIP WITH AFGHANISTAN

Question. Do you support maintaining an enduring strategic partnership between the United States and Afghanistan beyond 2014?

Answer. Yes. We remain committed to an enduring strategic partnership with Afghanistan. Such a partnership is in our national interest, and critical to our objectives of disrupting, dismantling, and defeating al Qaeda and preventing its return to Afghanistan, and denying the Taliban the ability to overthrow the Afghan Government.

Question. How would you describe the main U.S. strategic interests regarding an enduring relationship with Afghanistan and in that region?

Answer. We are committed to a long-term partnership with Afghanistan. It is in our national interest to ensure that Afghanistan never again becomes a safe haven for al Qaeda or its affiliates that pose a threat to our Homeland.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. Special Operations Forces depend on general purpose forces for many enabling capabilities, including intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance (ISR); logistics; and medical evacuation. Admiral McRaven, Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command, has said "I have no doubt that special operations will be the last to leave Afghanistan" and has predicted that the requirement for Special Operations Forces may increase as general purpose forces continue to be drawn down.

If confirmed, how would you ensure adequate enabling capabilities for Special Operations Forces as general purpose forces continue to draw down in Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I would work to ensure adequate enabling capabilities to support the SOF mission by working collaboratively with CENTCOM and NATO to determine requirements and fill them to the maximum extent possible. These enabling capabilities would be tailored to support our post-2014 mission and would be based on force levels that have yet to be decided.

Question. In April 2012, the U.S. and Afghanistan signed a memorandum of understanding on the "Afghanization" of direct action counterterrorism missions in Afghanistan—reflecting the shared intention of having Afghan security forces in the lead in the conduct of such operations with U.S. forces in a support role.

What is the status of efforts to put Afghan Special Operations Forces in the lead for such operations and why do you believe such a transition is important?

Answer. The ANSF SOF continue to make significant progress in operational effectiveness, and their independence, capacity, and competence. One hundred percent of ANA Special Operation Forces missions are Afghan led, and approximately 60 percent of Provincial Response Company police missions are Afghan led. With our mentorship, their ability to execute these types of missions continues to grow in sophistication. This capability is critical for GIRoA to demonstrate its ability to lead security operations.

Question. The Village Stability Operations (VSO) and Afghan Local Police (ALP) programs—both U.S. Special Operations missions—have been consistently praised by U.S. military leaders as critical elements of the counterinsurgency strategy in Afghanistan.

What are your views on the value of these programs and do you believe they should be part of the long-term strategy in Afghanistan (i.e. post-2014)?

Answer. These programs represent a visible expression of local security to many Afghans, particularly those in remote and isolated communities. GIRoA has identified VSO/ALP as a necessary pillar of its own long-term strategy. These programs provide a vehicle for GIRoA to extend governance to the local level.

PAKISTAN

Question. What is your assessment of the military-to-military relationship between the United States and Pakistan?

Answer. Our military-to-military relationship has improved in the past year, emerging from the crisis that occurred subsequent to the cross-border incident in late 2011 and subsequent closure of the ground lines of communication through Pakistan used for our logistics in Afghanistan. While Pakistan defines its interests in ways that overlap but are not identical to ours, our military-to-military ties allow us to engage Pakistan in areas of shared concern such as maintaining regional stability, curbing violent extremism, and countering the threat of improvised explosive devices. The Chairman, the Central Command Commander, and the ISAF Commander have frequent interaction with General Kayani, and the Office of the Defense Representative in Pakistan has close ties with counterparts. Pakistani counterinsurgency operations against extremist organizations have been helpful to our efforts in the region. Security assistance, Coalition Support Fund reimbursements, and cross-border coordination with ISAF and Afghan forces have helped enable these operations. The Pakistani military has also hosted several U.S. delegations this year to discuss the IED problem and other issues.

Question. Should that military-to-military relationship be enhanced, and if so, what steps would you recommend for doing so, if confirmed?

Answer. Military-to-military ties with Pakistan are an important aspect of the broader bilateral relationship. A key moment in this relationship will occur when General Kayani transitions out of his job this fall. The Office of the Defense Representative in Pakistan plays an important role in building and sustaining military-military ties with security assistance programs. As Pakistan's democratic consolidation progresses, we must ensure we maintain our military-to-military ties. Security cooperation cannot succeed without the buy-in of Pakistani military leadership and continued support of the U.S. Congress. I meet with Pakistani representatives when they are in Washington, but normally leave the central personal interactions to the Chairman, the Central Command Commander, and the ISAF Commander in order to keep under control the number of different voices the Pakistani leadership hears. However, if confirmed, I will focus on ensuring our relations remain smooth and stable during the transition to General Kayani's successor, along with ways in which we can work productively with Pakistan to enhance security along the shared border with Afghanistan and stability in both Afghanistan and Pakistan.

IRAN

Question. Iran continues to expand its nuclear program and has failed to provide full and open access to all aspects of its current and historic nuclear program to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

What is your assessment of the military and political threat posed by Iran?

Answer. Iran's persistent, though often clumsy, efforts to undermine our partners and spread its influence pose a significant potential threat to the United States, our allies and partners, and our regional and global interests. Countering Iran's destabilizing hostile behavior requires addressing multiple threat vectors, including conventional military, unconventional state-sponsored terrorism, and nuclear challenges.

- Conventional Military Challenges. Iran is actively investing in the development of a range of conventional capabilities, including air, missile, and naval assets that have generated regional anxieties and could threaten our interests and personnel in the region. Iran continues to publicly threaten to use naval and missile forces to close the Strait of Hormuz or target U.S. interests and regional partners in response to increasing sanctions or an attack on the country.
- Unconventional Challenges. Iran is also one of the main State-sponsors of terrorism, proxy and surrogate groups, and unconventional attacks, including against U.S. personnel and interests. Over the past 3 decades, Iran has methodically cultivated a network of terrorist and militant groups capable of targeting regional and global targets. Iran also continues to provide arms, funding, and paramilitary training to extremist groups.
- Nuclear Challenges. Iran continues to pursue an illicit nuclear program that threatens to provoke a regional arms race, and undermine the global non-proliferation regime. Iran is proceeding with uranium enrichment and heavy-water nuclear reactor activities in violation of multiple United Nations Security Council resolutions, and Iran continues to develop ballistic missiles that could be adapted to deliver nuclear weapons.

Iran's security threats toward Israel will persist, and there remains a high potential that Iran will make a serious miscalculation of U.S. resolve leading to rapid escalation of conflict. Politically, Iran will seek to use its capabilities to enable greater influence in the region, particularly with our Gulf Cooperation Council partners and in the border nations of Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan—where U.S. presence has decreased in recent years.

Question. What is your assessment of U.S. policy with respect to Iran?

Answer. I fully support the U.S. policy of preventing Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. The United States is also pursuing a multi-vector strategy that I have labeled a strategic progression. This strategy initially began with outreach which, while unsuccessful, established the foundation required for pressuring Iran under the most intrusive sanctions regime in history. This pressure also includes diplomatic isolation through U.N. Security Council Resolutions, diplomatic engagement through the P5+1, and military pressure through contingency preparations and exercises. Should Iran fail to meet its obligations regarding cessation of nuclear weapons development, we have additional options to coerce Iran into doing so using military force that are available to the President. Meanwhile, we continue to sustain pressure on Iran's other nefarious activity, and we are reassuring partners through our presence in the Arabian Gulf region and through various security commitments.

Question. What more do you believe the United States and the international community can and should do to dissuade Iran from pursuing nuclear weapons?

Answer. We should maintain the current strategic progression, which is currently in what I would describe as the "pressure" stage. Should pressure not work and Iran continue to progress, it may become necessary to further increase pressure or transition to a more coercive stage. That is a policy question best addressed by President's national security team, in which the Chairman and I participate. If confirmed, I will work to ensure we are well prepared to pursue all military options necessary to achieve this end.

Question. In your view, what are the risks associated with reducing U.S. presence in the Middle East with respect to the threat posed by Iran?

Answer. A precipitous reduction of U.S. force presence in the Middle East would negatively impact our ability to deter aggression and assure our partners. We still maintain a large number of forces deployed to the region, and have managed minor reductions—such as a recent restoral of aircraft carrier presence to more traditional levels—by messaging our continued resolve, through our known ability to restore presence, and through our global strike capability. I would add that our ability to respond to an Iranian provocation is impacted more by the decline in readiness associated with budget reductions under the sequester mechanism than by a reduction in presence.

Question. In your view, what has been the effect of sanctions against Iran—how effective have they been and should additional unilateral or multilateral sanctions be levied against Iran?

Answer. Because of these sanctions, Iran's financial, trade, and economic outlook has deteriorated significantly. Inflation and unemployment are also growing. International sanctions have hindered Iran's weapons procurement efforts and driven up the costs of obtaining necessary components for its military. Sanctions also appear to have slowed Iran's progress on its nuclear program, making it increasingly difficult for Iran to import needed materials or skills. That said, should Iran maintain its defiance of the international community and continue to develop a nuclear weapon, it may be necessary to step up sanctions even further.

Question. In your view, what role should DOD play in countering Iran's support of international terrorism?

Answer. Iranian support for proxy terrorist activities around the world constitutes a serious threat not only for the stability of our partners and allies who are directly impacted by these activities, but also for U.S. interests. DOD counters Iran's destabilizing activities in multiple ways. The Department supports diplomatic and intelligence efforts that inhibit activities of Iranian proxy and terrorist groups. Additionally, we use DOD presence in the region to deter and, when directed by the President, disrupt Iranian aggression. Further, we use our strong security cooperation relationships with regional and global partners to counter Iran's destabilizing activities. We will continue to work with the intelligence community and our many regional partners to maintain awareness of—and where feasible disrupt—Iran's asymmetric efforts.

Question. Do you agree with President Obama that all options, including military options, should remain on the table with respect to Iran?

Answer. Yes. We keep all options credibly on the table to inhibit Iranian aggression and nuclear ambitions by maintaining a robust regional presence, conducting prudent planning for all contingencies, and exercising independently and with our many partners.

Question. What is your assessment of whether sanctions as currently enacted will stop Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapons capability?

Answer. The Departments of State and Treasury have put in place wide-ranging and unprecedented international sanctions. I believe they are having a dramatic effect on the Iranian economy and should continue. They appear to have made some difference, though not yet a decisive difference, in the Supreme Leader's calculations. Thus, it remains to be seen whether these sanctions will alter Iran's course. We have plans in place to take additional action if required.

SYRIA

Question. What is your assessment of the situation in Syria and its impact on the region?

Answer. The crisis in Syria is a dynamic, complex and unlimited sectarian struggle between two sides who believe that to lose means the most severe end state. It is manifesting deep ethno-sectarian divisions across the region. The conflict risks the spread of chemical weapons and the emergence of a terrorist group that could threaten U.S. interests, and it has already cost the lives of over 100,000 Syrian people and the displacement of many more. Its regional impacts extend in varying degrees to Israel, Turkey, Jordan, Lebanon, and Iraq. Competition between and among states with regional interests continues to fuel the violence from afar, deepening Sunni-Shia and Sunni-Sunni tensions within Syria and beyond.

We continue to provide military options to the President and to work with our interagency and regional partners to address the destabilizing effects of this crisis.

Question. In your view, what is the most appropriate role for the United States in assisting regional friends and allies respond to the situation in Syria?

Answer. The United States is pursuing a diplomatic solution in Syria with the goal of a transitional government with full executive power by mutual consent, and is providing considerable humanitarian and non-lethal support to the forces opposing the Syrian Government. The U.S. military is providing support to the surrounding countries through multilateral planning efforts, exercises, and some humanitarian assistance. We are continuously engaged with key regional partners such as Jordan, Lebanon, Turkey, and Iraq to provide assistance, technical knowledge, and military contingency planning. We have placed a number of F–16s and a Patriot battery in Jordan to demonstrate our commitment to that nation's security.

Question. In your view, what—if any—role should the U.S. military play with respect to the situation in Syria?

Answer. There is a broad spectrum of potential roles the U.S. military could play in Syria. These include helping provide humanitarian assistance, providing security assistance to Syria's neighbors, and providing non-lethal assistance to the opposition, including essential provisions such as food and medical supplies—all of which we are currently doing. The military could support an international effort to dismantle Syria's chemical weapons program in a permissive post-Assad environment. Although there are legal hurdles involved, additional U.S. military involvement could include training, advising and assisting opposition forces from outside Syria—forces carefully selected to minimize the chances that they would abuse the power we would provide. At an unclassified level, the U.S. military could also conduct a broad spectrum of kinetic options in Syria, ranging from different types of limited kinetic strikes designed to achieve a variety of objectives, to different varieties of no-fly zone or humanitarian safe zones. All of these options have been presented to the National Security Staff for consideration by the Principals and the President. Each comes with costs, risks, legal hurdles, and opportunity costs. Notably, given the degradation of U.S. Air Force readiness due to the effects of the fiscal year 2013 sequester, the higher levels of kinetic response would impose severe opportunity costs for potential contingencies elsewhere in the world.

Question. In your view, what role—if any—are Iran, Russia, and Hezbollah playing in the current conflict in Syria?

Answer. Russia, Iran, and Hezbollah continue to provide support to the Assad regime.

Russia continues to provide arms, diplomatic and financial support to the Syrian regime. I defer to the intelligence community for specifics. Though it has recently held off on providing the S–300 surface to air missile system, it could reverse this decision at any time. Russia's continued support for the regime has cost it considerable credibility in the region.

Meanwhile, in order to support its client Hezbollah and sustain a hostile state on Israel's border, Iran provides the Assad regime with financial support, weapons, training, and advice regarding how to conduct the fight against the opposition forces.

Hezbollah has provided advice and has injected a considerable number of forces directly into the fight, providing a decisive capability in some cases, though sustaining serious losses. Again, I would defer to the intelligence community for specifics.

Question. In your view, what are the prospects of a negotiated solution in Syria?

Answer. Clearly, a negotiated settlement is the preferred path to achieving our policy objectives. However, its prospects are diminished by the sectarian and "total war" character of the conflict. The intelligence community has indicated that this type of conflict only is resolved through negotiation when both sides are exhausted or the dominant side is forced to the table by a major patron state. The former will likely take many years, and the likelihood of latter occurring is questionable. Greatly complicating the likelihood of a negotiated settlement is the factious nature of the opposition forces—despite intense pressure by its international patrons to coalesce politically, the opposition is still not united.

Question. In your view, is the momentum currently on the side of the Assad regime or the forces fighting to overthrow Syria?

Answer. The Assad regime—with direct support from Hezbollah, and weapons provided by Iran and Russia—has recently regained control of several areas previously in dispute or under the control of opposition forces. Momentum can ebb back and forth in these types of conflict, and it would appear to have shifted towards the regime in that part of the country.

Question. Are there asymmetric options that bypass Syria's integrated air defense system rather than kinetically neutralize it, such as standoff weapons and/or stealth, and what is your assessment of those options from a military perspective?

Answer. We have a range of military options. These are best discussed in a classified setting.

AL QAEDA

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda affiliates to the U.S. Homeland, U.S. interests overseas, and western interests more broadly? Which affiliates are of most concern?

Answer. A decade of relentless counterterrorism pressure has degraded al Qaeda's ability to operate. They are less capable of staging sophisticated, complex attacks against the west. Despite these setbacks, al Qaeda retains its intent to plan and conduct terrorist attacks against the west. Al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) remains the AQ associated group most likely and capable of attempting an attack on the United States in the near-term. Other groups, such as al Qaeda in Iraq, al Shabaab, al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb, and others are more preoccupied with struggles internal to the areas in which they operate. However, to varying degrees they still have the intent and capability of conducting an attack on the United States or its people.

THE 2001 AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF MILITARY FORCE

Question. What is your understanding of the scope and duration of the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF)?

Answer. The United States is in an armed conflict against al Qaeda and its associated forces. An associated force is defined as a group that: (1) is an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda, and (2) is a co-belligerent with al Qaeda in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners. These are the same terrorist threats that perpetrated the attacks on U.S. soil on September 11, 2001, and the AUMF still serves as the legal basis under U.S. domestic law to employ military force against these threats.

Question. What factors govern DOD determinations as to where the use of force is authorized, and against whom, pursuant to the AUMF?

Answer. In May 2013, the President promulgated Presidential Policy Guidance (PPG) governing direct action against terrorist targets located outside the United States and areas of active hostilities. This establishes procedures for DOD to conduct these types of military operations. The PPG and its derivative operational plans formalize DOD standards, policies, and determinations concerning where, how, and against whom military force may be utilized outside the United States and areas of active hostilities. DOD meticulously follows the procedures of the PPG to ensure we make well-informed and ethical/legal decisions based on the most up-to-date intelligence and the expertise of our national security professionals. Senior commanders and their legal advisors carefully review all operations for compliance with U.S. and international law before a decision is rendered by the Secretary of Defense or the President.

Question. Are you satisfied that current legal authorities, including the AUMF, enable the Department to carry out counterterrorism operations and activities at the level that you believe to be necessary and appropriate?

Answer. The AUMF in its current form provides necessary and sufficient authorities to counter al Qaeda and its associated forces. If a terrorist threat emerges that does not fit within the AUMF, the DOD would consult with Congress and the executive branch on the question of authorities.

YEMEN AND AL QAEDA IN THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

Question. What is your assessment of the current U.S. strategy in Yemen and what is your understanding of the role of DOD within that strategy?

Answer. Our overall engagement strategy with Yemen is solid. It combines diplomatic, economic, and security initiatives to improve stability and security and assist president Hadi during this period of transition. Building an enduring partnership with the Yemeni military is key to addressing critical security threats, including the campaign against AQAP. The security situation in Yemen remains fragile and we must continue our partnership and support.

Question. Given the continuing political instability and slow progress of reforms to the military in Yemen, what are your views on the United States continuing to provide security assistance—most significantly DOD section 1206 funding—to Yemeni counterterrorism forces?

Answer. A stable Yemen that is free of violent extremist remains in our best interest. AQAP elements seek to exploit instability and pose a legitimate threat to the United States, our assets in the region, and the transitional Yemeni Government. While progress has been slow, President Hadi and the military are taking steady steps to reform and restructure the military as part of the overall political transition process. They continue to engage the United States for support and advice on the military reorganization. The 1206 funds remain critical to building the capacity of Yemeni counter terrorism forces to disrupt and degrade the AQAP operational space.

SOMALIA AND AL SHABAAB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Shabaab?

Answer. While al Shabaab remains on the defensive, it has demonstrated a continued willingness and ability to conduct complex attacks against western interests and Somali Government targets in Mogadishu. This trend will likely continue throughout the rest of 2013, despite increasingly public disputes amongst al Shabaab senior officials and the efforts by the Somali Government, the African Union Mission in Somalia, and Ethiopian National Defense Forces to maintain pressure on the group.

Question. In your view, does al Shabaab pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area?

Answer. Al Shabaab does pose a threat to allied interests in East Africa, but it does not pose a direct threat to the Homeland or Europe at present. Al Shabaab merged with al Qaeda in February 2012 and shares al Qaeda's global jihadist objectives. However, the group continues to focus its efforts on defending territory in Somalia against the coalition of the Somali Government, the African Union Mission in Somalia, and Ethiopian military forces—as well as conducting attacks in East Africa.

Question. Should the United States establish military-to-military relations and consider providing assistance to the Somali national military forces?

Answer. If I am confirmed, I will work to ensure we are prepared to establish military-to-military relations with the new Somali National Army in support of the State Department efforts to recognize and strengthen the Somalia Federal Government. Meanwhile, we plan to continue assistance to our partner nations in the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) and explore ways to assist the Somali National Army. Somali stability in the near-term depends on AMISOM. Long-term, their security would be strengthened by a professional and accountable Somali National Army.

AL QAEDA IN THE ISLAMIC MAGHREB

Question. What is your assessment of the threat posed by al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)?

Answer. Al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and its allies have proven resilient despite the French-led military intervention in Mali. They are exploiting the Tuareg rebellion in northern Mali for safety. Although these groups no longer control key strategic towns, they retain the capability to launch sporadic attacks within Mali and neighboring countries, expand their safehaven, and attract recruits in pursuit of a hardline Islamic state based on al Qaeda ideology. AQIM will likely continue to bolster its ties to al Qaeda-associated terrorist groups throughout the region, such as Boko Haram in Nigeria, in order to influence and support attack planning. AQIM will continue to pose a local and regional threat into 2014, as North African Governments struggle to disrupt AQIM movement across expansive, porous borders.

Question. In your view, does AQIM pose a threat to the United States and/or western interests outside of its immediate operational area? What capacity has AQIM demonstrated to plan and carry out actions threatening U.S. interests?

Answer. In my view, the U.S. Homeland is not significantly threatened by AQIM. We see no indications the group places a priority on attacks outside North Africa and the Sahel, at least in the near term. However, the group remains a credible threat to U.S. and Western interests within North and West Africa, where it has conducted or attempted attacks in several countries (i.e. Mali, Niger, Algeria, Mauritania), and possibly in Europe. AQIM will likely continue to bolster its ties to al Qaeda-associated terrorist groups throughout the region, such as Boko Haram in Nigeria, in order to influence and support attack planning.

Question. In your view, what has been the impact of the recent expansion of AQIM's area of operations in northern Mali on the group's capacities and aims?

Answer. The expansion of al Qaeda in the Lands of the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) in Mali between early 2012 and January 2013 increased the group's capacity as it collaborated with splinter groups al-Tawhid wa al-Jihad in West Africa, al-Mulathamun battalion, and Tuareg rebel group Ansar al-Din to enlarge its area of operations to several cities in northern Mali and enforce Sharia law. Although the group expanded in size, this growth has not changed the group's regionally-focused aim of establishing Sharia throughout North Africa. Following heavy losses in the subsequent French-led intervention, AQIM largely retreated to its traditional safehaven in the Tigharghar mountains, where it continues to regroup and remains capable of conducting attacks in the region.

COMBATING TERRORISM

Question. The administration recently released its National Strategy for Counterterrorism. This strategy highlights the need to maintain pressure on al Qaeda's core while building the capacity of partners to confront mutual threats. The strategy also underscores the need to augment efforts to counter threats from al Qaeda-linked threats "that continue to emerge from beyond its core safe haven in South Asia."

How do you view the DOD's role under the new National Strategy for Counterterrorism?

Answer. DOD's role is one element of a comprehensive government approach that integrates our unique capabilities with those of our interagency partners and allies. In support of our strategic goals to combat al Qaeda-linked threats in South Asia and beyond, DOD is building partner capacity by training, advising, and assisting partnered forces to confront mutual threats. DOD will also continue to conduct lethal action against terrorist networks within rigorous guidelines, accountability methods, and standards.

Question. What is your understanding of the impact of the Presidential Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism on DOD's role within the U.S. Government's counterterrorism strategy? Will DOD see its role increase or decrease? Will DOD require any new authorities or any increased capabilities or capacities?

Answer. I feel our current authorities are sufficient to play our part in defending the Nation against existing terrorist threats. Counterterrorism is a deeply interagency effort that includes intelligence, law enforcement and defense capabilities, and our success stems in large part from the exceptional cooperation in this regard that has developed over the years. It remains to be seen, but it is possible the DOD role could increase under the PPD. The recently signed Presidential Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism is a codification of policies and procedures that have been applied for some time. The PPG and its derivative operational plans formalize the standards, policies, and determinations of DOD concerning where, how, and against whom military force may be utilized outside the United States and areas of active hostilities.

U.S. military capabilities are but one part of our comprehensive counterterrorism effort. We will continue to enable our allies to develop the capability to counter terrorists within their borders. When direct action is necessary, DOD meticulously follows the PPG procedures to ensure we make well-informed decisions based on the most up-to-date intelligence and the expertise of our national security professionals. The Department implements a rigorous, transparent and accountable review process. We will scrupulously adhere to the rule of law and the highest ethical standards in implementing the strategy and guidance.

Question. Are there steps DOD should take to better coordinate its efforts to combat terrorism with those of other Federal departments and agencies?

Answer. I believe that improved interagency cooperation is one of the signature accomplishments of the struggle against terrorism over the last decade. Nonetheless, improving interagency coordination was a key finding in our Decade of War study, and it is essential that we continue to raise the bar. At the national level, the Joint Staff participates in both the National Security Staff's Counterterrorism Security Group and the President's Counterterrorism Board of Directors. At the regional level, our geographic combatant commands advance our efforts by working closely with U.S. embassies, interagency partners and local actors. The Department continues to work with our interagency partners to assess and integrate lessons learned into our doctrine, training, planning, and operations.

Question. What do you view as the role of DOD in countering al Qaeda and affiliated groups in cyberspace?

Answer. We view cyber as an essential capability for Joint Force 2020. Similar to our other counterterrorism efforts, we recognize that defense of cyberspace requires an integrated approach to providing the best protection possible for our Nation. Working with intelligence, homeland security, and law enforcement partners, we will remain alert to the potential for cyber attacks on our Homeland conducted by terrorist groups. Meanwhile, opportunities exist for DOD to assist in the exploitation of cyberspace to counter extremist messaging through military information support operations. We have processes in place to identify and defend against cyber attacks, and share information with industry to mitigate effects.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES

Question. The previous two Quadrennial Defense Reviews (QDRs) have mandated significant growth in our Special Operations Forces (SOF) and enablers that directly support their operations.

Do you believe that QDR directed growth in the size of SOF should be retained despite current budgetary pressures?

Answer. Growth in our Special Operations Forces capability was necessary to meet the demands of the conflicts in which we have been engaged over the past decade. While some of the growth has supported countering terrorism, the principle share of increased capacity has been used to support counterinsurgency (COIN) campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan. We have planned to use the SOF capacity released by the reduction in COIN demand in Iraq and Afghanistan in two ways: (1) to rest and reset the force; and (2) to grow our building partner capacity efforts worldwide. However, given the financial downturn we face, we must balance the need for SOF capabilities with our need to address other capability demands in light of increased budgetary pressures. Accordingly, I support maintenance of only programmed SOF resourcing, shifting priorities inside the community in order to best establish the capabilities, capacities and readiness required to meet our most pressing needs—most notably continuing to counterterrorism—while doing the best we can to service other missions.

Question. In recent years, Special Operations Forces have taken on an expanded role in a number of areas important to countering violent extremist organizations, including those related to information and military intelligence operations. Some have advocated significant changes to U.S. Special Operations Command's (SOCOM) title 10 missions to make them better reflect the activities special operations forces are carrying out around the world.

What current missions, if any, do you believe can and should be divested by SOCOM, and why?

Answer. At this time, I do not recommend changes to SOCOM's title 10 missions. In coordination with DOD, the Joint Staff uses a range of processes—such as the Unified Command Plan, Guidance for the Employment of the Force, and Joint Strategic Capabilities Plan—to assess missions and responsibilities assigned to SOCOM on a continuing basis. SOF remain uniquely suited to conducting certain information and intelligence operations. The language in section 167 of title 10, U.S.C., provides the President and the Secretary of Defense flexibility to meet changing circumstances.

Question. Are there any additional missions that you believe SOCOM should assume, and, if so, what are they and why do you advocate adding them?

Answer. I do not recommend SOCOM gain any additional missions at this time, pending a review of strategic planning documents. SOF are well-positioned to provide an appropriate range of capability to Joint Force Commanders. We will continue to use lessons from our Decade of War studies to better integrate SOF and the general purpose force.

Question. What can be done to ensure that indirect special operations missions with medium- and long-term impact, such as unconventional warfare and foreign internal defense, receive as much emphasis as direct action, and that they receive appropriate funding?

Answer. The Chairman has placed emphasis on many aspects of foreign internal defense in his Capstone Concept for Joint Operations, and has developed specific Joint Doctrine on Unconventional Warfare. If I am confirmed, one area that I may examine for enhanced legislative authorities is greater opportunities for non-SOF units to undertake building partner capacity tasks, which will relieve some of this burden from SOF forces in a severely restricted budget climate.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS AUTHORITIES

Question. Reportedly, the Commander of SOCOM has sought more control over the deployment and utilization of Special Operations Forces. For example, the Secretary of Defense recently modified policy guidance for the combatant commands that gave SOCOM, for the first time, responsibility for resourcing, organizing, and providing guidance to the Theater Special Operations Commands of the geographic combatant commanders and Special Operations Forces assigned to them. It has been reported that the Commander of SOCOM is also seeking new authorities that would allow him to more rapidly move Special Operations Forces between geographic combatant commands.

Please provide your assessment of whether such changes are appropriate and can be made without conflicting with civilian control of the military, infringing upon authorities provided to the geographic combatant commanders, or raising concerns with the State Department.

Answer. Special Operations Forces undertake operations only with the approval of the requisite authorities, including the President, the Secretary of Defense, the geographic combatant commanders, and, where appropriate, the Chiefs of Mission. The SOCOM commander has made it clear that the changes he is recommending are not intended to infringe upon the authority of the Combatant Commanders—and as a former commander, I remain sensitive to this. Rather, he is trying to provide better capability to the combatant commanders such that they may use SOF forces more efficiently and effectively. I believe the proposed changes enhance the global force by networking with our U.S. interagency counterparts as well as our foreign allies and partners. If I am confirmed, I would support a more efficient and effective ability of our Special Operations Forces to respond to global demands in the future.

U.S. CYBER COMMAND MANNING AND TRAINING

Question. U.S. Cyber Command (CYBERCOM), as a combatant command, executes offensive and defensive military operations in cyberspace under title 10. CYBERCOM, in conjunction with the Military Services, is defining its personnel requirements, which will result in a requirement for the Services to provide thousands of personnel with high levels of training and skill in a technically demanding area. This force requirement could grow substantially in future years as DOD learns more about the cyber capabilities of potential adversaries and as more countries gain sophisticated cyber warfare expertise and capacity.

What are your views about programming the majority of these personnel under the Military Intelligence Program (MIP)?

Answer. U.S. Cyber Command is a subunified command. The significant amount of the work to provide planning and options in cyberspace is going to require intelligence personnel, not unlike the work conducted by our airborne Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance (ISR) platforms. We are taking a very close look at the mix of personnel, both military and intelligence, required to execute missions in cyberspace and intend to strike the right balance. The Services are in the process of building our initial target of 133 cyber teams from existing force structure. Based on how the Services are currently manned, trained, and equipped, MIP personnel in two Services, the Army and the Navy, will be in the majority, while in the Air Force and Marine Corps, MIP personnel will be in the minority. As we normalize cyber operations, we believe those differences between Services will decrease over time, and across the entire force we would expect MIP personnel to be in the minority overall, just like the other domains. However, we also expect MIP personnel to be a larger percentage of the cyber force due to the significant requirement for ISR support in the cyber domain.

Question. Are cyber offensive and defensive operations intelligence missions?

Answer. No, cyberspace operations are not inherently intelligence missions, though they can require intelligence if they are to succeed. DOD cyberspace operations are designed to operate and defend DOD information systems, support the defense of non-DOD systems, and to project power in and through cyberspace in order to satisfy national security objectives. Like all operational military missions, cyberspace operations, both offensive and defensive, are supported by mission-tailored-all source intelligence. As such, cyberspace operations include the conduct of intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance, and operational preparation of the environment in support of mission objectives. However, a substantial portion of the offensive and defensive work is not an intelligence mission.

Question. Will programming of CYBERCOM personnel under the MIP budget also lead to policy and resource oversight by the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence?

Answer. Like any domain, there are both military operations and intelligence aspects of cyber operations that demand policy and oversight from both the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy and the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence. Both are active in this area. I would defer to OSD for further guidance on oversight requirements.

Question. Do you have any concerns about the ability of the Services to generate and retain the required numbers of skilled and highly trained personnel to support CYBERCOM?

Answer. Because manning, training and equipping the force, and then retaining highly skilled personnel, is always a core concern, the Services are closely managing their provision of critical cyber personnel. The Services recognize this as a key priority and seem to be on track to provide the required personnel. As the Department gradually transitions to a Joint Information Environment, we should be able to transition more billets that are involved in simply managing networks into support more advanced CYBERCOM missions. We will continue to look to CYBERCOM to define a joint training standard. Cyberspace personnel managed by each Service to meet the Service's unique requirements must also meet DOD's established common standards and qualifications. It is imperative that these personnel exhibit exceptional knowledge of technical fundamentals and tactical tradecraft, and be able to employ that expertise as part of an integrated warfighting team. We have advanced our ability to generate skilled cyberspace professionals in a short amount of time, but must continue to provide the right incentives to retain these personnel in the current budget environment as we attempt to compete against industry for highly trained and skilled personnel.

Question. Should training for the CYBERCOM mission teams be conducted by the National Security Agency, by the Military Services, or in joint training facilities?

Answer. There is some training associated with specialized cyber operations tasks that is common to both an intelligence and an operational function, and that is best conducted in close coordination with the National Security Agency. There are also service training venues established that have the ability to produce some of the necessary skills required for CYBERCOM Mission Teams. Going forward, it will be important for the Joint Staff, the Services, and CYBERCOM to work together to build joint training standards and determine the best way to train to those standards.

Question. Have you considered whether the Commander of CYBERCOM should have authorities over Service personnel decisions affecting the cyber mission that are similar to those enjoyed by statute and by DOD regulation by the Commander of U.S. Special Operations Command?

Answer. The Department is examining this option as one of many possible ways to enhance the effectiveness of cyber forces. For now the current way in which personnel authorities are structured is working satisfactorily. However as CYBERCOM evolves there may be merit in mirroring some of the approaches we have taken with SOCOM, including personnel decisions.

Question. Are there adequate cyber test facilities to support CYBERCOM's offensive missions, taking into account that such missions may involve permanent damage to targets?

Answer. There are currently a number of test ranges and facilities available to conduct such testing. The quantity is currently adequate, but the need could grow—clearly, financial limitations and uncertainty could constrain additional of additional facilities should they be required. The real issue is the joint alignment and management of those resources to facilitate testing and training on an annual basis. The need for cyber facilities for testing and mission rehearsal of advanced offensive capabilities remains a critical enabler for CYBERCOM mission effectiveness. We continue to review the offensive testing and evaluation requirements, especially in light of the approved cyber mission force build out. These requirements are often blended with training, exercise, and certification requirements to drive cyber range solution sets across DOD.

DEFENSE SCIENCE BOARD REPORT

Question. The Defense Science Board (DSB) in January 2013 released a Task Force report on "Resilient Military Systems and the Advanced Cyber Threat." This report concluded that the effects of cyber warfare on civilian infrastructure could be as severe as some forms of nuclear attack, and suggested that nuclear forces should play a role in deterring devastating cyber attacks.

What are your views on whether nuclear weapons could and should be used as an element to deter severe attacks on critical infrastructure?

Answer. As stated in the NPR, the fundamental role of U.S. nuclear weapons is to deter nuclear attack on the United States, our allies, and partners. We have other means to credibly deter cyber attacks against the United States, to include both non-kinetic and kinetic means.

Question. The DSB report also recommended that DOD segregate a portion of its long-range advanced conventional strike capability and greatly enhance its resistance to cyber attack to ensure that the President retains options below the use of nuclear weapons in the event of a cyber attack that compromised our conventional forces or the means of controlling them.

What are your views on the reasoning of the DSB Task Force regarding the severity of the potential threat to our conventional forces and the means of controlling them, and whether prudence dictates extraordinary protections for portions of our military forces?

Answer. I do not believe we need to segregate any quantity of conventional forces strictly in anticipation of a cyber attack. Anticipated budget restrictions will stress our conventional operations capacity enough, and segregating more of these forces will hinder our ability to use them for other contingencies. Rather, we should ensure we continuously assess the security and robustness of the networks we use to exercise command and control over these strike capabilities. The networks supporting our long-range advanced conventional strike capability already employ robust protection measures, particularly those platforms that are nuclear-capable. Additionally, we maintain redundant forms of communication, to include analog systems, and routinely train and exercise to minimize the extent to which cyber or electronic warfare attacks degrade our capabilities. Again, however, we should not rest on our current capability, and improved security and survivability of our command and control systems is a matter I take very seriously.

Question. The DSB report also concluded that DOD has an inadequate understanding of how conflict in cyberspace would or could develop, what actions and reactions might ensue, and how conflict could escalate. To help address this deficiency, the Task Force urged the Department to develop the capability to conduct large-scale modeling and simulation of cyberwarfare.

What are your views on this issue?

Answer. Conflict in cyberspace will indeed be complex. As we have seen over history, it would be hubris for anyone to claim a complete understanding of how a new technology will perform in combat or will influence a conflict. We can only do the best we can to understand it in advance. As such, developing and conducting large-scale modeling and simulation exercises would expand our understanding of cyberspace conflict, decision thresholds, escalation concepts, and decision uncertainty. We are taking steps to improve our cyber test and training range capacity and capabilities to ensure we can train our cyber forces in exercises like Cyber Flag and Cyber Knight. The major cyber ranges are receiving an increase in funding in fiscal year 2014 to meet an expected demand in training and testing. The Services and combatant commands continue to aggressively incorporate cyber into exercises at the direction of the Secretary. We are also incorporating cyber into our large scale modeling and simulation capabilities to better understand the domain. The Joint Staff tested for the first time in a recent NORTHCOM exercise a simulation capability that presented to the training audience degraded network effects from cyber activity. The Department of Defense has also taken steps by issuing orders, policy, and doctrinal guidance to the Joint Force as seen in new joint doctrine, updates to the Standing and Supplemental Rules of Engagement, and guidance about exercising cyberspace operations with the other operating domains. These actions, combined with the lessons garnered through future large-scale modeling and simulation, should improve our understanding of the dynamics of conflict in cyberspace.

INTELLIGENCE COLLECTION AND ANALYSIS

Question. After September 11, intelligence collection and analysis focused on discovering, identifying, locating, and defeating terrorists and insurgents. These missions involve "finding needles in haystacks," and were addressed in part by human intelligence operations and by applying advanced information technology to collect and combine and sift through vast amounts of information from many unconventional sources. These intelligence capabilities are applicable to a range of transnational security challenges, but are less useful for supporting more traditional forms of military operations against nation-states.

Do you think it is necessary to evaluate the current posture and plans of DOD's intelligence components to ensure that capabilities and capacities for supporting military operations against elusive, networked adversaries and against conventional military establishments are appropriately balanced?

Answer. Balancing intelligence collection between threat networks and nation-states is continually evaluated at the theater level by combatant commanders and reflected in both their collection management process and their inputs into SecDef's management of the force guided by the Force Allocation Decision Model.

This balance is also scrutinized at the national level by the intelligence community as guided by the President's National Intelligence Priorities Framework in concert with experts in Congress and the NSS.

Since 2001, we have presided over a growing enterprise of ISR systems and operations. Some of these systems, while extremely effective in relatively permissive environments, will likely be unsuitable for operations against a modern military force. Therefore, as we build ISR in Joint Force 2020, sensor and platform diversity will be critical to successfully operate against a wide variety of target sets and in a variety of threat environments—permissive, contested, and denied.

That said, there are a few key similarities between countering elusive, networked adversaries and conventional military establishments, particularly when trying to find, fix, and finish critical elements of that conventional force, such as asymmetric capabilities (including weapons of mass destruction) and command and control nodes. In such cases, we will benefit from the advances we have made over the past decade.

INFORMATION OPERATIONS

Question. The Government Accountability Office reports that DOD has "spent hundreds of millions of dollars each year" to support its information operations outreach activities. Many of these programs are in support of operations in Afghanistan, but Military Information Support Teams from U.S. Special Operations Command also deploy to U.S. embassies in countries of particular interest around the globe to bolster the efforts of the Department of State and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). Further, the geographic combatant commands are increasingly moving into this operational space.

What are your views on DOD's military information support operations and influence programs and their integration into overall U.S. foreign policy objectives?

Answer. We continue to assess and improve our information operations activities because winning the narrative remains a critical element of advancing our national security. I view Military Information Support Operations as traditional military activities that a global combatant commander uses to support theater security cooperation and underpin theater campaign plan objectives. Influence programs and activities are also a means to support broader U.S. foreign policy objectives.

DOD's military information support operations and influence programs are integrated into geographic combatant command (GCC) and country team objectives and programs. Synchronization across government is critical, and GCCs continue to improve coordination with the State Department, USAID and Country Teams by conducting monthly and quarterly working groups/VTCs and reports to share information.

Question. What is the role of DOD versus the Intelligence Community and the State Department?

Answer. DOD continues to work alongside the Department of State and USAID in support of foreign policy objectives. DOD information operations can complement and reinforce the Department of State and other government agency efforts by focusing on military audiences and ensuring information operations themes and messages are derived from and synchronized with the State Department public diplomacy.

DOD conducts periodic working groups with the Intelligence Community and the State Department to deconflict and synchronize information operations and military information support operations (MISO) activities at the GCC, Joint Staff and OSD levels.

Question. How do you believe the success of these programs should be measured, especially in light of the constrained budget environment?

Answer. Measuring success of these programs remains a challenge. The information space is inherently complex, but should not be yielded to an adversary. It is not always easy to discern whether a change is due to an information program or some other activity more closely associated with actions on the ground. However, DOD continues to develop and monitor measures of performance and measures of effectiveness for these programs. We are incorporating these lessons in our doctrine, training, planning, and reporting.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE COUNTERNARCOTICS ACTIVITIES

Question. On an annual basis, DOD's counternarcotics (CN) program expends approximately $1.5 billion to support the Department's CN operations, building the capacity of certain foreign governments around the globe, and analyzing intelligence on CN-related matters. In a recent Government Accountability Office (GAO) report, GAO found that DOD "does not have an effective performance measurement system to track the progress of its counternarcotics activities." This is the second such finding relating by GAO to DOD CN in the last decade.

What is your assessment of the DOD CN program?

Answer. DOD's counternarcotics activities operate in an inherently complex environment in which it can be difficult to determine with precision whether generated effects are due to DOD efforts, other U.S. interagency efforts, host nation efforts, or factors beyond the control of these entities. I believe it would be hubris for anyone to claim the ability to create a system that would accurately track the progress of any effort in the complex arena. We do believe that DOD's CN program is critically important to enabling the broader U.S. interagency and foreign partner counternarcotics efforts. Our foreign and interagency partners with counterdrug responsibilities continually ask for DOD training, equipment, exchanges of information, planning, infrastructure, transportation, analytical, aerial reconnaissance, communications, and related support to build the capacity of foreign security services with counterdrug responsibilities. These roles and activities are appropriate and effective in strengthening law enforcement, governance, and rule of law institutions.

Question. In your personal view, should DOD continue to play a role in stemming the flow of illegal narcotics?

Answer. Yes. though current budget limitations will present an enormous challenge to our ability to do this while addressing our many other security responsibilities. With the potential for the convergence of violent extremist organizations with drug trafficking organizations, I see DOD's continued support to law enforcement as a necessary component of our national security.

Question. In your position as the Commander of U.S. Northern Command, what was your assessment of the DOD CN program as it related to Mexico and the Caribbean?

Answer. The CN efforts of the United States, Mexico, and Caribbean nations have achieved major and sustained progress against cocaine use and distribution throughout the Western Hemisphere. U.S. Northern Command furthers this effort by achieving unprecedented cooperation with the Governments of Mexico and Caribbean nations in our efforts against the threat, and I expect continued cooperation in future years. I believe these roles/relationships are essential to our policies and strategies in the region. However, this progress is deeply threatened by current budget decreases and uncertainties, as resources will likely be diverted from this area to address our many other security needs.

Question. In your position as the Commander of U.S. Northern Command, were there any activities that you had hoped to be able to conduct using DOD CN funding, but were not able to do and that you, if confirmed, would recommend DOD seek the authority to conduct?

Answer. I found that I had sufficient authorities to serve an effective supporting role to other U.S. Government agencies and foreign partners with counternarcotics responsibilities. Should I be confirmed, I will remain supportive of leveraging our current authorities and longstanding relationships within the region to support our partner nations and defend the Nation from transnational criminal organizations.

RESPONSIBILITY TO PROTECT

Question. The U.S. Government has recognized the "responsibility to protect" (R2P)—that is, the responsibility of the international community to use appropriate means to help protect populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity, by encouraging states to protect their own populations, by helping states build the capacity to do so, and by acting directly should national authorities fail to provide such protection. In its 2010 Quadrennial Defense Review, DOD names "preventing human suffering due to mass atrocities" as one of a long list of potential contingencies that DOD might be called on to address. DOD has begun to explore some of the implications of R2P, by considering "mass atrocity prevention and response operations".

In your view, how high a priority should the "responsibility to protect" be for the U.S. Government as a whole?

Answer. The "responsibility to protect" is not currently viewed by the United States as a legal basis for the use of military force. Our nation may call on us to prevent human suffering, initially using means other than force, and could use military force as a last resort if other instruments of national power fail. We work closely with our international military partners, where needed, to emphasize professionalism, commitment to the rule of law, and strengthen their capacity to protect their citizens. Without legal standing, it is not a practice we would rank order by priority, though we would be prepared to act if called upon by the President to do so.

Question. In your view, what should be the role of DOD, if any, in fulfilling the responsibility to protect?

Answer. The use of military force is only one of many instruments of national power. We should always view use of force as a last resort, to be considered only when all other instruments of national power have failed and used under appropriate legal authority. We should ensure we are doctrinally prepared to execute a mission if called upon to do so. The role of DOD in fulfilling the responsibility to protect, should it be cited as a casus belli, would be to provide the President with a full range of options and be prepared to act if called upon to do so.

Question. In your view, what is the proper application of R2P doctrine with respect to the situation in Syria?

Answer. R2P has been mentioned as a potential legal basis for the use of force in Syria, but to my knowledge a decision has not been taken to activate this basis. Using R2P as a basis would be a political vice military decision. Meanwhile, the U.S. Government is working with allies and partners and with the Syrian opposition to provide humanitarian assistance within Syria and across the region. The United States is providing nearly $815 million in aid to help the victims of this conflict, including emergency medical care and supplies, food, and shelter. The recent addition of more than $300 million in humanitarian aid will increase food aid, medical care, clean water, and provide shelter and other relief supplies for families suffering in Syria and neighboring countries.

OPERATION OBSERVANT COMPASS & THE LORD'S RESISTANCE ARMY

Question. Despite pressure by the Ugandan People's Defense Forces (UPDF) and efforts by U.S. Special Operations personnel to support them, elements of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA)—including Joseph Kony—continue to operate and commit atrocities against civilian populations in the Central African Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and South Sudan. Some observers have identified operational concerns with this mission, including that: (1) supported forces are trying to find an elusive foe in an area roughly the size of California, much of which is covered in thick jungle; (2) technical support to U.S. forces and their UPDF partners from the defense and intelligence community continues to be inadequate; and (3) limitations continue to be placed on the ability of U.S. Special Operations personnel to accompany UPDF partners outside of main basing locations, thereby limiting the level of direct support they can provide.

In your view, what is the objective of Operation Observant Compass?

Answer. Operation Observant Compass aims to: (1) protect civilians, (2) promote DD/RRR (disarmament, demobilization, reintegration, repatriation, and resettlement), (3) increase humanitarian access/support, and (4). This is a whole-of-government effort across a range of U.S. Government agencies and partners. DOD is the primary agent for assisting the UPDF in removing Kony and other senior LRA leaders from the region.

I acknowledge the operational challenges of this mission in the context of competing demands and higher priorities. U.S. Special Operations forces do accompany UPDF partners on missions in the Central African Republic, remaining clear of combat action with LRA elements, but they are not doing so in Sudan or the disputed region due to diplomatic concerns.

Question. Do you support the continuation of DOD's current level of support to this mission?

Answer. The current level of support is appropriate. DOD is currently weighing future options, as we prioritize limited resources among numerous competing priorities.

INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING CONTRIBUTIONS

Question. In testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on July 29, 2009, Ambassador Susan Rice, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, stated that the United States "is willing to consider directly contributing more military observers, military staff officers, civilian police, and other civilian personnel—including more women I should note—to U.N. peacekeeping operations."

What is your view on whether the United States should contribute more military personnel to both staff positions and military observers in support of U.N. peacekeeping operations?

Answer. If confirmed, I would be willing to consider opportunities to support peacekeeping missions, including key staff officers and military observers, if such a course of action aligned with our national security interests. However, this mission must of necessity compete within the spectrum of other national security interests, including counterterrorism, that are often a higher priority.

Question. If confirmed, would you support identifying methods through which the DOD personnel system could be more responsive to requests for personnel support from multilateral institutions like the United Nations?

Answer. We have made additional contributions in this area over the past 2 years, as the appointment of Army Brigadier General Hugh Van Roosen to force chief of staff for the United Nations Mission in Liberia has demonstrated. We have also worked closely with the U.S. Mission to the United Nations to overcome administrative obstacles to the assignment of U.S. servicemembers within the U.N. Secretariat. I am confident we will continue to improve upon our processes and support of multilateral institutions. We may be able to bring more capacity to bear as we draw down from Afghanistan, keeping in mind that the force will be shrinking with budget cuts and we need to allow the force to rest. Our U.S. servicemembers bring battle-tested experience and expertise that enhance these types of organizations in the execution of their vital global missions.

GLOBAL PEACE OPERATIONS INITIATIVE

Question. The Global Peace Operations Initiative was established after the 2004 G8 Sea Island Summit to address growing gaps in international peace operations. In most cases, DOD plays a supporting role in the implementation of this train and equip program.

What is your understanding and assessment of this program?

Answer. The Global Peace Operations Initiative (GPOI) is a key component of our Government's strategy to build the capacity of U.S. partners to carry out peacekeeping operations. Through small investments in training and equipment, we can prepare motivated partners for successful participation in peacekeeping. GPOI has directly trained over 175,000 peacekeepers from 38 countries and enabled the training of another 52,000 instructors since 2005. Over two dozen peace operations have benefited from the program. GPOI is a strong example of the results we obtain when the Departments of State and Defense work together to promote our Nation's security.

Question. Would you support additional DOD contributions—in the form of U.S. military trainers—to support this program?

Answer. The GPOI has been successful in building partnership capacity in large part because of its flexibility. Our combatant commanders have made excellent use of this program to tailor assistance to the specific needs of individual partners. While GPOI underwrites training delivered by both contractors and military personnel, our experience has shown that servicemembers produce more effective and longer-lasting results than contract instructors. If confirmed, I would consider this factor, subject to the demands of our other operations overseas and against the backdrop of the severe budget restrictions we face under the Budget Control Act.

NATIONAL STRATEGY TO COMBAT TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME

Question. Criminal networks are not only expanding their operations, but they are also diversifying their activities, resulting in a convergence of transnational threats that has evolved to become more complex, volatile, and destabilizing. The Director of National Intelligence recently described transnational organized crime as "an abiding threat to U.S. economic and national security interests," and stated that "rising drug violence and corruption are undermining stability and the rule of law in some countries" in the Western Hemisphere. In July 2011, the President released his Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime: Addressing Converging Threats to National Security. One of the priority action areas designated in the strategy is "enhancing DOD support to U.S. law enforcement."

What is your understanding of the President's strategy to combat transnational criminal organizations?

Answer. The President's Strategy to Combat Transnational Organized Crime integrates all elements of national power, including the military, to combat transnational organized crime and related threats to national security. Ultimately, within our capacity to do so, the strategy seeks to reduce transnational organized crime to a manageable public safety concern.

Question. What is your understanding of the Department's role within the President's strategy?

Answer. DOD is not the lead agency responsible for combatting transnational organized crime. DOD instead plays an appropriate and important role in supporting law enforcement to counter threats to national security.

Question. In your view, should DOD play a role in providing support to the U.S. law enforcement and the Intelligence Community on matters related to transnational organized crime?

Answer. DOD is often able to provide unique supporting capabilities to address the full range of transnational criminal threats, including: military intelligence support to law enforcement, counter-threat finance, military-to-military capability development, and military operational activities against threats to the United States. Some of the capabilities DOD has developed over the last decade of war are applicable to countering transnational organized crime. DOD should provide support to U.S. law enforcement and the Intelligence Community as part of a whole-of-government approach, consistent with current authorities.

MASS ATROCITIES PREVENTION

Question. President Obama identified the prevention of mass atrocities and genocide as a core U.S. national security interest, as well as a core moral interest, in August 2011 under Presidential Study Directive 10.

Among interagency partners, what is DOD's role in addressing atrocity threats, and what tools does DOD have for preventing or responding to atrocities?

Answer. DOD has developed Joint Doctrine for conducting Mass Atrocity Response Operations and conducted a comprehensive review of DOD training. Atrocity prevention and response is now part of DOD plans and planning guidance. In addition, DOD is working with the U.N. to strengthen that organization's ability to respond to atrocity events.

Question. Has DOD developed planning processes toward this effort so that it will be able to respond quickly in emergency situations?

Answer. Yes. DOD has developed planning processes toward this effort.

Question. In your view, is the situation in Syria a mass atrocity?

Answer. My view is consistent with the White House Fact Sheet of May 1, 2013.

FUTURE OF NATO

Question. As a result of coalition operations in Afghanistan, Libya, and elsewhere the NATO alliance has achieved unprecedented levels of integration and interoperability.

If confirmed, what recommendations, if any, would you have for capturing the lessons learned from recent coalition operations and maintaining the capabilities developed as a result of those operations?

Answer. Both the United States and NATO have been capturing incorporating lessons learned into education, training and preparations for future operations and missions. Within the Joint Staff, our J–7 Directorate for Joint Development has the DOD lead on lessons learned. Our J–7 works with NATO, Allied Command Transformation, headquartered in Norfolk, VA, which has the lead on lessons learned from Alliance operations (with most of NATO's work performed by the Joint Analysis and Lessons Learned Center located in Monsanto, Portugal).

I am keenly aware of the potential for diminishing interoperability and readiness as operations in Afghanistan draw down. If confirmed, I intend to continue our efforts through the Connected Forces Initiative to ensure all NATO forces and those of capable partners remain ready and interoperable. Subject to funding, this will include expanded education; increased training and exercises; and better use of technology. Additionally, the increased support for the NATO Response Force to which we have committed in the wake of our drawdown in Europe will provide excellent opportunities for maintaining our coalition warfighting capability. Finally, a broad array of exercises will help inhibit the atrophy of this important capability.

Question. In your view, what existing or new missions should be the focus of NATO's strategic efforts over the next 5 years?

Answer. In my view, NATO operations in Afghanistan will remain a key focus of NATO's strategic effort over the next 5 years. This includes successfully concluding the ISAF combat operation by the end of 2014 and ensuring that NATO is ready to commence its new train, advise, and assist mission, known as Resolute Support, on 1 January 2015. The task of that mission will be to ensure that Afghan National Security Forces are sustainable, credible, and capable of maintaining security in Afghanistan under responsible and efficient Afghan Security Institutions, operating within appropriate civilian and political controls.

That said, NATO must also anticipate future threats or enhance its preparedness for threats we already understand. These include continued emphasis on ballistic missile defense, an understanding of the transformation of terrorist groups, and cyber defense to the extent it is collectively feasible. Given the evolution of terrorist threats, it may be wise to consider an alliance capability to respond quickly to terrorist events that threaten member citizens overseas.

Question. What steps, if any, could or should NATO take, in your view, to reduce tensions with Russia?

Answer. NATO has made significant progress in reducing historical Cold War animosities and suspicions by focusing on cooperation in addressing common security threats in the areas such as Afghanistan stabilization, counter-piracy, counterterrorism, and counterproliferation. Such cooperative efforts are spearheaded through the NATO-Russia Council (NRC). The NRC should continue to explore new forms of transparency and confidence building to augment the level of trust and goodwill between NATO and Russia. Enhancing military-to-military contacts at all levels is always beneficial, as we discovered during the conflict in Georgia; while Russia can be grudging in developing these contacts, NATO should play a role in fostering this aspect of the relationship.

But long-term improvement in relations has as much to do with changed perceptions within Russia as with any NRC project or initiative that can be accomplished. A shift in Russia's own strategic calculus will take time and firm, consistent NATO engagement.

Question. In your view, how should NATO proceed on the issue of further enlargement of the alliance over the next 5 years?

Answer. The further enlargement of the alliance is a political decision that can be made only by the NATO Heads of State and Government. I continue to believe, however, that nations able to meaningfully contribute to the security of the alliance should be given favorable consideration, consistent with Article 10 of the North Atlantic Treaty.

PREVENTION OF AND RESPONSE TO SEXUAL ASSAULTS

Question. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3,000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2,558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports (restricted, meaning that, in accordance with the victim's request, they were handled in a confidential manner and not investigated). Moreover, a recent survey conducted by the DOD indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of active duty women and 1.2 percent of Active Duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months.

What is your assessment of the current DOD sexual assault prevention and response program?

Answer. In short, while we have established a strong sense of urgency and put a host of important initiatives in place, I would be the first to acknowledge that we have a long way to go to achieve our goal of a culture in which such assaults simply cannot occur. We are aggressively pushing forward under the five pillars of Prevention, Advocacy, Investigation, Accountability, and Assessment, and we will not rest until we have solved this problem.

We have taken strong action to bring perpetrators to justice, address a military culture that became too complacent of corrosive climate, and hold commanders accountable for both. The Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs are personally committed to eradicating sexual assault within our ranks. We will continue to improve processes and programs as part of our comprehensive approach.

The Services have achieved progress, to include specialized training for investigation and litigation, access to victim's advocates and counsel through special victim's programs, and highly qualified experts to advise on program progress.

Question. What is your view of the provision for restricted and unrestricted reporting of sexual assaults?

Answer. Our foremost concern remains the safety and well-being of the victim. If a sexual assault occurs, we would rather the victim provide an unrestricted report, which allows for thorough investigation and delivery of justice as appropriate.

However restricted reporting must remain an option for victims, permitting access to services to meet their personal needs without the additional stress of a criminal investigation. I am personally committed to developing a climate across our Joint Force that makes victims comfortable and confident in unrestricted reporting.

We are starting to see what we believe are higher rates of unrestricted reporting. Our initiative to move initial disposition authority to O–6 commanders or higher has increased unrestricted reporting. Access to Special Victim's Counsel and advocates has increased those victims willing to change a restricted report to an unrestricted report. We will continue to pursue these and other measures with the victim's interest always in mind.

Question. What is your understanding of the adequacy of DOD oversight of military service implementation of the DOD and Service policies for the prevention of and response to sexual assaults?

Answer. I believe DOD oversight of policy implementation is adequate and improving, but I recognize we still have gaps to close in collecting timely data and changing behavior in the force from top to bottom.

The Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO) oversees the Department's sexual assault policy. I have developed significant confidence in this office and its leadership, and I personally rely on them for advice and information. SAPRO works with the Services' offices to execute the Services' sexual assault prevention and response plans. SAPRO also works with the civilian community to develop and implement aggressive prevention and response approaches to the programs. They continue to lead on this issue by informing and advising commanders at all levels and closing the gaps as we detect them.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. My experience has always been that commander accountability is the cornerstone of unit mission success and discipline, with commanders at every level upholding the standards of trust and respect that all of our men and women in uniform deserve. This is a consistent and important element of our military culture: the commander is held responsible for the climate in his or her unit. Sexual assault in the military found root in a climate that had become complacent. We are changing that, swiftly. We have already amended our command climate assessments by updating the surveys to include servicemembers' evaluation of their commanders on climate and sexual assault response. We will ensure that senior leadership has access to the results of those surveys. We have moved initial disposition authority for incidents of sexual assault to O–6 commanders or higher. But to make all of these efforts take hold and change the unit culture, the role—and accountability—of the commander remains essential.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring a judge advocate outside the chain of command to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted?

Answer. We hold a unit commander responsible for everything the unit does or fails to do, on or off duty, whether CONUS or deployed in remote expeditionary circumstances. That kind of responsibility is best served by authority that aligns with it. Commanders receive extensive training in their unique legal responsibilities and continue to regularly consult with their judge advocates on all issues, including whether (or not) to prosecute alleged sexual assault offenses. If a commander and his or her judge advocate disagree, the decision will be reviewed at the next higher level. Removing commanders from the military justice process would send a harmful message that commanders cannot hold their people accountable and are not themselves accountable for everything in their unit. We could have removed this authority from commanders when we were struggling with equal opportunity and drug issues, but we didn't—and we got it right because commanders are the ones who fix problems in their units. I've had women commanders come up to me and insist we not take this out of the chain because they don't believe they can demand higher standards if they cannot enforce them.

Question. Article 60 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice requires the convening authority to take action on the sentence issued by a court-martial and authorizes a convening authority, in his sole discretion, to take action of the findings of a court-martial, including setting aside a finding of guilty or changing a finding of guilty to a finding of guilty of a lessor included offense.

What is your view about the authority of a convening authority to set aside or modify findings of guilt and authority to reduce a sentence imposed by court-martial?

Answer. Article 60 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice currently grants broad authority and discretion to convening authorities to dismiss findings of guilt after trial. I have already endorsed Secretary Hagel's proposed amendments to Article 60 that remove a convening authority's ability to modify Court Martial findings or sentences for qualified offenses. A convening authority should continue to have the discretion to dismiss minor offenses under appropriate circumstances, such as to prevent an accused from the burden of a felony conviction when found guilty of minor misconduct but acquitted of major offenses. A convening authority should have the flexibility to adjudicate such offenses in an alternate fashion, and should retain the ability to modify sentences, which is an essential component of our plea bargain process.

Question. During the recent full committee hearing on sexual assault, it was suggested that the terminology used in the Workplace and Gender Relations Surveys have resulted in difficulty in providing an accurate picture of the prevalence of sexual assault within the military. Specifically, use of the term "unwanted sexual contact" comprises such a broad spectrum of behavior that some have questioned the value of the survey.

What is your view concerning the methodology and terminology used in the Workplace and Gender Relations Surveys and what changes would you recommend to improve the survey as a basis for better understanding the prevalence of sexual assault in the military?

Answer. I feel we need to improve our methodology to provide more detailed—and more frequent—information about the prevalence of sexual assault and the conditions under which it occurs. Many of the survey terms we have used for years are too broad in scope and cover a broad spectrum of behavior—a choice that was made for understandable reasons at the time. However, we have learned from our efforts over the past decade and see the need for both aggregate and discrete data to inform our programs. Common terminology throughout the government and private sector will also help both communities talk about the same thing and better share effective practices.

RELIGIOUS GUIDELINES

Question. In your view, do policies concerning religious accommodation in the military appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs, including individual expressions of belief, without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. Yes. We value the service and sacrifices of those members of the Joint Force who hold deep religious faith, and those of no religious faith, equally—and commit to provide each with a climate that promotes mutual respect and trust. DODI 1300.17, "Accommodation of Religious Practices Within the Military Services" states that "The Department of Defense places a high value on the rights of members of the Military Services to observe the tenets of their respective religions or to observe no religion at all." We take the words "high value" seriously. As a result, policies ensure that each of the Services allows individuals to request accommodation of religious practices. Each request is considered on a case-by-case basis. The commander values the servicemember's free exercise of religion, while ensuring that approval of requests does not adversely affect mission accomplishment, military readiness, unit cohesion, good order, discipline or any other military requirement.

Question. Under current law and policy, are individual expressions of belief accommodated so long as they do not impact unit cohesion and good order and discipline?

Answer. Yes. Standing policies ensure commanders consider requests for accommodation of individual expressions of belief, to include apparel, grooming and worship practices. Requests are given equal consideration as long as they do not negatively impact mission accomplishment, military readiness, unit cohesion, good order, discipline or any other military requirement.

Question. There have been reports of incidents in which individuals in the armed services have not been accommodated in the free exercise of religion.

What actions, if any, have you directed to address these reports?

Answer. While I'm not personally aware of any servicemember who has been denied accommodation of his or her free exercise of religion, I do know that in each of the Services, commanders carefully consider each individual request for accommodation and take these matters seriously. If an individual's request for accommodation is denied, then policies are in place that allow the member to appeal that denial all the way up to Service Headquarters level. Our policy is actually to approve these requests whenever possible. The bottom line is that military leaders place a high value on each servicemember's individual religious freedoms and we do our best to accommodate those freedoms.

RESERVE COMPONENTS AS AN OPERATIONAL RESERVE

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of the Reserve components as an operational Reserve, as opposed to its longstanding traditional role as a strategic reserve?

Answer. As budget pressures tighten, the Reserve component role will evolve along with that of the Active component, which could alter the current shape of both components in ways yet to be determined. However, we know that sustained engagement in combat operations has transformed the Reserve components of our Armed Forces. Repeated combat deployments, as well as peacekeeping, humanitarian relief and homeland defense missions, have produced a force more operationally capable and experienced than any time in our Nation's history.

I remain confident that given sufficient predictability of the next deployment, the vast majority of Reserve component forces and capabilities can be accessed systematically long into the future. National Guard and Reserve members expect to deploy periodically to meet the Nation's security needs, and many have volunteered with this understanding. This operational force is a direct result of the substantial investment in resourcing commitments and the personal sacrifice of members, their families, and their civilian employers.

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges to maintaining and enhancing the National Guard and Reserves as a relevant and capable operational reserve?

Answer. Our current budgetary challenges and the steady decline of Overseas Contingency Operations (OCO) funding will challenge our ability to maintain current levels of readiness in the National Guard and Reserves. With respect to the National Guard, we must be sensitive to responsibilities for State missions when considering the use of these units for operational employment overseas. While remaining a strong supporter of our Nation's Reserve component, I am concerned that a singular focus on maintaining the Reserve component at high readiness will degrade Active Duty readiness—our most responsive force. We are already seeing this with the requirement now in law for Air Guard units to be maintained at full combat readiness, which in a difficult budget environment has accelerated a decline in Active component squadron readiness.

Question. What are your views about the optimal employment in generating forces for combat missions of the National Guard and Reserve?

Answer. We have seen a significant change in Reserve component use over the past 20 years and have developed a Total Force—Active, National Guard, and Reserve—to meet sustained combatant commander requirements around the globe. This evolution and the broad range of security and financial challenges on the horizon require us to make smart decisions about Total Force roles and missions to ensure we have the forces needed to defend and advance our national interests.

The recently published report to Congress on Unit Cost and Readiness for Active and Reserve components of the Armed Forces examined this issue in depth. The report concluded that the factors used to determine the proper mix and employment of Active and Reserve component units differ greatly not only among the Services but also for individual missions and unit types. These findings will inform the next Quadrennial Defense Review which will ultimately determine the optimum mix and employment models for our Total Force.

Question. In your view, should homeland defense or other global or domestic civil support missions be assigned exclusively to the National Guard?

Answer. No, this should be a full-spectrum effort, and it would be a disservice to our citizens if any one element capable of providing a response were to be excluded for political or other reasons. I believe each component of the Total Force—Active, Guard, and Reserve—has an important, layered, and interdependent role in the successful execution of homeland defense and civil support missions. We have taken steps to enhance this system through, for example, the Dual Status Commander concept. The Council of Governors has been most helpful in bringing perspective to and gaining understanding of the complexities of this process. I believe we should bring the most appropriate force to respond to any challenge the Nation faces, whether the issue is foreign or domestic.

For domestic response, the National Guard is deeply embedded in our communities. In many cases, these soldiers and airmen possess unique skills, qualifications and experiences that enable rapid responses to natural and manmade disasters and provide invaluable contributions to homeland defense missions. In other cases, an Active component or Federal Reserve unit may be able to provide the right response more quickly due to their unique capabilities and/or proximity to an incident area.

NATIONAL GUARD

Question. What is your understanding and assessment of changes in the global and domestic roles and mission of the Army National Guard, the Air National Guard, and the National Guard Bureau?

Answer. In military operations since September 11, the Nation drew extensively upon the Reserve components to meet operational requirements, and they have integrated seamlessly with the Active component on the battlefield for over a decade. The placement of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau on the Joint Chiefs of Staff formalized this operational relationship. Though the tempo of operations for the Reserve component will reduce as operations in Afghanistan draw to a close, some operational use of the Reserve component will persist. The National Guard Bureau has tremendous experience in domestic operations, so it will be an important voice for ensuring a seamless response across military components and interagency partners.

Question. In your view, should there be a requirement that the position of Commander, U.S. Northern Command or Commander, U.S. Army North, the Army component commander, be filled only by a National Guard officer? Please explain.

Answer. While I would welcome assignment of a National Guard officer to one of these commands, I believe senior leadership positions should be filled with the best, most fully qualified officer available at the time for that position. National Guard officers who possess the required qualifications for these positions should be considered equally with their Active component and Federal Reserve counterparts. I believe that restricting the selection pool to only National Guard officers could arbitrarily eliminate a more qualified officer for the position, which is contrary to our goal of finding the absolute best candidate for the job.

Question. What steps need to be taken, in your view, to ensure that a "deep bench" of National Guard general officers is continually being developed?

Answer. Building a deep and capable bench of general officers is extremely important for all components of the Total Joint Force, including the National Guard and Reserves. Key factors in developing a deep bench of general officers include education, deliberate officer development, and experience. We currently make education opportunities available to all our Reserve component officers, allowing them to attain the same qualifications as their active counterparts. The Services, National Guard Bureau, and the Federal Reserves maintain effective officer development and management programs to ensure the right people are receiving the right education and experience at the right time. The "Chairman's 18 Reserve Positions"—18 general and flag officer billets throughout the Joint Force designated for Reserve component officers—is having a powerful and positive impact providing Reserve component officers the requisite experience required to be effective leaders at senior levels in the Total Joint Force. Inclusion of a three-star National Guard officer as the Deputy Commander at NORTHCOM and as the Deputy Director of the National Guard Bureau have enhanced our ability to provide senior positions for Guard officers.

RISING COSTS OF MEDICAL CARE

Question. In testimony presented to Congress in February 2009, the Assistant Director of the Congressional Budget Office asserted that "medical funding accounts for more than one-third of the growth projected for operations and support funding between 2009 and 2026." In April 2009, then Secretary of Defense Gates told an audience at Maxwell Air Force Base that "health care is eating the Department alive". In recent years, the Department has attempted to address the growth in overall health care costs by identifying efficiencies as well as by proposing increased cost shares for military retirees.

What is your assessment of the long-term impact of rising medical costs on future DOD plans?

Answer. Health care consumes nearly 10 percent of the department's budget and could grow considerably over the next decade, taking an ever larger bite of our ability to invest in enhanced warfighting capability. The healthcare benefit is an important component of retention for our men and women. If confirmed, I will continue to work closely with Service and Department leaders and with this Congress to find reasonable and responsible ways to stem this growth while still fairly providing for the needs of our men and women. This will require finding efficiencies and encouraging healthier lifestyles, and may require increased cost shares from the constituents of the system.

Question. If confirmed, what actions would you initiate or recommend to mitigate the effect of such costs on the DOD top-line?

Answer. Through the last two budget cycles, Congress has permitted small increases in the TRICARE Prime enrollment fees. These adjustments were an important step to managing costs, but they are not enough to sustain the benefit in the long term. If confirmed, I will continue to seek to better manage costs by building a shared Joint Force commitment to behaviors that promote health and continuing to look for savings where practical. We may also need to increase constituent participation in paying for this system. Given today's budget environment, it is critical that we find an acceptable compromise to reduce costs while maintaining the quality of care our personnel and veterans expect.

Question. What reforms in infrastructure, benefits, or benefit management, if any, do you think should be examined in order to control the costs of military health care?

Answer. We are continuing to look at fiscal year 2014 options that would slow the growth of health care costs while preserving its quality and range. We're looking at options such as facility consolidations and civilian-military personnel mix changes, as well as initiatives that increase cost-sharing with beneficiaries, such as increased co-pays and other fee adjustments. If confirmed, I will continue to review initiatives for controlling the costs of military health care while always keeping in mind the importance of providing quality service to our people.

SYSTEMS AND SUPPORT FOR WOUNDED WARRIORS

Question. Servicemembers who are or have been wounded and injured in combat operations deserve the highest priority from their Service for support services, healing and recuperation, rehabilitation, evaluation for return to duty, successful transition from active duty when appropriate, and continuing support beyond retirement or discharge. Yet, as the revelations at Walter Reed Army Medical Center (WRAMC) in 2007 illustrated, the Services were not prepared to meet the needs of significant numbers of returning wounded servicemembers. Despite the enactment of legislation and continuing emphasis, many challenges remain, including a growing population of servicemembers awaiting disability evaluation.

What is your assessment of the progress made to date by DOD, the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the Services to improve the care, management, and transition of seriously ill and injured servicemembers and their families?

Answer. I feel we've made amazing progress in medical care over the last 12 years of war. We've achieved revolutionary medical advances, including joint battlefield surgical care, and advanced rehabilitation provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. But we've been advancing more slowly in other areas, particularly those surrounding family and transition. We're making progress, but I recognize we have work to do. If I am confirmed, I will keep my focus on this critical area. My wife Mary has played a key role both by being active in finding ways to enhance care for our wounded warriors and their caregivers and in enhancing my own understanding of the problems we face.

Question. What are the strengths upon which continued progress should be based?

Answer. We will look to expand research and treatment through collaboration between the private medical research and healthcare sectors and our Centers of Excellence. Many of our Wounded Warriors have successfully returned to service through such programs. We must also continue to grow our day-to-day collaboration with the Department of Veterans Affairs. We are close to achieving our goal of 100 percent certified medical records accompanying a servicemember transitioning to the VA.

Question. What are the weaknesses that need to be corrected?

Answer. One key area for improvement is individual case management when a servicemember transitions from the Active Force to DOD retiree or eligible veteran status. Streamlining this process relies on a single electronic health record, to follow the servicemember through transition, and a single tracking tool for case management. Our communication across our bureaucracies continues to be an area of frustration. We also have more work to do in ensuring the best possible opportunities exist for our wounded warriors, to include jobs and continued care for their mental and physical disabilities.

Question. If confirmed, are there additional strategies and resources that you would pursue to increase support for wounded servicemembers and their families, and to monitor their progress in returning to duty or to civilian life?

Answer. We need to continue our progress in tracking and assisting our wounded warriors and their caregivers, and in finding opportunities for meaningful employment, physical rehabilitation, and mental health. If confirmed, I will remain vigilant for new opportunities to help these American heroes, especially when and where they are frustrated by bureaucratic issues.

Question. Studies conducted as a result of the revelations at WRAMC pointed to the need to reform the disability evaluation system (DES). The Integrated Disability Evaluation System (IDES) was established to integrate the DOD and Department of Veterans Affairs disability systems to improve and expedite processing of servicemembers through the disability evaluation system.

What is your assessment of the need to further streamline and improve the DES?

Answer. I support the recommendations of Senator Dole's and Secretary Shalala's commission, to regain patient focus within each department's core competencies. Otherwise, IDES has developed to its limit to have the separate processes operate as if unified. We have recently made progress in this area by setting—and nearly achieving—a goal of having 100 percent certified complete medical records for transitioning servicemembers.

Question. If confirmed, how will you address any need for change?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work to accelerate transition and disability processing within the bounds of the law, principally by working to ensure no bottlenecks exist on the DOD side of the equation. Our governance process improvements with the VA are integral to streamlining the process.

SUICIDE PREVENTION AND MENTAL HEALTH RESOURCES

Question. The numbers of suicides in each of the Services continues to concern the Committee.

In your view, what role should the Joint Chiefs of Staff play in shaping policies to help prevent suicides both in garrison and in theater and to increase the resiliency of all servicemembers and their families, including members of the Reserve components?

Answer. In general, preventing suicides falls under the Service Secretaries' and Service Chiefs' title 10 responsibilities. However, the Joint Chiefs must collectively approach the critical issue of military suicides with the same urgency we have given to protecting the lives of our men and women in combat. One way to do this is through shared understanding among the Services—which the Joint Chiefs can and will promote, similar to sharing best practices regarding prevention of sexual assault. The Department continues to work across the interagency and the White House to better understand the factors leading to suicide, and to ultimately enable all our Veterans and their families to enjoy the future they have sacrificed so much to secure.

Each of the Services has a comprehensive suicide prevention program dedicated to evaluating the impact on force readiness, informing senior leaders, and providing guidance and oversight for program implementation. The Department currently has a number of programs in place designed to build resilience, provide adequate mental health resources, increase help-seeking behaviors, and offer a variety of additional services aimed at helping servicemembers deal effectively with stressors.

Question. If confirmed, what actions will you take to ensure that sufficient mental health resources are available to servicemembers in theater, and to the servicemembers and their families upon return to home station?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work in concert with the Service Chiefs to maintain, and increase where needed, effective treatments for mental health issues, traumatic brain injury, and combat stress. The extensive behavioral health resources already available to our forces in Afghanistan represent an important foundation upon which we will continue to build. I will also continue to support service efforts to remove lingering stigmas or barriers to treatment for servicemembers and their families. We will ensure commanders encourage seeking help by highlighting examples of servicemembers who have benefitted from mental health assistance or counseling.

MILITARY QUALITY OF LIFE

Question. The committee is concerned about the sustainment of key quality of life programs for military families, such as family support, child care, education, employment support, health care, and morale, welfare and recreation services, especially as DOD faces budget challenges.

If confirmed, what further enhancements, if any, to military quality of life programs would you consider a priority in an era of intense downward pressure on budgets, and how do you envision working with the Services, combatant commanders, family advocacy groups, and Congress to achieve them?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to support essential areas, such as mental health counseling, fitness, child care, and spouse employment. I believe we can sustain a reasonable level of essential services only if we continue to reduce overlaps and seek other efficiencies in the way we apply our declining resources. However, we also need to provide security to the Nation and sustain the quality of the All-Volunteer Force. The entire military enterprise is under scrutiny. We can only achieve balance and priority through honest discussion and tough choices regarding which Services foster successful recruitment, retention, and career progression while achieving fiscal sustainability for the military of the 21st century.

FAMILY READINESS AND SUPPORT

Question. Military members and their families in both the Active and Reserve components have made, and continue to make, tremendous sacrifices in support of operational deployments. Senior military leaders have warned of growing concerns among military families as a result of the stress of frequent deployments and the long separations that go with them.

What do you consider to be the most important family readiness issues for servicemembers and their families?

Answer. According to recent surveys, military families are most concerned about pay and benefits and retirement. DOD engages military families on this issue via the Pay and Retirement Working Group. The working group's input is addressed through the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Executive Committee.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure that family readiness needs are addressed and adequately resourced?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to place military family needs among my highest priorities. We must examine every warrior and family support program to ensure that we target funding at the most impactful programs and reduce duplicative efforts. To do so, we will continue current studies with DODEA, DECA, and a number of university partnerships that are focused on best practices and the return on investment of existing programs.

Among these efforts, we must also include the restructuring of medical facilities to make them more efficient, without sacrificing quality or continuity of care.

Question. How would you address these family readiness needs in light of global rebasing, deployments, and future reductions in end strength?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Services to meet the changing needs of our military families. The Joint Staff is building—with the White House and the Services—sustainable community-based partnerships and initiatives that improve education, employment, and wellness support for current and transitioning members.

DOD has also adjusted force size and rotation, redoubled transition support, and invested in world-class health care for our families. This includes: (1) fielding effective treatments for mental health issues, traumatic brain injury, and combat stress; and (2) continuing the effort to reduce the stigma of service and family members seeking mental health services.

Question. If confirmed, how would you ensure support is provided to Reserve component families related to mobilization, deployment and family readiness, as well as to active duty families who do not reside near a military installation?

Answer. We must ensure that every family has access to quality resources, regardless of component or location. Current efforts include the Services' effort to leverage: (1) public/private partnerships within the communities; and (2) the State Joint Force Headquarters of the National Guard to help members access child care, mental health services, and employment opportunities. If confirmed, I will continue my support of these critical efforts.

Question. If confirmed, what additional steps will you take to enhance family support?

Answer. If confirmed, I will continue to advocate for the Services caring for our families. Today, Family Support Working Groups, Resource Management Decision Working Groups, and other venues are actively attempting to ensure program effectiveness, share best practices, and reduce duplication of efforts. America's citizens have also stepped forward—from the local to the national level, thousands of organizations, higher learning institutions, and businesses have partnered to support our Military Family. However, there will always be new ideas and initiatives to enhance family support. I will be most interested in those with high leverage that provide dramatically enhanced support without further deepening our fiscal crisis.

COUNTER THREAT FINANCE

Question. Identifying and disrupting key individuals, entities, and facilitation routes enabling the flow of money that supports terrorism, production of IEDs, narco-trafficking, proliferation, and other significant national security threats could have an outsized impact on confronting these threats. In August 2010, the Department issued a Counter Threat Finance (CTF) Policy Directive which recognized the CTF discipline as an essential tool in combating criminal networks and terrorist organizations and called for the integration of CTF capabilities into future force planning and the continued support to interagency partners conducting CTF operations.

What is your assessment of the Department's efforts to date to institutionalize and support these capabilities?

Answer. We learned the importance of CTF through our success in Iraq and Afghanistan with the Threat Finance Cells. Identifying and upsetting financial supply lines are a proven means of disrupting threats to U.S. national security. DOD Directive 5205.14 (CTF), which was updated in November 2012, drives the institutionalization of CTF within DOD.

Threat Finance Cells—which are comprised of intelligence, law enforcement, and defense personnel—play a supporting role in identifying insurgent, criminal, and terrorist finances; disrupting front companies; developing actionable financial intelligence; freezing/seizing illicit funds; and building criminal cases. Ultimately, success in CTF will depend on DOD's continued ability to integrate with, support, and complement other U.S. Government, multinational, and host nation activities.

Question. What is your assessment of the current ability of the Department to provide support to other U.S. Government departments and agencies conducting counter threat finance activities?

Answer. DOD currently supports the interagency with its unique capabilities, including long-term planning, network analysis, intelligence analysis and tools, and the integration of intelligence into operations. The result is a well-coordinated, capable and robust CTF posture. If confirmed, I do not anticipate an immediate need to expand the support that DOD is providing, but we will continue to remain fully engaged in the interagency process to counter threat finance activities.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to DOD's current counter threat finance efforts?

Answer. The Department is examining its current counter threat finance efforts and identifying ways to strengthen it, incorporate lessons learned from Iraq and Afghanistan, and further institutionalize DOD's capability. Possible recommendations may include further training and education for the force. However, budget reductions will likely make it difficult to significantly expand this program.

LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

Question. You have previously expressed your support for U.S. accession to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Do you still believe that the United States should join the Law of the Sea Convention, and, if so, why?

Answer. Yes. I support the United States acceding to the Law of the Sea Convention. My career as a Naval Officer intermixed with joint tours drives home the importance of this orderly set of laws governing activity on the sea—a set of rules that benefit our maritime nation greatly. Our accession would increase our credibility and influence in defending the Convention's existing norms that enable the access, mobility, and sustainment of our military forces and commercial fleet. Our nonparty status detracts from our ability to lead developments in the maritime domain, and enables emerging powers to advance their contrary interpretations of the Convention. As the global security environment changes, it will become increasingly important for the United States, as the world's foremost maritime power, to use all elements of national power and lead from inside the framework of the Convention rather than observe from the outside.

TREATMENT OF DETAINEES

Question. The Constitution, laws, and treaty obligations of the United States prohibit the torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment of persons held in U.S. custody.

If confirmed, will you take steps to ensure that all relevant DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures applicable to U.S. forces fully comply with the requirements of section 1403 of the Detainee Treatment Act and with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I would continue to take steps to ensure that all relevant DOD directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures applicable to U.S. forces fully comply with the requirements of section 1403 of the Detainee Treatment Act and with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949.

Question. Do you support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the revised Army Field Manual on Interrogations, FM 2–22.3, issued in September 2006, and in DOD Directive 2310.01E, the DOD Detainee Program, dated September 5, 2006?

Answer. Yes. I support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the Army Field Manual on Interrogations and in DOD Directive 2310.01E.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, when asked, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

NAVY INTELLIGENCE, SURVEILLANCE, AND RECONNAISSANCE TRANSITION PLAN

1. Senator NELSON. Admiral Winnefeld, section 112 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2011 directs the Navy to sustain and continue to upgrade its manned airborne intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) fleet until it commences fielding a platform or mix of platforms that provide equal or greater capability. The law directs the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD(I)) to certify annually that the Navy remains in compliance and is supporting the needs of the combatant commanders. The Navy has certified compliance. In the President's budget request, the Navy plans to gradually draw down its aging EP–3E and P–3 Special Projects Aircraft over the period of fiscal years 2016–2018 as part of a maritime ISR transition plan that will field a fleet of MQ–4C Triton unmanned aerial vehicles (UAV). I understand the Secretary of the Navy is supportive of this transition. Have you spoken to the combatant commanders to confirm if these ISR capabilities fulfill their requirements?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Combatant commanders requests for ISR always exceed our capacity to provide. However, regarding capability, the combatant commanders contributed to the Navy's MISR&T Transition Plan through the Battlespace Awareness Joint Capabilities Board. The combatant commanders understand and support how we are optimizing the Navy's "high-demand, low-density" ISR capability.

2. Senator NELSON. Admiral Winnefeld, is the Navy effectively managing the ISR platform transition?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes. Dr. Vickers and I, along with Joint Staff and representatives from the combatant commands, carefully reviewed Navy's current ISR capabilities and proposed way ahead. We have certified Navy's plan each of the past 2 years. Such review is critical because, while the EP–3E ARIES and P–3 Special Projects Aircraft (SPA) have been workhorses for the Navy and Joint Force for decades, they're fast approaching end-of-service life (approximately 2020).

To mitigate short-term risk, the Navy is sustaining the capabilities of both the EP–3E and P–3 SPA aircraft while fielding the baseline Triton UAV with its greatly improved persistence. They are also adding a Quick Reaction Capability, which provides certain "SPA-like" capabilities, to the P–8A aircraft. Proper phasing of manpower is critical to ensure transition of capability and capacity to follow-on platforms, without impacting combatant commanders.

The Navy's plan, as part of a joint effort, invests in the right platform/sensor mix and is in the best interests of the Joint Force, particularly in our current budgetary environment. However, additional requirements, particularly those in the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2014 draft language requiring the sustainment of five EP–3Es for allocation, that limit the Navy's ability to execute this plan may draw resources that impede fielding of the appropriate future force. Dr. Vickers and I will continue to monitor Navy's progress closely.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

READINESS AND FLYING HOUR CUTS

3. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, due to a recently approved reprogramming, the Air Force was able to move $208 million into flying hour funds. Why couldn't DOD do this before April 9, 2013? Was it due to a lack of flexibility in moving funds within the DOD budget?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, both the NDAA and fiscal year 2013 enacted budgets were 3 and 6 months late respectively, which resulted in a 6 month Continuing Resolution that limited our flexibility (transfer authority) to move money between major budget categories and into flying hour funds. The Air Force's limited Operations and Maintenance transfer authority of $15 million was insufficient to restore any reasonable portion of the $591 million flying hour reduction resulting from sequestration in fiscal year 2013. Consequently, the lack of flexibility and reduction in Operations and Maintenance funds resulted in the Air Force grounding some flying squadrons on April 9, 2013. The reprogramming action completed in July gave the Air Force the authority to shift $1.6 billion from other appropriations into critical Operations and Maintenance funds to minimize the impact on readiness, $208 million of which was applied towards the Air Force flying hour program.

4. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, I believe DOD was short approximately $11 billion in overseas contingency operations (OCO) funding and has requested that $9.6 billion be reprogrammed from the base budget. If DOD received full funding for overseas contingency operations, what impact would that have had on DOD operations and readiness as a whole, to include Air Force flying hours?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The President's fiscal year 2013 OCO budget fully funded wartime operations based on our best estimates 2 years ago. However, during execution of the fiscal year 2013 budget in the spring of 2013, the Department identified a shortfall of between $7–$10 billion, conservatively, in OCO funds due to a combination of sequestration reductions against both the Base and OCO operation and maintenance budgets and higher than forecasted wartime operating costs, including fuel, retrograde transportation, etc.

To ensure we could properly conduct wartime operations and to help minimize some of the devastating impacts to base budget readiness, the Department requested $9.6 billion in reprogramming authority from Congress. Because it was unclear how much of the reprogramming action would be approved, the Services continued scrutinizing their budget activities to find additional resources to address the funding shortfall. Ultimately, Congress approved the majority of the requested fiscal year 2013 reprogramming actions, allowing the Department to appropriately fund wartime operations and mitigate a portion of the impacts to readiness in the Air Force Flying Hour Program. Ultimately, the curtailed readiness activities will have a cumulative effect in fiscal year 2014, which will be amplified with further sequestration.

5. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, how many additional hours will have to be dedicated to bring all these units and its aircrews back up to mission-ready status?

Admiral WINNEFELD. As of today, there are 18 squadrons in the Air Force still flying at reduced levels of readiness. An additional 7,000 flying hours at a cost of $116 million above the PB14 request and 3–6 months would be necessary to bring these remaining 18 squadrons from current (lower than Basic Mission Capable) flying rates back to pre-sequester mission status (Combat Mission Ready flying rates).

Prior to sequestration, a substantial number of Air Force squadrons were already operating at lower than optimal goals due to previous Budget Control Act (BCA) reductions and the effects of long-term high operations tempo. On 9 April, a total of 31 squadrons were stood down, including 13 combat-coded (fighter, bomber, and Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS)) units and 18 institutional units (Weapons School, Aggressors, Thunderbirds, etc.). Through efficiencies and the $208 million from the DOD reprogramming request, the Air Force was able to shift funds and increase the flying rates of the 13 combat coded units back to Combat Mission Ready (CMR) rates for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. It will take 3–6 months at this CMR rate before these squadrons return to pre-sequestration mission ready rates. The efficiencies and reprogramming also allowed the remaining 18 institutional units to resume flying, albeit lower than Basic Mission Capable (BMC) rates.

The Air Force will continue to have readiness challenges due to the BCA and sequestration, beyond the units that were stood down. To bring all Air Force flying squadrons back to full mission readiness goals needed to meet Defense Strategic Guidance requirements, it would take approximately 2 years, an additional $3.2 billion per year in fiscal year 2014 and fiscal year 2015, and a reduction in current deployment tempo (e.g. deploy-to-dwell at 1:3 or better).

6. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, how much will that cost?

Admiral WINNEFELD. As of today, there are 18 squadrons in the Air Force still flying at reduced levels of readiness. An additional 7,000 flying hours at a cost of $116 million above the PB14 request and 3–6 months would be necessary to bring these remaining 18 squadrons from current (lower than Basic Mission Capable) flying rates back to pre-sequester mission status (Combat Mission Ready flying rates).

Prior to sequestration, a substantial number of Air Force squadrons were already operating at lower than optimal goals due to previous Budget Control Act (BCA) reductions and the effects of long-term high operations tempo. On 9 April, a total of 31 squadrons were stood down, including 13 combat-coded (fighter, bomber, and AWACS) units and 18 institutional units (Weapons School, Aggressors, Thunderbirds, etc.). Through efficiencies and the $208 million from the DOD reprogramming request, the Air Force was able to shift funds and increase the flying rates of the 13 combat coded units back to Combat Mission Ready (CMR) rates for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. It will take 3–6 months at this CMR rate before these squadrons return to pre-sequestration mission ready rates. The efficiencies and reprogramming also allowed the remaining 18 institutional units to resume flying, albeit lower than BMC rates.

The Air Force will continue to have readiness challenges due to the BCA and sequestration, beyond the units that were stood down. To bring all Air Force flying squadrons back to full mission readiness goals needed to meet Defense Strategic Guidance requirements, it would take approximately 2 years, an additional $3.2 billion per year in fiscal year 2014 and fiscal year 2015, and a reduction in current deployment tempo (e.g. deploy-to-dwell at 1:3 or better).

7. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what happens to these units on October 1, 2013, when sequestration hits again?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Given the nature of the cuts in fiscal year 2013, we had no flexibility in managing squadron readiness. If sequester hits in fiscal year 2014, we will be able to rotationally stand-down units, or fly them at reduced rates, similar to actions we took in fiscal year 2013. The net effect of cuts spread over the full fiscal year versus just 7 months will lead to readiness levels slightly higher than under sequester in fiscal year 2013, but still well below pre-sequester—and already sub-optimal—readiness levels. This will significantly erode our training and force development efforts, and increase risk in our ability to fill OPLAN and the Secretary of Defense ordered missions.

8. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, in your professional military opinion, what are the military options that could best accomplish changing the balance of military power between the Assad regime and the armed opposition without boots-on-the-ground, assuming: (1) vetted rebels are provided with light arms and anti-tank weapons and training; (2) no kinetic action against Syrian integrated air defense system; (3) limited strikes in Syria would be allowed as would flight into Syrian airspace; (4) airstrikes would last no more than 2 weeks; (5) collateral damage to civilians is to be minimized. Under those parameters, assuming legal justifications were in place: (1) what could you accomplish in terms of altering the balance of military power; (2) what lines of military effort would you recommend; (3) what are the risks associated with those lines of effort; and (4) what is the cost of your recommended course(s) of action? Please provide an assessment of the impact on your ability to handle an Iranian conflict following such an action.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Within the framework and the constraints and objectives articulated above, there are military options available, which we have fully briefed to the national security staff.

At the unclassified level, these options would include strikes with standoff weapons on key Syrian Regime infrastructure, logistics nodes, and combat forces command and control nodes that could degrade regime forces. Striking attack helicopters on their ramps with standoff weapons would have an important impact on regime close air support capability, though the locations of those helicopters varies. Contrary to what some have suggested, although fixed wing tactical aircraft are being used by the regime against the opposition, they are not the principal firepower element being used to target the opposition. For this reason, striking runways, again as some have suggested, is not an optimal use of expensive standoff weapons, to say nothing of the fact that the regime would rapidly repair runway damage and resume operations. While the above strikes would have an effect on the balance of military power, they are not likely to be decisive.

Rather, the regime is primarily targeting the opposition through artillery and rocket attacks and ground forces operations. We believe that suppressing these attacks would require a campaign that would roll-back certain (though not necessarily all) elements of the integrated air defense system and subsequently enable a campaign against Assad's ground forces. Details of such a campaign would be classified, but such a campaign is feasible. Contrary to depictions of our prior responses as involving a massive campaign, this would not require enormous resources, but would require a moderate number of ISR, tactical aviation and traditional support aircraft such as tankers, AWACS and personnel recovery resources, as well as regional bases and defenses for those bases. Principal risks to this approach would be: (a) the risk of retaliation from Syria against regional partners and U.S. bases within those countries; and (b) the risk to U.S. aircraft from mobile surface-to-air missile systems.

To effect a positive and longstanding result, U.S. support should contribute to enabling a substantial number of moderate opposition fighters over an extended period of time. Such an endeavor to build a moderate opposition force capable of defeating regime forces and consolidating and holding territory would require at least 2 years. This extended large-scale train and equip effort is probably the wisest course of action; however, it is not without substantial obstacles. Preferably, strikes would be deferred until an opposition force is capable of maintaining and exploiting at least some of the gains provided by the strikes.

The two options outlined above could complement one another and cause the balance of military power to shift. However, we believe it is unrealistic to expect this shift to occur rapidly. Both sides are in an existential struggle for survival, and have demonstrated considerable resiliency. We are concerned that some consider such a campaign to be easy. Once the first 2 weeks pass without a clear solution to the conflict, there would most certainly be an appetite for more action. Thus, we need to understand that the United States would likely be drawn into a protracted conflict, and would need to be prepared for the expense and follow-on actions in a post-Assad Syria that would likely be demanded.

Finally, we need to be prepared to fund either or both options. Our initial estimate for a train and equip mission is in the hundreds of millions dollars per year. The cost of the strikes depends on the number of munitions expended, but costs would start in the tens of millions and could easily increase to hundreds of millions.

Regarding Iran, we are currently postured to respond to contingencies in the Gulf and we monitor Iranian actions very closely. If action against Iran were sequential to action in Syria, we would use forces already anticipated for such a conflict. If such action were to occur in parallel, some of the forces we would deploy would not be at optimal levels of readiness.

9. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, assuming you were given the constraint of no U.S. boots-on-the-ground and to minimize collateral damage, without kinetically taking out the Syrian integrated air defense system, what limited U.S. military options could change the balance of military power between Assad and the armed opposition? I am looking for an option that falls between doing nothing and doing a no-fly-zone over Syria. In your professional military opinion, do you think we should do any of these options?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Two contributions to the contest in Syria could most effectively change the balance of power between President Assad and the armed opposition.

The first is to train and equip an opposition force that can competently fight in this war. This can and should be conducted outside Syria in a neighboring state. I am in favor of expanding this effort.

The second is to conduct operations to begin a campaign to attrite the forces that are causing the most damage to the opposition; namely artillery and rockets launched by Syrian regime forces, followed closely by attack helicopters. To be sure, attacking command and control nodes and fixed wing aircraft would have an impact, but not a decisive impact. Thus, I do not believe that merely cutting runways, as some have suggested, or hitting fixed wing tactical or transport aircraft on the ground will turn the tide. We have learned this before in places like Libya and Serbia, where a considerable level of effort was required to shift events on the ground in favor of an opposition force. This is serious business, and merely launching a few Tomahawk Land Attack Missiles into Syria hoping to turn the tide of this war will not accomplish that objective.

Rather, it would make more sense to execute a campaign that would take out the above-mentioned most effective regime forces (artillery, rockets, and attack helicopters). The details of such a campaign would be classified, but it would generally involve removing the most important elements of the IADS and gradually eliminating the forces that most threaten opposition elements.

My role is to provide advice on how, not whether, to use force. However, I believe such an operation would only be advisable under a satisfactory combination of the following factors: the level of U.S. interest at stake justifies the use of force; the contemplated action is deemed legal under domestic and international law; such a legal basis would not invite unwelcome similar action from parties elsewhere; the outcome of such action would result in decisive effects for a force that clearly shares our interests; an executable and affordable plan exists for what would follow such action; financial support is obtainable from Congress, if required; and no other contingencies of greater importance than instability in Syria are imminent.

10. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, Assad uses airfields to receive weapons and troops from Iran, move Syrian army troops around the country, resupply those troops, and conduct airstrikes against the opposition. Do these airfields represent a strategic vulnerability?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The airfields do represent one of several strategic vulnerabilities, but these airfields are not the regime's center of gravity. Degrading Assad's airfields would hinder the regime but probably not shift the balance of power decisively in favor of the opposition. Moreover, degrading airfields is an expensive and frustrating business, in which cratered runways are repaired quickly and damaged fuel farms are replaced by trucks carrying fuel.

Artillery, rockets, and, to a lesser degree, attack helicopters are principal forces hindering opposition progress in threatening the regime. Thus, I would view those forces as a more important strategic vulnerability than airfields.

11. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, could a limited strike, using standoff weapons and stealth aircraft, crater major runways, making them unusable for the Assad regime?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The U.S. military has the capability to crater Syrian runways, but only at great expense. Cratering all the runways at a representative airfield in Syria would require 50–70 TLAM missiles. However, these runways would only be unusable for several days before they are repaired. Moreover, Russian-built aircraft are especially adept at operating off rough airfields, including those that have been cratered and rapidly repaired. Finally, cratering runways does little or nothing to impact attack or logistics helicopter operations.

12. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, would we have to bomb the Syrian integrated air defense to do a limited stealth and standoff weapons attack?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The U.S. military can conduct a limited stealth and standoff weapons attack without bombing Syrian integrated air defenses. The question is whether such an attack would be decisive in turning the tide in favor of the opposition. Such an attack could achieve a limited objective, such as deterring future use of chemical weapons, but it would not alone shift the tide of the war, as we have seen in several other cases (such as Serbia and Libya).

13. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, how would the movement of Russian S–300 surface-to-air missile systems into Syria affect military options?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The S–300 is a modern surface-to-air missile system that, if procured by Syria, would be their most advanced surface-to-air weapon. The S–300 would significantly increase the risk to any U.S. aircraft or cruise missiles flying within its engagement zone.

14. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, after letting the Taliban raise the flag and the country name they used when they governed Afghanistan on the political office the United States helped arrange in Doha, Qatar, the Afghan people and President Karzai were understandably upset. Are the chances for a U.S.-led peace process, or reconciliation process, dead?

Admiral WINNEFELD. While the reconciliation process in Afghanistan has thus far been exceedingly complex and challenging, is has not stopped moving forward. It remains an important element of fostering stability in Afghanistan. We will continue to support our Afghan partners in their efforts to meet with the Taliban and reach a political settlement that provides peace and security for the people of Afghanistan.

15. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, are we forcing this issue and doing more harm than good?

Admiral WINNEFELD. A reconciliation process inevitably introduces additional complexity into internal conflict in any nation, as well as uncertainty among the elements making up both sides of the conflict. There will be both progress and setbacks along the way in any such negotiation process. Afghanistan is no exception. Nonetheless, a political solution has been required to end most insurgencies (witness the ongoing process in Colombia), and we support reconciliation as a part of the end game solution in Afghanistan. The Department of State is taking the necessary measured steps to support the peace process. A reconciled Afghanistan is in the best interest of all parties involved. President Karzai acknowledges this, and continues to encourage the peace process, albeit on his terms.

16. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, in your military opinion, what is the troop level at which the United States and international troops can only do force protection and no other mission? In other words, at what troop level is the military only able to protect itself?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Troop numbers in combat are not only based on troop-to-task but also the threat environment. Current plans call for a NATO train, advise and assist mission and a separate U.S. counterterrorism mission. Our force protection posture will be designed to protect the force conducting these missions, as well as any supporting U.S. forces. Based on our current threat assessment, our planning consideration allocates approximately 40 percent of the deployed servicemembers to force protection.

KEY PERFORMANCE PARAMETERS

17. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, please list examples of where changes you have helped institute in the military's requirements process through the Joint Requirements Oversight Council (JROC) has been successful.

Admiral WINNEFELD. Examples of successes from changes made to the JROC and JCIDS process include:

- F–35: Addressed service concerns with Key Performance Parameters (KPPs) for all variants and reduced performance threshold values associated with combat radius and short takeoff distance, saving money without compromising required performance for the warfighter.
- Ground Combat Vehicle/Amphibious Combat Vehicle (GCV/ACV): Directed an assessment of commonalities, which confirmed the requirement for different base vehicles and identified a number of technical areas where commonality could potentially provide measurable cost savings.
- Long-Range Strike-Bomber (LRS–B): From the initiation of the Initial Capabilities Document (ICD) and Capabilities Development Document (CDD), the JROC reviewed and approved both in less than 30-days—typically would have run 6-months minimum.
- Unmanned Carrier Launched Airborne Surveillance and Strike System (UCLASS): Re-examined the operational concept of deploying UCLASS which resulted in requirements trades from the previously approved ICD and eventual CDD.
- 3 Dimensional Expeditionary Long Range Radar-Ground/Air Task Oriented Radar (3DELRR–G/ATOR): Reviewed potential overlapping requirements for service-specific radar capabilities. Analysis enabled 3DELRR to proceed with reduced performance threshold values and to meet cost and schedule targets.
- Conventional Prompt Global Strike (CPGS): Reassessed CPGS ICD which resulted in substantial cost savings by making acceptable technology development and performance tradeoffs.
- Global Positioning Satellite Modernization AoA: Reviewed and confirmed that the existing program of record satisfies combatant command requirements. Avoided substantial expenditure aimed at achieving unnecessary performance improvements.
- Air and Missile Defense Radar (AMDR): Reduced performance threshold values to ensure the system would not require new hosting platform development while still providing improvements to current capabilities.
- Armored Multi-Purpose Vehicle (AMPV): After validation of the CDD, industry engagement resulted in KPP change proposals that adequately addressed the identified capability requirements while meeting or exceeding affordability targets.
- Family of Advanced Beyond Line-of-Sight Terminals (FAB–T): Reviewed the CDD and approved revisions to both the Initial Operational Capability definition and several KPPs.
- Apache Block III: Reviewed and approved revisions to Capability Production Document KPPs to include Net Ready-related specified solutions and engine performance to account for engine wear over the duration of the program.

18. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, in addition, what other reform initiatives such as this are you working on?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Other recent and future JROC and JCIDS initiatives include:

- Key Performance Parameter Relief (JROCM 015–13): Intended to encourage acquisition managers, in coordination with the appropriate requirements sponsors, to officially request requirements relief where KPPs appear out of line with an appropriate cost-benefit analysis. This has resulted in increased descoping actions such as in AMPV above, JMS, and Apache Block III.
- I initiated Quarterly Leadership Forums between myself, USD(AT&L), and D/CAPE to ensure continued coordination and alignment between requirements, acquisition, and resourcing.
- We are reviewing and updating JROC and JCIDS guidance documents based on lessons learned and opportunities to further improve the process. Additionally, we are working closely with AT&L as they update the DODI 5000.02 (Operation of the Defense Acquisition System).

U.S. AFRICA COMMAND

19. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what is your threat assessment of U.S. Africa Command's (AFRICOM) area of responsibility—is the threat growing, stabilized, or receding?

Admiral WINNEFELD. [Deleted.]

20. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, do you believe we have the forces in place in U.S. European Command (EUCOM) and AFRICOM to be able to both remain engaged in Africa and respond, if necessary, to threats as they evolve?

Admiral WINNEFELD. DOD is prepared to respond to threats and crises as they arise while remaining engaged in AFRICOM and EUCOM.

AFRICOM forces remain engaged in priority missions such as countering violent extremist organizations and partnership building within Africa, in accordance with the President's priorities for the continent. Meanwhile, we have taken a number of steps to be better prepared for crisis operations, particularly in Northern Africa. For example, the Marine Corps has resourced additional Marine Security Guard (MSG) Detachments to meet regional threats and address Department of State security concerns. While relieving an embassy under attack is highly complex, we also maintain Marine FAST platoons and other forces in the region to be able to rapidly reinforce an embassy in advance of a problem. Among these forces is a dedicated Special Marine Air Ground Task Force-Crisis Response in Spain capable of quickly responding to a variety of threats in Africa or Europe.

DOD has also developed and adopted rules that will allow force sharing between combatant commands for brief durations to ensure rapid response in the event of a crisis. DOD and the State Department work together to ensure that high risk facilities are properly secured with DOD support, as required. Finally, DOD monitors specified crisis response forces throughout the world and makes adjustments to position and posture forces based on threat requirements.

21. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, do you believe we have dedicated enough intelligence assets to the continent of Africa?

Admiral WINNEFELD. [Deleted.]

22. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what is you assessment of combining AFRICOM with EUCOM?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Assigning combatant commands under the current structure has led to productive engagement, planning, and operations in the respective areas of responsibility. However, depending on the magnitude of budget cuts to DOD, we may need to consider combatant command consolidations among a number of other difficult staff consolidation and reduction decisions. Combining AFRICOM and EUCOM would be one of several options we would consider.

F–35 JOINT STRIKE FIGHTER PROGRAM

23. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what is your assessment of the F–35 program?

Admiral WINNEFELD. One of the Department's top priorities is to ensure the success of the F–35 development program and achieve a stable design that will permit increased and more economical production rates. The President's fiscal year 2014 budget request includes a total of $8.3 billion for continued system development ($1.8 billion) and procurement ($6.5 billion) of an additional 29 F–35 aircraft. To ensure the F–35 maintains its effectiveness against continually evolving threats, this request also includes resources to deliver advanced weapons and sensors to the F–35 fleet in the years following Initial Operational Capability (IOC).

To date, the Department has accepted close to 70 aircraft from the production line which are undergoing test activities at NAS Patuxent River and Edwards Air Force Base (AFB) while the Air Force and Marine Corps are training pilots and maintainers at Eglin AFB. In addition, the Marine Corps activated the first operational F–35 squadron last fall at MCAS Yuma, AZ and is currently accepting deliveries of F–35B STOVL aircraft as part of a 16-aircraft squadron by September 2013. Moreover, the Services documented their IOC plans in a report to Congress in June, and the government recently reached agreement with the contractor for Low Rate Initial Production (LRIP) lots 6 and 7.

While we have over 50 percent of the flight test program remaining and have a good deal of development to complete, including software and weapons integration, both the F–35 A and B completed the first lifetime (8,000 hours) of fatigue testing and will begin the second lifetime testing soon. Likewise, the F–35C is projected to complete the first lifetime this fall. While we remain fully committed to the program, our focus is on completing development, which will permit ramping up to increased economies of scale in production, and on getting support costs down.

24. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, why do we need the F–35?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The F–35, as our primary air dominance platform, meets the National Security Strategy challenge of preparing for increasingly sophisticated adversaries and deterring and defeating aggression in anti-access environments. The F–35 will execute a broad range of missions against the most capable threats across the full spectrum of military operations. It will defeat increasingly sophisticated threat aircraft and air defenses to provide Joint Forces the freedom of action to conduct land, maritime and air operations. The F–35 capabilities will preserve our ability to precisely project power into distant, highly contested environments.

The F–35 will form the backbone of U.S. combat airpower for decades to come. It will replace aging, legacy fighters from across the Air Force, Navy, and Marine Corps with a multi-role, fifth generation aircraft. It will achieve air dominance across multiple missions to include: offensive and defensive counter-air, suppression and destruction of enemy air defenses, and precision strike (e.g., air interdiction, strategic attack, and close-air support). It provides advanced capability in the following areas:

- Survivability: detects, denies, and defeats sophisticated threats.
- Lethality: locates, identifies, intercepts, and destructs enemy aircraft, missiles, land and sea forces.
- Interoperability and Networking: enhances linked and synchronized interoperability among the Services and our international partners.
- Computer Network Operations: protects own networks from enemy attack and disrupts enemy networks.
- Affordability: the program's tight focus on reducing cost has realized significant and encouraging success. International participation further reduces cost.
- Logistics Supportability and Commonality.

The F–35 is central to the National Military Strategy and our ability to deter and defeat an increasing anti-access threat.

25. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what is the threat that is driving procurement of this aircraft—air and ground?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The multi-role F–35 is the centerpiece of the Department's future air dominance and precision attack capabilities. The F–35's fifth generation attributes, including integrated advanced technology sensors, networking, and signature controls, are critical for maintaining U.S. air supremacy and ensuring our ability to operate against modern and emerging threats. The emergence of competitor fifth generation aircraft within the next decade—coupled with the proliferation of sophisticated electronic warfare capabilities and modern integrated air defense systems—increasingly threaten our current fourth generation aircraft. The F–35 is designed to control the air and to penetrate heavily defended environments in order to deliver a wide-range of precision munitions.

26. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, why can't we just purchase more F–16s and F/A–18 Super Hornets?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The Department's priority in TACAIR is to acquire fifth-generation fighter/attack aircraft as quickly and efficiently as practical while maintaining sufficient inventory of legacy aircraft to meet current and near-term commitments. F–16s and F/A–18E/Fs remain highly capable strike and fighter aircraft and will be operated for many additional years. However, the limitations of these fourth generation aircraft against adversaries employing sophisticated surface-to-air and air-to-air threats will make them much less survivable in the future. The F–35 will represent a generational leap in effectiveness over these superb, but legacy, platforms.

27. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, does DOD still plan to procure 2,443 F–35s?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Yes, the Department's current plan is to procure 2,443 F–35 aircraft. The President's fiscal year 2014 Defense budget request includes a total of $8.3 billion for the program—$1.8 billion for continued system development and $6.5 billion for procurement of 29 aircraft. The Department endeavored to protect the development of the F–35 program this year as it adjusted its budget to meet the mandates of sequestration.

28. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what impact does slowing down or delaying F–35 production?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Slowing down or delaying F–35 production has two major impacts. First we need to begin to ramp up production to take advantage of more economic orders of quantity. The Department has maintained a flat production ramp for the last few years to mitigate the costs associated with concurrency. As the potential risks of finding major design flaws through ground and flight test subside, we need to ramp up the production profile at a measured rate to reduce the cost of the aircraft. Slowing or delaying this will cost us more money.

Second, delaying or slowing F–35 production impacts our operational forces. The F–35 will replace most of the legacy tactical aircraft force structure for the Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps. Delaying the transition to the F–35 will force the Services to extend the life of their current fleets through costly life cycle extensions, additional inspection and modification schedules, and in some cases changes to operational plans. The F–35 represents the future of our joint tactical aircraft fleet. Any delays to that end state impact our ability to meet current and future operational commitments.

29. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what would be the impact of decreasing procurement of any of the F–35 variants?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Unit cost is extremely sensitive to the total quantity procured. Savings in the cost of the aircraft can be realized through bulk purchases and other economies of scale. The actual cost of an individual aircraft in any given LRIP lot is largely influenced by how many aircraft are being purchased, and how much production line learning has been achieved to that point. Loss of purchases will limit the ability of the program to take advantage of economies of scale, as well as reducing learning opportunities, which would drive the cost up significantly.

30. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what is your operational assessment of the importance of the international partnership in this program?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The F–35 program is the Department's largest cooperative program with eight partner nations participating including the United Kingdom, Italy, Netherlands, Turkey, Canada, Australia, Denmark, and Norway. The F–35 enhances the strength of our security alliances by closing a crucial capability gap which enables us to operate together more effectively. Likewise, operating a common fifth generation strike fighter aircraft not only helps minimize communications and interoperability issues among partner nations but also becomes another element that binds us together. In addition, partner nation procurement and Foreign Military Sales of the F–35 mitigate costs through increased production quantities. Notably, partner nations recently have met and expressed their continued commitment and support for the program; however, they are also monitoring how DOD budget cuts will impact the cost of the program.

CIVILIAN FURLOUGHS

31. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what can DOD do to end civilian furloughs now?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The Secretary of Defense instructed all components to monitor funding closely for the remainder of fiscal year 2013. On 6 August, the Secretary announced that this goal was accomplished, and reduced the total furlough days for most civilians from 11 to 6 days. None of us want to see this occur again in 2014, but the sequestration reductions will be more severe next year than this year.

32. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, will DOD use civilian furloughs next year to cut personnel costs?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The $37 billion in fiscal year 2013 budget cuts mandated by sequestration, combined with short timelines that limited our options, were a major cause of these furloughs. We would hope to avoid furloughs in the future because of their deleterious effects on morale and their potential to cause our best civilians to seek employment elsewhere. However, a $52 billion sequestration top line cut in fiscal year 2014 would perpetuate our readiness shortfalls, likely requiring additional civilian personnel actions. These actions could include furloughs, but we believe under a longer-term view would more likely be weighted towards reductions in civilian billets leading to a reduction-in-force action.

33. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, how long will it take before you realize this is a penny wise-pound foolish approach to cost savings?

Admiral WINNEFELD. We already realize the drawbacks of civilian furloughs—they are as distasteful to us as any other budget reduction mechanism. However, in fiscal year 2013, sequestration was applied by Congress on a short timeline, limiting our options and resulting in drastic measures like readiness stand-downs and furloughs that were not strategically or managerially sound. To avoid even more far reaching effects on training, we furloughed most of our civilian employees for up to 6 days. This impacted morale and productivity in most of our support operations, but we were left with no other alternative in finding $37 billion in savings in such a short period of time.

Going forward, the Strategic Choices and Management Review has defined the decision-space faced by the Department's senior leadership. This, in turn, will inform the Services and defense agencies in developing their fiscal year 2015–2019 budgets later this year, as well as ultimately inform the Department's next Quadrennial Defense Review early next year.

34. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, early this year you hosted a meeting with Members of Congress and the Vice Chiefs of the Services. One of the major themes from that meeting was the commitment to address cultural change in the Services to combat sexual assault. What steps have you taken since then to effect that cultural change and what will you do, if confirmed, to continue progress?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Cultural change begins at the top of any organization. The senior leaders within the Department of Defense are committed to aggressively addressing this issue. The Joint Chiefs have reviewed and made changes to service policies, have shared best practices, have recommended a number of important initiatives to the Secretary that have been implemented across the department, have conducted a stand-down to focus exclusively on sexual assault, have updated our training programs, and are currently engaged in developing specific metrics to ensure we maintain a persistent focus on this issue. Our initiatives are designed to cover the full spectrum of attacking this problem, including but not limited to: continuing our efforts to create an environment where this crime is much less likely to occur; taking the best possible care of the victims of this crime when it occurs; continuing progress in creating an atmosphere more conducive to reporting; and continuing to tighten our prosecution efforts. Measuring progress is exceptionally difficult, but we feel we are making progress—for instance, the Services believe they are already seeing increased rates of reporting. The personal engagement by senior leaders created action down the chain of command and the priority to change our culture is recognized throughout our Services. We will continue to focus on combatting sexual assault within our ranks to drive a culture of respect and dignity for all our servicemembers—and I personally welcome and look forward to our continued interaction with Congress on this vital issue.

IMPACT OF SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE FUNDING REDUCTION FOR B–61 BOMB

35. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, what are the military and geo-political implications of the Senate Appropriations Committee's recommendation to reduce funding for the B–61 Life Extension Program (LEP) by $168 million?

Admiral WINNEFELD. A $168 million reduction to the B–61 LEP would slip the delivery of the first production unit past fiscal year 2019 and impact our commitment to our NATO and Asian allies. Additionally, the Commander of STRATCOM stated that the program is important to the long-term viability of the B–2A strategic mission and is needed regardless of changes to NATO commitments.

This reduction would also limit the DOD and the Department of Energy from leveraging interoperable technology for other strategic weapons. We would need to adjust the budget and scope for those programs, resulting in delays to the overall Nuclear Weapons Council Baseline Plan.

TRICARE FEES

36. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, prior to sending fee increase proposals to Congress, why doesn't DOD sit down with beneficiary associations and Congress to design fee increases that are reasonable and acceptable to everyone?

Admiral WINNEFELD. Military health benefit reform has been shaped over the last 8 years by program and policy experts, Members of Congress, constituencies, and subject matter experts from within and outside of the Department. The Department's proposals have been and will continue to be based on sound principles, as well as feedback from these stakeholders.

37. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, it seems to me that DOD should wait on the Military Compensation and Retirement Modernization Commission to report its recommendations before asking Congress to make piecemeal changes to personnel benefits. Do you agree or disagree, and why or why not?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The Commission has a unique opportunity to make real and substantive change. We also recognize that comprehensively reviewing all areas of military pay and benefits, developing recommendations for change, and vetting them within DOD and with other Departments takes time. We would like to take that time, but sequestration has radically changed the budget reality and demands more rapid action from the Department and Congress if we are to sustain long-term readiness and modernization.

38. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, wouldn't development of a comprehensive package of compensation and retirement benefit changes, to include health benefit changes, make more sense rather than a piece-meal approach that wouldn't get us to an optimal solution for controlling DOD's sky-rocketing personnel costs?

Admiral WINNEFELD. If we had the luxury of time to allow development of a comprehensive package before making any changes, we would support it. However, given the enormous pressure the DOD budget is under, we need to act with urgency on both efficiencies and compensation reform if we are to maintain an acceptable level of military capability, capacity, and readiness to be able to conduct our military missions. I am not convinced that there is excessive risk in getting compensation and benefits under control through carefully, but quickly, considered individual actions.

NUCLEAR FORCE REDUCTIONS AND MODERNIZATION

39. Senator INHOFE. Admiral Winnefeld, you state in your advance policy questions that "the timing and size of reductions, if any, would have to be closely coupled to the status of the modernization effort." The status today of that effort is as follows: (1) 2-year delay for the follow-on SSBN; (2) 2-year delay to the follow-on ALCM; (3) 2- to 3-year delay to LEP for the B–61 nuclear bomb; (4) 2-year delay for the W–78/88 LEP; and (5) an indefinite delay for the construction of a facility to replace the Chemistry and Metallurgy Facility in Los Alamos. At what point are you prepared to say that delays in the nuclear modernization effort, as promised by the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), should caution against further nuclear force reductions? Put another way, if these delays get worse, are you prepared to recommend against further nuclear force reductions below New START levels?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The Nuclear Weapons Council has recently approved a baseline strategy that provides an executable 25-year plan that sustains a safe, secure, and effective nuclear weapons stockpile. This strategy is aligned with plans for platforms and delivery systems, and has adjusted the start dates and delivery targets for LEPs and some portions of the infrastructure improvements. This plan is executable with respect to throughput considerations and given fiscal constraints. It also moves us towards a responsive infrastructure, as stated in the Nuclear Posture Review and considered as part of the follow-on nuclear force reductions. I consider execution of this baseline strategy to be necessary for any negotiation of further nuclear force reductions below New START levels.

However, this plan is vulnerable to additional budget cuts—it is very fragile. While my recommendations on additional nuclear weapons cuts are primarily tied to the direct linkage they should have with negotiations with Russia, I would have to also take into consideration any further delays to modernization programs. Because I believe below New START cuts would be well in the future, we will have a much better understanding of the status of the programs when and if they are in play.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR ROGER F. WICKER

UH–1N REPLACEMENT OPPORTUNITIES

40. Senator WICKER. Admiral Winnefeld, as evidenced by the recent relief of 17 officers at Minot AFB and the reports of the Defense Science Board (DSB) Standing Task Force on Nuclear Weapons Surety, there is still a serious neglect of priority and budget for the sustainment of the Air Force's Priority One Nuclear Enterprise. This lack of prioritization and resourcing manifests in a nuclear enterprise that continues to conduct critical mission activities with outdated and insufficiently supported aircraft and ground vehicles, to include the woefully inadequate 40-plus-year-old UH–1N helicopter.

The Air Force has acknowledged the need to replace the UH–1N for over a decade. The aircraft's inadequate speed, range and payload, and obsolescent sensors and monitoring equipment are well-documented. The use of an antiquated airframe such as the UH–1N to provide security for Intercontinental Ballistic Missile (ICBM) sites reflects a lack of proper resource prioritization by DOD.

As Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, you are required to provide cross-Service oversight and recommendations that lead to the most effective and efficient use of the greater defense industrial capabilities. There are inexpensive and cost-effective solutions available to replace the Vietnam-era Huey being fielded by other Services that are far more reliable, capable, and safe.

As demonstrated in the Senate Armed Services Committee markup of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2014, I would like to understand the current plan for replacing the existing UH–1N fleet. In addition, I would like your commitment that this issue will be addressed in the upcoming fiscal year 2015 budget submittal. Despite being an Air Force priority for over 10 years, why has the replacement of the UH–1N fleet not been realized?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The requirement for a more responsive capability to meet ICBM security needs remains valid, but budget constraints in both the near-term and the foreseeable future make committing to new acquisition programs challenging. A formal replacement strategy for the UH–1N is due to the Senate Armed Services Committee on February 1, 2014. As potential solutions, the Air Force is pursuing a variety of replacement options to include Excess Defense Articles at low or no cost. We remain committed to remaining involved and attentive to this requirement.

41. Senator WICKER. Admiral Winnefeld, the leadership of Air Force Global Strike Command recently commented that: "I have had an urgent and compelling need since 1996 in terms of speed, range, and payload . . . the UH–1 does not meet the need. How much longer are we willing to wait and take this risk?" Has there been any change to the ICBM security force posture that you believe makes the replacement of the UH–1 less compelling or a more acceptable security risk?

Admiral WINNEFELD. No, the ICBM security force posture has not changed. The requirement to replace the UH–1s remains valid. However, based on budget constraints, the Air Force currently plans to sustain the UH–1 for another 6–10 years vice replacing them. The Air Force will mitigate risk by upgrading UH–1 cockpits and making them night-vision-compatible combined with other critical safety improvements. The Air Force also recently received three UH–1s from the Marine Corps, which will increase capacity and availability. In addition, the Air Force and Army are examining options for the Army to transfer additional UH–1s to the Air Force.

42. Senator WICKER. Admiral Winnefeld, there are aircraft being fielded by DOD today that are significantly more capable and less costly to own and operate than the UH–1N. In your leadership role on the JROC, have you, or will you, direct the Air Force to prioritize consideration of in-production DOD aircraft as a replacement for the UH–1 rather than continue to assume the associated security risks?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The JROC does not direct service acquisition decisions. Rather, it defines and validates Joint force requirements that are then submitted to both budget and acquisition processes. The JROC does validate the results of analyses of alternatives, and will be alert to consideration of all possible alternatives, including in-production aircraft. When the decision is made to replace the UH–1N, a full and open competition will be conducted to find the helicopter that meets the mission requirements and provides DOD the most capable replacement at the most economically feasible cost. This may ultimately be an aircraft that is already in production, but those efficiencies will be evident through the proper source selection process.

43. Senator WICKER. Admiral Winnefeld, the Combat Rescue Helicopter (CRH) mission requirements were determined to be overly robust and expensive to justify the CRH's use for the domestic support missions currently conducted by the UH–1N. There is concern that the lack of urgency regarding fielding of a UH–1 replacement may indicate an attempt to merge CRH and UH–1N missions in the future. Did the JROC review of the CRH program validate any requirement to provide site and convoy security for the Nation's ICBM force or for supporting the Air Force District of Washington VIP airlift/evacuation missions currently supported by the UH–1N?

Admiral WINNEFELD. The CRH's primary mission is to recover isolated personnel from hostile or denied territory. It will also execute humanitarian missions, civil search and rescue, disaster relief, casualty/medical evacuation, and non-combatant evacuation operations. CRH is not being produced to replace the UH–1N; rather it will replace the Air Force's aging HH–60G Pave Hawk helicopter fleet. Thus, JROC review and validation of the CRH requirements did not include missions currently supported by the UH–1N, such as providing site and convoy security for the Nation's ICBM force or supporting the Air Force District of Washington VIP airlift/evacuation missions. However, this would not preclude the CRH from being called upon to execute missions currently being performed by other vertical lift platforms.

[The nomination reference of ADM James A. Winnefeld, Jr., USN, follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 24, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

The following named officer for reappointment as the Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and appointment to the grade indicated while assigned to a position of importance and responsibility under title 10, U.S.C., sections 601 and 154:

To be Admiral.

ADM James A. Winnefeld, Jr., 5212.

[The biographical sketch of ADM James A. Winnefeld, Jr., USN, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

TRANSCRIPT OF NAVAL SERVICE FOR ADM JAMES ALEXANDER WINNEFELD, JR., USN

07 June 1978	Ensign
07 June 1980	Lieutenant (junior grade)
01 July 1982	Lieutenant
01 September 1988	Lieutenant Commander
01 September 1992	Commander
01 September 1997	Captain
01 October 2003	Rear Admiral (lower half)
06 May 2006	Designated Rear Admiral while serving in billets commensurate with that grade
01 August 2006	Rear Admiral
14 September 2007	Vice Admiral
19 May 2010	Admiral, Service continuous to date

Assignments and duties:

	From	To
Naval Station, Annapolis, MD (Division Officer)	June 1978	Nov. 1978
Naval Aviation Schools Command, Pensacola, FL (DUINS)	Nov. 1978	Apr. 1979
Training Squadron SIX (Student)	Apr. 1979	June 1979
Naval Aviation Schools Command, Pensacola, FL (DUINS)	June 1979	Dec. 1979
Training Squadron TWO THREE (Student)	June 1979	Dec. 1979
Training Squadron TWO TWO (Student)	Dec. 1979	May 1980
Fighter Squadron ONE TWO FOUR (Replacement Pilot)	Jun. 1980	Apr. 1981
Fighter Squadron TWO FOUR (Power Plants Branch Officer)	Apr. 1981	Nov. 1983
Naval Fighter Weapons School, San Diego, CA (Quality Assurance Officer)	Nov. 1983	Jan. 1987
Fighter Squadron ONE TWO FOUR (Replacement Naval Aviator)	Jan. 1987	Apr. 1987
Fighter Squadron ONE (Operations Officer)	Apr. 1987	Jan. 1990
Joint Staff (Action Officer, EUCOM/CENTCOM Branch, J3)	Feb. 1990	July 1991
Joint Staff (Senior Aide-De-Camp to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff)	July 1991	Aug. 1992

	From	To
Fighter Squadron ONE TWO FOUR (Student)	Aug. 1992	Jan. 1993
XO, Fighter Squadron TWO ONE ONE	Jan. 1993	Apr. 1994
CO, Fighter Squadron TWO ONE ONE	Apr. 1994	Mar. 1995
Naval Nuclear Power Training Command, Orlando, FL (Student)	Mar. 1995	Feb. 1996
Prospective Executive Officer, USS John C. Stennis (CVN 74)	Feb. 1996	Mar. 1996
Naval Reactors, Department of Energy, Washington, DC (Student)	Mar. 1996	Aug. 1996
XO, USS John C Stennis (CVN 74)	Aug. 1996	May 1998
CO, USS Cleveland (LPD 7)	May 1998	Feb. 2000
CO, USS Enterprise (CVN 65)	Feb. 2000	Mar. 2002
Office of the Vice Chief of Naval Operations (Executive Assistant)	Mar. 2002	July 2003
Commander, U.S. Atlantic Fleet (Director, Warfare Programs and Readiness) (N8)	July 2003	Dec. 2004
Commander, Carrier Strike Group TWO	Dec. 2004	June 2006
Commander, U.S. Joint Forces Command (Director of Joint Innovation and Experimentation, J9)	June 2006	Aug. 2007
Commander, SIXTH Fleet/Commander, Striking and Support Forces NATO/Deputy Commander, U.S. Naval Forces Europe/Commander, Joint Headquarters Lisbon	Sep. 2007	Aug. 2008
Joint Staff (Director, Strategic Plans and Policy) (J5)/Senior Member, U.S. Delegation to the United Nations Military Staff Committee	Aug. 2008	May 2010
Commander, Northern Command/Commander, North American Aerospace Defense Command	May 2010	Aug. 2011
Vice Chairman of the Joint Chief of Staff	Aug. 2011	to date

Medals and awards:

Defense Distinguished Service Medal
Distinguished Service Medal
Defense Superior Service Medal
Legion of Merit with one Silver Star
Bronze Star Medal
Defense Meritorious Service Medal
Meritorious Service Medal
Air Medal with First Strike/Flight Award
Navy and Marine Corps Commendation Medal with one Gold Star
Joint Service Achievement Medal
Navy and Marine Corps Achievement Medal
Joint Meritorious Unit Award
Navy Unit Commendation with one Bronze Star
Meritorious Unit Commendation with two Bronze Stars
Navy "E" Ribbon with "E" Device
National Defense Service Medal with one Bronze Star
Armed Forces Expeditionary Medal with four Bronze Stars
Southwest Asia Service Medal with one Bronze Star
Global War on Terrorism Expeditionary Medal
Global War on Terrorism Service Medal
Sea Service Deployment Ribbon with two Bronze Stars Expert Pistol Shot Medal

Special qualifications:

BS (Aerospace Engineering) Georgia Institute of Technology, 1978
Designated Naval Aviator, 1980
Capstone, 2004–3
Designated Level IV Joint Qualified Officer, 2009

Summary of joint duty assignments:

Assignment	Dates	Rank
Joint Staff (Action Officer, EUCOM/CENTCOM Branch, J3)	Feb. 1990–July 1991	LCDR
Joint Staff (Senior Aide-De-Camp to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff).	July 1991–Aug. 1992	CDR
Commander, U.S. Joint Forces Command (Director of Joint Innovation and Experimentation, J9).	June 2006–Aug. 2007	RADM
Commander, SIXTH Fleet/Commander, Striking and Support Forces NATO/Deputy Commander, U.S. Naval Forces Europe/Commander, Joint Headquarters Lisbon.	Sep. 2007–Aug. 2008	VADM
Joint Staff (Director, Strategic Plans and Policy) (J5)/Senior Member, U.S. Delegation to the United Nations Military Staff Committee.	Aug. 2008–May 2010	VADM
Commander, Northern Command/Commander, North American Aerospace Defense Command.	May 2010–Aug. 2011	ADM
Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff	Aug. 2011–to date	ADM

[The Committee on Armed Services requires certain senior military officers nominated by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial, and other information of the nominee. The form executed by ADM James A. Winnefeld, Jr., USN, in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
James A. Winnefeld, Jr.; Nickname: Sandy.

2. Position to which nominated:
Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

3. Date of nomination:
June 24, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
April 24, 1956; Coronado, CA.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married to Mary Alice Winnefeld.
Maiden name: Mary Alice Werner.

7. Names and ages of children:
James, age 17.
Jonathan, age 15.

8. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed above.
None, other than military service.

9. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.
I serve as a trustee of the Naval Academy Foundation Athletics and Scholarships program, as reported on my SF 278. Trustee means "member" in this case. I have no advisory or supervisory role in the organization.

10. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.
None.

11. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, military medals and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements.

None.

12. Commitment to testify before Senate committees: Do you agree, if confirmed, to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate?

Yes.

13. Personal views: Do you agree, when asked before any duly constituted committee of Congress, to give your personal views, even if those views differ from the administration in power?

Yes.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–E of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–E are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

JAMES A. WINNEFELD, JR.

This 14th day of June, 2013.

[The nomination of ADM James A. Winnefeld, Jr., USN, was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on July 30, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on August 1, 2013.]

NOMINATIONS OF HON. STEPHEN W. PRESTON TO BE GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE; HON. JON T. RYMER TO BE INSPECTOR GENERAL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE; MS. SUSAN J. RABERN TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY FOR FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND COMPTROLLER; AND MR. DENNIS V. McGINN TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY FOR ENERGY, INSTALLATIONS, AND ENVIRONMENT

THURSDAY, JULY 25, 2013

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC.

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:36 a.m. in room SH–216, Hart Senate Office Building, Senator Carl Levin (chairman) presiding.

Committee members present: Senators Levin, Udall, Manchin, Shaheen, Blumenthal, Donnelly, Kaine, and Inhofe.

Also present: Senator John Warner, R–VA (Ret.).

Committee staff members present: Peter K. Levine, staff director; and Leah C. Brewer, nominations and hearings clerk.

Majority staff members present: Jonathan D. Clark, counsel; Michael J. Kuiken, professional staff member; Gerald J. Leeling, general counsel; Jason W. Maroney, counsel; Mariah K. McNamara, special assistant to the staff director; William G.P. Monahan, counsel; Michael J. Noblet, professional staff member; Roy F. Phillips, professional staff member; John H. Quirk V, professional staff member; and Russell L. Shaffer, counsel.

Minority staff members present: John A. Bonsell, minority staff director; Daniel C. Adams, minority associate counsel; Steven M. Barney, minority counsel; William S. Castle, minority general counsel; Samantha L. Clark, minority associate counsel; Natalie M. Nicolas, minority staff assistant; and Lucian L. Niemeyer, professional staff member.

Staff assistants present: Daniel J. Harder and John L. Principato.

Committee members' assistants present: Jeff Fatora, assistant to Senator Nelson; Casey Howard, assistant to Senator Udall; Mara Boggs and David LaPorte, assistants to Senator Manchin; Patrick Day, assistant to Senator Shaheen; Moran Banai, assistant to Senator Gillibrand; Ethan Saxon, assistant to Senator Blumenthal; Marta McLellan Ross, assistant to Senator Donnelly; Karen Courington, assistant to Senator Kaine; Steve Smith, assistant to Senator King; Alex Herrgott, assistant to Senator Inhofe; Lenwood Landrum, assistant to Senator Sessions; Todd Harmer, assistant to Senator Chambliss; Craig Abele, assistant to Senator Graham; and Peter Blair, assistant to Senator Lee.

OPENING STATEMENT OF SENATOR CARL LEVIN, CHAIRMAN

Chairman LEVIN. Good morning, everybody. The committee meets, this morning, to consider nominations for a number of important and challenging positions and assignments.

We welcome Steve Preston, who's nominated to be the Department of Defense (DOD) General Counsel; Jon Rymer, nominated to the Department of Defense Inspector General (IG); Susan Rabern, nominated to be the Department of the Navy's Assistant Secretary for Financial Management and Comptroller; and Retired Vice Admiral Dennis McGinn, nominated to be the Department of the Navy's Assistant Secretary for Energy, Installations, and Environment.

We appreciate your being here today. We appreciate, also, your willingness to serve in these positions which have such great responsibility.

We welcome your family members this morning. The committee is keenly aware of how important families are, in terms of supporting the family members who take these positions, and to the success of our civilian leaders. We very much appreciate those family members who are able to join us today. Our witnesses should feel free, during their opening remarks, to introduce family members or others who may be with them here this morning.

We're especially pleased to welcome back to our committee a dear, dear friend. I won't call him an old friend, although he is an old friend. John Warner is a true giant, a modern giant of the U.S. Senate. I don't want to say we miss him every day, because that might suggest something about my Ranking Member, which I don't want to suggest. [Laughter.]

But, we miss you every day around here. The contribution that you made to this body and to our country, the ability that you have to bring people together, to look at issues in a clear and a clean way, free from a lot of parochial or partisan manner, is something which we treasure in our memory and we wish we could replicate here in the Senate today.

John, we just love to see you here. I know every member of this committee treasures our relationship with you, but I particularly treasure the long, long relationship that we had.

Senator INHOFE. May I say something?

Chairman LEVIN. Please.

Senator INHOFE. Let me also echo a few things about Senator Warner. We've been good friends for many, many years. He does have some frailties, however. I always remember, when you were out in Oklahoma and my staff, which, under my supervision, generally drives pretty fast—I always remember your statement. You said, "I've been through two wars, I've been through there, and I'm not going to die on this highway. Slow down." [Laughter.]

He did. John spoke, and speaks, with authority, and people listen.

It's nice to have you back, John.

Chairman LEVIN. I have a lot of memories. I ought to share one, at least, since my ranking member shared one. I have so many. But, the love of life that Senator Warner has, the lust for life—when we were traveling together, and we'd be eating in a restaurant, and he would have something, which he had special gusto for and fondness for, some food. After we were done, he'd walk into the kitchen, in his commanding way, and say, "Can you pack up about 20 of those dinners for my crew? I'm taking them to the airplane and handing them out to people on the way." He always took care of the men and women who traveled with us. It was always in his mind to do that.

But, the way in which John Warner gives a zest to life is something we also ought to emulate. We treasure the many, many memories. I won't go into them more than that, but we will call on Senator Warner to defend himself in a couple of minutes, when he introduces Admiral McGinn.

The positions to which our witnesses have been nominated are vital to the effective and the efficient operation of the Department of Defense. Two of the positions—the DOD General Counsel and the DOD Inspector General—are direct advisors to the Secretary of Defense and to the Deputy Secretary of Defense, and they are the senior most civilian positions in the legal and oversight functions of the Department.

The DOD General Counsel is the chief legal advisor in the Defense Department and is involved in many of the most important and complex issues facing the Department of Defense in the Military Services. The Office of General Counsel handles a broad portfolio, including international law, real estate, environmental law, contracts, personnel law, ethics, and legislation. Mr. Preston is highly qualified for this position, having served previously as Principal Deputy General Counsel and as the Navy's General Counsel. Currently, he is the General Counsel at the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), a position he assumed following Senate confirmation in 2009.

The Department of Defense Inspector General is a senior independent agency official who provides oversight related to the programs and operations of the Department. The IG's mission is to promote integrity, accountability, and improvement of DOD personnel, programs, and operations to support the Department's mission and to serve the public interest. Mr. Rymer, a recently retired Army Reserve soldier, is currently the IG at the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC), and he's held that position since 2006. If confirmed as the DOD Inspector General, he'll be required to maintain his independence and exercise strong oversight of critical programs within the Department.

The two nominees for positions within the Department of the Navy will also, if confirmed, have important responsibility.

The Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller is responsible for managing the Navy's budget and for keeping the Navy on the path to an auditable financial statement. Ms. Rabern has a distinguished background. She served for 20 years in the U.S. Navy and has held the position of Chief Financial Officer at the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the U.S. Customs Service, and the U.S. Agency for International Development. She is currently the Director of the Virginia Military Institute Center for Leadership and Ethics.

The Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment is responsible for, among other things, enhancing energy security of the Navy and Marine Corps forces, construction and maintenance of installations, family housing, and environmental protection. These issues are critical to the readiness of our sailors and marines, and the welfare of their families. Retired Vice Admiral McGinn, having served 35 years in the Navy, has considerable experience with Navy programs and policies. Most recently, he has led the American Council on Renewable Energy.

Again, we welcome all of our nominees. We look forward to your testimony.

I'll now call on Senator Inhofe.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join you in welcoming, not just our friend John, but the whole panel.

Mr. Preston, you've been nominated to serve as General Counsel for the Department. The General Counsel serves as a chief legal officer in the Department. Therefore, I believe it's absolutely necessary to understand what your role was and what actions you took as the General Counsel of the CIA after the attack on our facility in Benghazi on September 11. In addition, if confirmed, you will provide a vital role in determining the future of Guantanamo Bay (GTMO). Therefore, gaining a better understanding of your thoughts on this matter will be important to this committee's consideration.

Finally, the General Counsel plays a significant role in the conduct of the Defense Department activities all around the world, including ongoing counterterrorism activities. As the threat from global terrorism continues to evolve, it's important that we have the strong legal foundations that provides our military with the tools necessary to keep the Nation safe.

Mr. Rymer, you have been nominated to serve as Inspector General of the Department. If confirmed, you will will step into an organization that has not had a confirmed Inspector General since December 2011. There's a lot of work to be done, especially in oversight of activities that will lead to financial audit readiness in the Department of Defense, in providing intelligence, oversight, and, in an area of particular importance to this committee, conducting senior official investigations. The Department urgently needs an Inspector General who can lead this important role to promote the accountability and integrity.

Vice Admiral McGinn, after a distinguished 35-year career in the Navy, you've been nominated to serve as the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment. I note that, since 2011, you've been the President of the American Council on Renewable Energy, which is no surprise to me, and you are no stranger to the lime light, having testified before Congress on the perils of the national security of human activity and climate change. We completely disagree on these issues, but, thankfully, implementing a national policy for climate change will not be one of your core responsibilities if you are confirmed. Instead, you'll be tasked with helping the Navy navigate a complex range of installation and environmental issues, as well as its fiscally responsible pursuit of the green fleet.

Additionally, I look forward to hearing your views on the relocation of marines in the Pacific theater. I just got back from there, and I see now, with sequestration, the really serious problems that we're having. Certainly, Senator Warner, you've been following this, too. The need to expand Marine Corps ranges and protect the sea ranges—most important, the devastating impact of sequestration on the Navy's ability to maintain shore facilities, depots, and shipyards. This is something that is very current. We have a problem that's looming. We'll have a chance to talk about during the course of this hearing.

Ms. Rabern, you've been nominated to serve as Assistant Secretary for the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller. The Navy, like all of our Military Services, is suffering greatly as a result of the drastic budget cuts and the prolonged fiscal uncertainty. Additionally, the inability of the Department and the Military Services to achieve full financial audit readiness is concerning to many of us in Congress.

I thank the very distinguished panel and look forward to your testimony.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Inhofe.

I think what we'll do is go a little bit out of order, here, to give Senator Warner an opportunity to introduce Admiral McGinn, because you may have to leave, Senator Warner, in which case you, obviously, are free to do so after your introduction, and then we will go back to the other end of the table after you introduce Admiral McGinn.

Again, a very warm welcome, John, and please proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN WARNER, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF VIRGINIA, RETIRED

Senator WARNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and the distinguished ranking member from Oklahoma.

It was a moving experience for me to come up here today and be in this room in the presence of two individuals that enabled me to achieve the career, such as I did, for 30 years in this body.

Senator Levin, you and I came together, and Senator Inhofe joined us shortly after that. Through our joint efforts, and, most importantly, through a trust and friendship we both had for each other, I was able to finish up and look back with a sense of pride and accomplishment. I thank you both, and the other members of this distinguished committee. I wish them well, particularly some of the new members. It's a great experience in life, and it's absolutely essential for this country.

I'll be very brief, Mr. Chairman, because the nominee is well known. But, before I proceed to the nominee, may I say, I studied, with great interest and care, all four of the resumes of these individuals. It's extraordinary to see generations who have done public service, go into the private sector, then willing to forego many of the benefits of private sector and return to serve their Nation and the public. Judging from my own experience, these four resumes constitute an extraordinary body of knowledge needed in these respective positions and needed by our country at a critical time.

I wish them each well, and specifically my good friend, Admiral Dennis McGinn. Again, the Navy's been an important part of my life for over a half century. I've known many persons in the Navy Department, having served as Secretary of the Navy for many years. But, this is an unusual individual.

We were put together in the context of organizations that were seeking to do public policy dissemination in a very nonpartisan way. The Center for Naval Analysis, where Admiral McGinn was vice chairman of the Military Advisory Board, that organization is an integral part of the old naval secretariat. It has grown into a much larger and more effective entity now, and just serving the public on issues of great importance, particularly those related to national security. Very able leadership, and the Admiral, I'd say, was the vice chairman of the Military Advisory Board. I was with the Pew Charitable Trust. Those two organizations collaborated to put on the road, years ago when I first left the Senate, a team to go out and just talk and listen to the general public, gather facts, and come back, promulgating no special message, except that key one related to the nexus, the linkage between national security, national defense, environment, and our global standing in this competitive economic world.

Particularly, our job was to visit military bases and go out and relate to the general public of the remarkable job being done by the men and women in uniform to address the questions of energy, how their own creativity, their own innovations, contributed; the feedback that they gave through their respective commands and centralized back in the Department of Defense. Its remarkable story as energy loomed on the horizon as such a vital part of our overall security, they were some of the leaders, and continue to be.

The Admiral and I gave many appearances together for town councils, universities, colleges, and all types of things, over a period of several years, and we got to know each other well.

I say to you, he is a true American story, from midshipman at the Academy, 30-plus years with the fleet and the sailors, and then Deputy Chief of Naval Operations. It's all in the record, but it's an extraordinary story of accomplishment of a professional in our national security system.

His hallmark, if I were to pick one out, is humility. Surprisingly, humility. Now, he's a naval aviator, and that is extraordinarily difficult for that particular class of individual, it has been my experience for them to be humble. But, he had it. He was in full afterburn, and, most of the time when we were speaking and I had to lean over gently, as you've done to me many times, both you, tapping me, "That's enough." [Laughter.]

But, I have coached him to be brief and to the point and to follow orders of the Commander in Chief and of the Secretary of the Navy, and he has pledged to do that, to me, and I'm certain he would do the same for you.

He's accompanied today by a very lovely Navy wife, and he will introduce her at an appropriate time.

With that, I once again thank this committee for its work, and wish you well, because these are troubled times for our country. But, it appears to me, with all due respect to the confirmation process, a very vital part of the function of the U.S. Senate, we have fine people. This country is greatly strengthened by the will of such people to step forward and do, time and time again, public service.

I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much. Before you leave, Senator Warner, one of the new members that you looked over to and referred to is Senator Kaine, who is, of course, a Virginian—a proud Virginian who brings a huge amount of background experience to this committee. I'm just wondering whether he might—and I know he does—want to say a word or two to you before you leave.

Let me recognize our new member from Virginia, Senator Kaine.

Senator WARNER. Thank you.

Senator KAINE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for letting the guy at the end of the aisle go a little bit out of order, here.

I want to thank my friend Senator Warner. As some of my colleagues know, my father-in-law and Senator Warner returned from being in the Navy in World War II in the Pacific, not serving together, but they returned together to be students and finish their college education at Washington and Lee University (W&L). The families have been close friends. My father-in-law, who turns 90 on the 21st of September, former Governor of Virginia, Linwood Holton, considers John Warner as one of his dearest friends. They ran against each other for the Senate in a Republican nominating contest in 1978, and this was the victor. But, my father-in-law has always so admired Senator Warner. There's no public official who's served Virginia in the last century who is as admired, by Virginians of all political persuasions, than Senator Warner. To be able to be a member of this committee, even in this junior role, and know that this Senator preceded me in fantastic service here, is a very humbling thing.

It is great to be with you, as always, Senator, and it's so nice that the chairman let me say those words.

Senator WARNER. I thank you very much, my good friend and colleague. Indeed, your father, former Governor of Virginia, is a dear and valued friend.

I wish to give you a little bit of hope. I once occupied that seat. [Laughter.]

Senator WARNER. Through the years, Senator Levin, who's over there, we merged together as these two great giants of Senators up there today.

Good luck to each and every one of you, and to the importance of the confirmation process.

I thank the chairman and the ranking member.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Senator.

Senator WARNER. I say to Dennis McGinn, you're on your own now. [Laughter.]

Chairman LEVIN. I quote Senator Warner with that farewell all the time, "You're on your own."

You're all on your own now, except your families are behind you, which means you're not at all on your own.

Let me start with you, Mr. Preston, and then we'll go in regular order.

STATEMENT OF HON. STEPHEN W. PRESTON, TO BE GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. PRESTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Senator Inhofe, members of the committee. It's a great honor for me to be here as the President's nominee to be General Counsel in the Department of Defense.

I wouldn't be doing this, but for the support of my family, with us here this morning. If I may, my wife, Mary, our daughter, Julia, and our son, Collett. I'm pleased and very proud to be able to introduce them to you this morning.

Let me also pause to express my appreciation to President Obama and Secretary Hagel for their confidence in me.

This is my third appearance before a committee of the U.S. Senate as a nominee seeking confirmation. I was examined by the Intelligence Committee, a little more than 4 years ago, in connection with my current appointment as General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency. Back in September 1998, I appeared before this honorable committee prior to my appointment as General Counsel of the Department of the Navy.

Now, I must say, I have found that the temptation to open with a lengthy statement diminishes dramatically from one of these hearings to the next, so I assure you, I'll be brief with my opening. [Laughter.]

Much has changed in the world and at DOD since I first came before this committee, almost 15 years ago. That was before September 11. It was even before the attack on USS Cole. Much has changed, but much remains the same, in terms of the role of a general counsel and what I will pledge to you, if confirmed.

If confirmed, I will pledge my continued personal commitment to the rule of law, and will work to ensure that the Department remains in full compliance with all applicable law. I will also pledge always to keep in mind the importance of the mission—protecting our country from threats to the national security—and will work to help find lawful paths to achieve mission objectives. Following the Secretary's lead, I will pledge my best efforts to ensure that the Armed Services Committees are kept properly informed, in furtherance of their critical oversight responsibilities. Finally and most important, as General Counsel, I will pledge to serve the people who serve people who serve us, the fine men and women of the U.S. Armed Forces.

I want to thank you again for this opportunity to be heard. I look forward to your questions.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Mr. Preston.

Mr. Rymer.

STATEMENT OF HON. JON T. RYMER, TO BE INSPECTOR GENERAL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. RYMER. Chairman Levin, Ranking Member Inhofe, distinguished members of the committee, I'm honored to appear before you today as President Obama's nominee to serve as the Inspector General of the Department of Defense. I would like to thank the President and Secretary Hagel for their expression of confidence in me.

On a personal note, I want to offer my heartfelt thanks to my wife, Deb, and my son, Thomson, who are both with me here today, for their commitment and support during my career.

Mr. Chairman, I'm humbled by the magnitude of this position and the challenges it presents. If confirmed, I'm committed to ensuring efficient, effective, transparent, and independent oversight of this dynamic Department.

The Inspector General Act of 1978, as amended, requires the Inspector General to supervise and coordinate audit and investigation activities; to promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness in agency operations; and to prevent and detect fraud in agency programs. The IG Act also requires the Inspector General to keep both Congress and the Secretary informed of problems and deficiencies in the Department. At the Department of Defense, these responsibilities take on an even greater importance, as they relate to the safety and security of the brave men and women who serve our country.

If confirmed, I believe my background and experience will serve me well as the DOD IG. First of all, I'm mindful of the important role that an IG plays in the Federal Government, having served 7 years at the FDIC as the Inspector General and for a 9-month concurrent period as the interim Inspector General at the Securities and Exchange Commission. I've been an active member of the IG community, serving as the chair of the Council of Inspectors General on Integrity and Efficiency (CIGIE) Audit Committee and a member of the CIGIE Executive Council since 2008. I've also represented the community on several audit standards-setting bodies.

Second, given my 30-plus years of Active and Reserve service in the U.S. Army, I have a profound respect for the members of the military. Having retired from military service last month, it would be an honor for me to continue to serve with our troops, albeit in a different capacity, as the IG.

Finally, my private-sector experience includes over 20 years as a banker, a management consultant, and internal auditor. If confirmed, I will capitalize on my past experiences and commit to providing the strong leadership needed to manage this important office.

I look forward to working with Congress, Secretary Hagel, and the Department's leadership to provide independent, relevant, and timely oversight that is critical to supporting the warfighter and promoting accountability, integrity, and efficiency. I also look forward to working with Principal Deputy Inspector General Lynne Halbrooks and the nearly 1,600 employees who are committed to fulfilling the responsibilities of the IG Act at the Department of Defense. Finally, I welcome the opportunity to work with my counterparts in the Department oversight community.

Mr. Chairman, thank you and members of the committee for your time and for your attention and for allowing me to appear here today.

This concludes my prepared statement. I'll be happy to respond to your questions.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Mr. Rymer.

Dr. Rabern.

STATEMENT OF MS. SUSAN J. RABERN, TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY FOR FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND COMPTROLLER

Dr. RABERN. Mr. Chairman, Senator Inhofe, distinguished members of the committee, I'm honored to have the privilege of appearing before you today as the President's nominee for your consideration to be the next Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller.

The Navy has been an important part of my life since I was a small child, growing up in the wheat fields of Kansas, listening to my father's stories of his service during World War II.

I would like to express my deep appreciation to Secretary Mabus for his confidence in me. My husband, David, can't be here today because of preexisting commitments at work, but I am forever indebted to him for his unfailing and steadfast support. My daughters, Stacy, Allison, and Megan, have made many sacrifices throughout their lives because of my career. I want to formally recognize and thank them for their love, support, and enthusiasm, even though they can't be with us today.

Government service in any capacity, but especially during these difficult times, is an enormous responsibility. The responsibilities of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Financial Management and Comptroller, are especially significant. I'm aware of the daunting challenges associated with financial operations and financial management in the Department.

I have been honored to serve in the U.S. Navy, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the former U.S. Customs Service, and the U.S. Agency for International Development in financial management positions. In each position, I have been grounded in a daily recognition that my stewardship over resources and people is rooted in the public trust. I believe there is no greater responsibility.

If confirmed, I will work within the Department and with the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) to ensure that the Department of Navy is properly and efficiently resourced. I will strive to ensure that we're taking care of our most precious resource: our sailors, marines, and the civilians who support them. I will work as hard as I can to ensure they have the platforms, equipment, tools, and training they need to guarantee their ability to perform their vital role in our Nation's security, and that it is never in doubt. I will ensure that we develop and execute balanced budgets that are the result of thorough and timely analysis and in support of the goals and initiatives that Secretary Mabus has established for the Department.

I am deeply honored to have been nominated for this position. If confirmed, I pledge to you that I will do my best to serve the Nation and the men and women of the Department of the Navy to the utmost of my ability.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Dr. Rabern.

Admiral McGinn.

STATEMENT OF MR. DENNIS V. MCGINN, TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY FOR ENERGY, INSTALLATIONS, AND ENVIRONMENT

Admiral MCGINN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Inhofe, and distinguished members of the committee. It is a privilege for me to appear before you today, and I am deeply honored to be nominated by President Obama as Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment. I'm thankful for the support of Secretary Hagel and Secretary Mabus.

I am especially grateful to Senator John Warner for being here today with a strong vote of confidence and his unfailing wise counsel. He exemplifies the ideal of service to nation, and, throughout his many decades of that service, has consistently defined what it means to be a true statesman. I am humbled by his generous support.

On a personal note, I am most grateful for the love and unwavering support of my wonderful wife, Kelly, who is with me today, and for the support of our four children, three grandchildren, and that of our entire extended family. They are the very center of my life and happiness. Thoughts about their future security and well-being, and that of all Americans, are why I seek the opportunity to continue to serve our Nation.

Having proudly worn the uniform of our Navy for more than 35 years in peace and war, I am keenly aware of the momentous challenges facing the Department of the Navy—indeed, facing all of our Military Services—during these times of great change. Among these are the need to maintain high mission readiness in an uncertain world, to build future capabilities in an environment of reduced budgetary resources, and, most importantly, to care for our sailors and marines, and their families.

If confirmed, I'll look forward to leading a highly talented, dedicated, and hardworking team in our military and civilian workforce to ensure that the mission of the Department of the Navy is well served and supported. I pledge to wisely apply available resources to increase the availability and efficient use of all of our energy sources, to maintain our installations and training ranges in a high state of readiness, to preserve a high quality of life for our sailors, marines, and their families, to fully meet our obligation as good stewards of the environment, and to enhance safety in every aspect of our overall mission.

If confirmed, I pledge to carry out the policies and directives of the President, Congress, the Secretary of Defense, and the Secretary of the Navy. My day-in and day-out priorities will be driven by the unwavering goal of fully supporting the combat effectiveness and operational efficiency of our Navy and Marine Corps team. In developing and applying these priorities, I look forward to working closely with Congress and with this committee.

Thank you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you so much, Admiral.

Now let me ask you all the standard questions which we ask of all our nominees. In order to exercise our legislative and oversight responsibilities, these are the questions that we ask.

Have you all adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

[All four witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

[All four witnesses answered in the negative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Will you ensure that your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

[All four witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

[All four witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

[All four witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify, upon request, before this committee?

[All four witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Finally, do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly-constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good-faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

[All four witnesses answered in the affirmative.]

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Okay, let's try a 8-minute round this morning for our first round, and, if we need a second round, we'll do that.

Mr. Preston, we have approved a fiscal year 2014 authorization bill in committee. It's not yet gone to the floor, but in committee. We included a number of changes to the procedures for transfers of detainees from Guantanamo.

We would provide greater flexibility to the Secretary of Defense to transfer Guantanamo detainees to foreign countries, if the Secretary determines doing so is in our national security interest and that steps have been, or will be, taken to substantially mitigate any risk of the transferred individual reengaging in terrorist activity.

Our provision would also give the Secretary of Defense authority to allow the transfer of Guantanamo detainees to the United States for detention and for trial, if determined to be in the U.S. national interest and if it can be done safely.

We would allow the temporary transfer of Guantanamo detainees to a DOD medical facility to prevent death or significant imminent harm.

Mr. Preston, are you familiar with these provisions? If so, what are your views on increasing the flexibility of the Department of Defense and the administration in handling detainees at Guantanamo?

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Chairman, I will have to admit I'm a bit more familiar with the existing law, section 1028. I am aware of the legislative provision to which you're referring. As my current responsibilities don't include direct responsibility for detainee operations and the transfer process, I'm not as intimately familiar with it as perhaps others are.

Certainly, the policy of the administration is to favor transferring these detainees, and I support the administration's policy. I think a critical element of the existing law and of proposed legislation would be to facilitate transfer in a fashion that ensures the protection of the national security.

I'm afraid, beyond that, I don't have developed views, or sufficiently informed, to comment on the legislative proposal.

Chairman LEVIN. All right, thank you.

Mr. Preston, during the hearing on your nomination to be the CIA General Counsel, you were asked about so-called "enhanced interrogation techniques," and specifically whether you believed waterboarding was torture. I'd like to ask you that question here, in connection with your nomination to be the DOD General Counsel. Do you believe that waterboarding is torture?

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe, under current law, waterboarding is torture. I will say that, in the course of my duties, by virtue of the cessation of the program by executive order in 2009, I have not had occasion to independently examine that question with reference to CIA activities since January 2009. But, I believe that the state of the law is clear. In addition to the President, the Attorney General, the Nation's chief legal officer, has determined that waterboarding is torture. That's the law, in my view. I support the President's decision to ban waterboarding and the other so-called "enhanced interrogation techniques".

If I might add, though, at the time that the waterboard was used in connection with the former Detention and Interrogation Program, my understanding is that CIA personnel relied on what was the authoritative statement of the law at the time, the opinions issued by the Department of Justice. Of course, those opinions have since been disavowed and withdrawn.

Chairman LEVIN. The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI) has completed a report on the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program. Recently, the CIA provided a written response to the Intelligence Committee's report. As the CIA General Counsel, were you involved in the preparation of the agency's response?

Mr. PRESTON. I did have some involvement. I did not direct the effort.

Chairman LEVIN. Are there any portions of that response that you disagreed with?

Mr. PRESTON. Sir, I think the agency's comments are an appropriate response to the SSCI report. For my part, I don't believe there's anything legally objectionable. That's the determination I need to make.

I must say, I have to rely on those with far greater familiarity with the report and the record when it comes to facts and findings. But, I accept the conclusions and support the recommendations, and I support the Director's decision to forward these comments to the committee. Frankly, it's my hope that they will be useful to the committee as it continues to consider the matter.

Chairman LEVIN. For the record, there are some significant differences between many members of the committee and that response, and it's very possible that there's going to be some additional questions for you about your awareness of the response and your agreement or disagreement with certain statements that are in that response. But, we'll save that for the record.

Mr. PRESTON. Very well.

Chairman LEVIN. There's been considerable discussion inside and outside Congress about the scope of detention authority pursuant to the authorization for the use of military force, particularly as it pertains to U.S. citizens. In your view, if a U.S. citizen joins a foreign army, a foreign military force, and is captured while engaged in combat against our forces, do we have the authority, under the Law of Armed Conflict, to hold that person in military custody?

Mr. PRESTON. In terms of the availability of indefinite Law of War detention for a U.S. citizen captured on U.S. soil, I believe that the law is unsettled, but the President has made clear that it is not his intent to authorize any such Law of War detention for U.S. citizens captured on U.S. soil.

Chairman LEVIN. If that citizen is involved with a foreign army in attacking say, a U.S. Navy base, is that person detainable under the Law of War?

Mr. PRESTON. Ordinarily, an enemy combatant is, but I understand that this has been the subject of litigation and that the issue hasn't been resolved by the courts.

Chairman LEVIN. If an American citizen is captured in combat, having joined a foreign army outside of the United States, under the Law of War, may he or she be detained?

Mr. PRESTON. Again, I believe, as an enemy combatant, he or she could. I, frankly, don't know whether there's remaining doubt, in terms of litigation of that issue.

Chairman LEVIN. What is your understanding of what constitutes an "associated force" that is subject to the use of military force under the 2001 authorization? I'll ask two questions, here; it'll be my last one—what is your opinion about the impact of the end of combat operations in Afghanistan on the application of the authorization for the use of force to al Qaeda and its associates elsewhere than Afghanistan?

Mr. PRESTON. I'd be happy to answer both of those, sir, starting with the first.

Of course, the language of the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF) refers to groups and individuals responsible for the September 11 attacks and those who harbored them. As you well know, that has obviously been applied to al Qaeda and the Taliban and interpreted also to reach associated forces.

My understanding of the concept of associated forces is that it is quite narrow. It has been described as requiring an organized armed group that has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda and as a cobelligerent with al Qaeda in hostilities against the United States and its coalition partners. It's not any group that is ideologically aligned with al Qaeda. It would not be any group that poses a threat to the United States without having joined the fight with al Qaeda. But, it does reach groups that have joined the fight with al Qaeda and against the United States.

Chairman LEVIN. Wherever they may be.

Mr. PRESTON. I believe that is correct.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator Inhofe.

Mr. PRESTON. Would you like me to answer your second question?

Chairman LEVIN. Please. Yes, if you could do it briefly.

Mr. PRESTON. Just only to—I'm sorry, Senator—only to say that the end of the U.S. combat role in Afghanistan will not necessarily mark the defeat of al Qaeda and the end of the conflict with al Qaeda. It may well, I think, drive additional attention to the state of the conflict. But, the withdrawal of forces from Afghanistan does not in any per-se way mark the end of the conflict.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

When Admiral McGinn made his opening statement, I was reminded of something. While Senator Warner is still here, I'll repeat it.

I'm impressed with your children and grandchildren. However, I have 20 children and grandchildren. [Laughter.]

Admiral MCGINN. I'll work on it, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. You have some time, before you're my age.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. I can remember, I'd always take pictures—candid pictures, and we had a Christmas card that would come out every year. Senator Warner, over there, said, "You know, you're the only one who sends a card out where you have 22 members of the family, and not any 2 are looking the same direction." [Laughter.]

You don't want to make that mistake.

Let me share with you, Mr. Preston, my feeling. During the Benghazi incident, I was very much concerned about that. Chris Stevens, the Ambassador who was killed, was a friend of mine, was in my office a very short period of time before that happened. He talked about the threats that were there, the dangers in that general area. During the time that the September 11 attack took place, I don't think anyone is really certain as to whether that was an organized terrorist attack. However, when the Annex, that was the next morning, took place, Mr. Clapper, who was, at that time, the Director of National Intelligence, made the statement. He used the word "unequivocal". It was unequivocal—this is the morning after September 11, during the Annex attack—that it was committed by organized terrorists at that time. After we had hearings, in this room, with many other members, I asked the same question to other individuals. They all agreed.

Now, I think one of the reasons was the equipment that was used, the six mortar rounds and all of that; it became very convincing. Anyway, these individuals all said that it was unequivocal that it was an organized attack.

The first question I'd ask you is: What was your position during September 11, at that time?

Mr. PRESTON. Of last year, sir?

Senator INHOFE. Yes.

Mr. PRESTON. I was General Counsel at CIA.

Senator INHOFE. All right. What was your role in the Benghazi matter?

Mr. PRESTON. Sir, first, let me just mention what first comes to mind when you raise Benghazi, and that is that it was a terrible tragedy for our country. We lost four good Americans.

My role in the aftermath of Benghazi was extremely limited. I had——

Senator INHOFE. Okay, I'm really sorry to cut you off. I have to do it, because of the time constraints.

Mr. PRESTON. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. I think I know the answer to this question. Did you compose, edit, or modify, in any way, the talking-points information which were used by Ambassador Rice and the White House?

Mr. PRESTON. No, sir.

Senator INHOFE. I didn't think you did.

But, nonetheless, I look at this, and I know that this sounds like an extreme position, but I'm familiar with coverups in the history of this country—and I'm talking about the Pentagon papers, Iran-Contra, Watergate, and all of that—I just can't think of one that is more egregious than this. Because 5 days before she was sent to the American people, on that Sunday, all of the intelligence people that we have talked to before that knew, at the time, that it was an organized terrorist attack and not an attack that had anything to do with the video.

I say this because we have to keep talking about this. It's something that everyone's hoping will go away, and it's not going to go away.

The question I would have, you've already answered to my satisfaction, in terms of your role or your lack of role.

Now, on GTMO, the Chairman had several questions. I, again, have what is considered by some to be a pretty extreme position on GTMO. For one thing, it's one of of the few good deals that we have in the Government. I think we pay $4,000 a year, and Castro doesn't collect, about half the time. The facility down there, it's hard to go down and see what we have and ask the question, why is it we're not using that? What is this aversion to keeping people down there that this administration has?

Now, I bring this up because, obviously, you will be dealing with this. I have statements that you've made, on military commissions. You said, "Military commissions are an appropriate forum for trying offenses against the law and order. Military commissions provide appropriate processes for the trial of alien underprivileged enemy belligerents." And "I am not aware of any need for changes to the 2009 Military Commissions Act."

Now, these are statements that you've made in the past. Do you agree with these statements today?

Mr. PRESTON. I do.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. I do, too.

I'm not a lawyer, so I feel a little insecure talking about this in a lot of detail to someone who is, and who is a professional. But, I do know what an expeditionary legal complex is. I've been through this down there, and I've seen the advantages that we have there. I also recall that, 4 years ago, when this President—it may have been, actually, before he took office—talked about the fact that we need to transfer these people to the United States, one of the suggested locations happened to be in my State of Oklahoma. It was in Fort Sill. I went down and I talked to a Sergeant Major down there by the name of Jackson, and she said, "What is wrong with the people in Washington?" She had had two or three deployments to GTMO and said, "We have the ideal situation there." Other than the fact that the terrorists and many people who are our enemies think that this is something that we should not keep open, can you think of any reason why we're not using that today to its fullest capacity for detention and for trials?

Mr. PRESTON. Sir, I think you make a good point in what has been a ongoing and, I think, at times, intense policy debate. For my part, if I'm confirmed, it'll be my duty and honor and burden to see to the proper application of the law as it relates to detainee operations and as it relates to the military commissions process.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. I do want to follow up with you in some detail, as time goes by, and reconsider some of the decisions that have been made, in private conversations.

Mr. PRESTON. I would welcome that.

Senator INHOFE. Admiral McGinn, you and I were together and fought the unsuccessful Battle of Vieques some 12 years ago.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. I can recall, at that time, the entire Navy was very helpful to me. We had Vieques, a place that we could use for joint training. The Marine Corps—you remember this, John—the Marines and the Navy were—and because there was one—an unfortunate thing that took place, and a lot of the environmentalists said, "No, we can't use this." I can remember going over to Puerto Rico and saying, "If you guys insist on closing this thing down, it's going to have an economic effect on Puerto Rico, on Roosevelt Roads, and all of these things."

Anyway, you were on my side on that. As I recall, we went to San Clemente, and you were with me at that time—maybe some other places. But, I also went all the way around the world, trying to find a place—we couldn't find a place that could replicate that type of training. I appreciate that.

I bring this up for two reasons. One is an issue that's taking place right now at Twentynine Palms. I know that perhaps if I were from California, I might have different feelings about this—no, I doubt if I would, because that's a facility that our marines use that I don't think we can replicate anyplace else. Can you tell me any justification for not taking the option—and we know the three options that are out there; you're familiar with these?

Admiral MCGINN. Right.

Senator INHOFE. Of expanding that area and the capability of our Navy to train there?

Admiral MCGINN. Based on my knowledge of Twentynine Palms and my experience, having fired rockets and dropped bombs on Twentynine Palms when I was getting ready for combat, I recognize the critical need to do live-fire training and to train like you fight. That is what the marines want to do, and that's why we need to expand the training range at Twentynine Palms——

Senator INHOFE. Okay. Okay, and I agree with that. I know my time has expired. Just one last thing.

An area where we don't agree is in the use of a lot of our funds, that would otherwise be used for readiness and for defense purposes, for biofuels, and these other things. We'll have a chance to talk about this in the future, and we have in the past.

Admiral MCGINN. I look forward to it, Senator.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, sir.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

Senator Udall.

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Good morning. Thank you all for your willingness to serve.

I'd like to start off, this morning, by saying I can think of no better nominee for the position of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment than Admiral McGinn.

Admiral, you've served 35 years in uniform, and you've been a steadfast advocate for our sailors, and you've been leader on the national security issues, writ large, and you've earned my deepest respect, and I think everybody's on the committee. I'm not alone in that regard, and I have a letter from the Center for Naval Analyses (CNA) Military Advisory Board, an organization which consists of some of our finest retired three- and four-star admirals and generals, Mr. Chairman, and they've written to the committee in strong support of the Vice Admiral's nomination, and I agree with them completely. I'd like to submit the letter for the record, if I might.

Chairman LEVIN. Admitted. It will be made part of the record.

[The information referred to follows:]

Members

Admiral Steve Abbot
USN (Ret.)
Admiral Frank "Skip" Bowman
USN (Ret.)
General Charles Boyd
USAF (Ret.)
General Michael P. Carns
USAF (Ret.)
General James Conoway
USMC (Ret.)
Lt. General Ken Eickmann
USAF (Ret.)
Lt. General Larry Farrell
USAF (Ret.)
Major General Russell Fuhrman
USA (Ret)
General Don Hoffman
USAF, (Ret.)
Vice Admiral Paul Gaffney
USN (Ret.)
Brig. General Gerald E Galloway
USA (Ret.)
Vice Admiral Lee Gunn
USN (Ret.)
General Paul Kern
USA (Ret.)
General Ron Keys
USAF(Ret.)
Admiral T. Joseph Lopez
USN (Ret.)
General Robert Magnus
USMC (Ret.)
Vice Admiral Dennis McGinn
USN (Ret.)
Rear Admiral Neil Morisetti
UK Royal Navy (Ret.)
Admiral John Nathman
USN (Ret.)
Rear Admiral David Oliver
USN (Ret.)
Admiral Joseph Prueher
USN (Ret.)
Vice Admiral Ann Rondeau
USN, (Ret.)
Vice Admiral Roger Rufe
USCG (Ret.)
Lt. General Keith Stalder
USMC, (Ret.)
General Gordon Sullivan
USA (Ret.)
Vice Admiral Richard Truly
USN (Ret.)
Lt. General Clyde A. Vaughn
USA (Ret.)
General Charles F. "Chuck" Wald
USAF (Ret.)
Lt. General Richard Zilmer
USMC (Ret.)
General Tony Zinni
USMC (Ret.)

CNA Military Advisory Board
4825 Mark Center Drive • Alexandria, Virginia 22311-1850 • 703 824 2000

July 23, 2013

The Honorable Carl Levin
Chairman
Senate Armed Services Committee
Washington, DC 20510

The Honorable James Inhofe
Ranking Member
Senate Armed Services Committee
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Chairman Levin and Ranking Member Inhofe:

We write to provide the support of CNA's Military Advisory Board (MAB) for the appointment of Vice Admiral Dennis McGinn, USN (Ret.) to the position of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment. As a stalwart member of CNA's MAB since 2008, VADM McGinn has demonstrated a keen understanding of the nexus between energy, the environment, and national security and an even more impressive ability to articulate the significance of this nexus to elected officials, military leaders, and the public. If confirmed, these abilities will serve him well as Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment.

Serving as Vice Chairman of CNA's MAB for the past five years, VADM McGinn has been a mainstay of the board. He has demonstrated strong leadership and a unique ability to build consensus across a group of senior military executives with strongly held, but sometimes differing, views. He has contributed his superior knowledge and experience in energy and national security to several of CNA MAB publications in these areas. He has participated in outreach events with Members of Congress and staff, throughout Washington, DC, and across the country, speaking to countless military leaders, policy makers, and the public on the importance of secure energy, energy's impact on the world's changing environment and the implications of energy to national security. In all of these events, his ability to see past politics and to focus on what is in the best interest of the nation has made him a truly matchless and a prized member of the MAB.

For more than 33 years, VADM McGinn served the nation as a naval officer. Upon retirement, he continued to serve the interest of our national security by focusing his efforts on ensuring the United States has a secure, sustainable energy supply. He is practiced, polished, and well-positioned to bring this experience and leadership back to the Navy as Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment.

Sincerely,

Sherri Goodman
Executive Director,
CNA Military Advisory Board
Former Deputy Undersecretary of Defense (Environmental Security)
Senior Vice President and General Counsel, CNA

General Paul Kern, USA(Ret.)
Chairman
CNA's Military Advisory Board
Former US Army Material Command

Senator UDALL. Thank you for that.

Again, Admiral, I look forward to working with you, as does the committee, when you're confirmed.

If I could, I'd like to direct my questions to Mr. Preston, to start. In your current role as General Counsel for the Central Intelligence Agency, you've been at the table when some important decisions have been made. I sit on both this committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence, and I have some concerns that I would like you to consider addressing.

In your prehearing questions for your 2009 nomination hearing to be the CIA General Counsel, you said the following, referring to the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) and the CIA's Office of General Counsel (OGC), and I'll quote back to you what you said. "Where OLC's analysis will depend heavily on factual circumstances, as represented by the Agency, it is important that the OGC ensure that the information provided is as complete and accurate and current as possible. I am not aware of any material deficiencies in this regard, but wish to underscore the importance."

Do you still agree with this view? What do you believe a General Counsel's responsibility is if he discovers that his Department or Agency provided inaccurate information? If the resulting OLC opinion, based on inaccurate information, became public, do you see a need to correct the public record?

Mr. PRESTON. Senator Udall, I think this is a very important question. I believe that the description of the responsibility, from my earlier question from 2009, would still pertain. If anything, I have a much richer understanding and appreciation for the importance of the communication between Agency counsel and OLC. My own experience has been, particularly for the most sensitive matters at the Agency, to have near-continuous communication and one that's characterized by ensuring that the factual basis that my colleagues at OLC need in order to best inform and advise decisionmaking and their own opinions is provided.

I think one of the things that the Agency has focused on in recent years is an effort, not only to practice that, but to try to institutionalize it in some fashion, with respect to our most sensitive programs, to make sure that there is a purposeful effort to ensure that opinions that we may be relying on, that the factual basis for that opinion has not materially changed.

Senator UDALL. This is a very important topic, as you know and you've referenced. I may want to follow up with some additional questions for the record, but I appreciate your initial comments.

Let me turn to the difference between covert action and secret military operations. As I mentioned, I sit on this committee, I sit on the Intelligence Committee, as well, and I wanted to run through a series of questions and then ask you to respond to them all at once. Let me start here.

In your view, when does a secret military operation meet the statutory definition of "covert action" and require a finding, and when does it not?

My second question: If the military refuses to answer the public's questions about a reported operation, does it become a covert action? If not, what is the basis for that denial? As an example, why are unacknowledged 1208 assistance programs not covert action?

Finally, in this easy set of questions for you——[Laughter]

Finally, under what circumstances can a secret military program, as distinct from a particular tactical operation, be briefed only to the chairman and ranking member?

I know that's a big list of questions. I'm happy to restate them, if necessary, but I'd like to hear your answers.

Mr. PRESTON. Let me start with the first question, and at a general level.

What makes, I think, an action a covert action is laid out in the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, where action is taken for the purposes of influencing certain conditions abroad and done in a fashion where the role of the U.S. Government is neither apparent nor acknowledged. Of course, with respect to covert action, it's done pursuant to a finding, and that's, historically, in an area in which the CIA operates. I'm perhaps most familiar with the application of those concepts to operations pursuant to finding, at least the historical practices there.

Your questions raise, I think, an important issue about secretive or clandestine military operations and the extent to which they are neither apparent nor attributed to the Government and would properly be under covert action authorities. As I'm sure you know, that same provision of the National Security Act does accept traditional military activities, and there's quite a bit of law and lore that has gone into, as I understand, what we consider traditional military activities as an exception to covert action and the requirement of proceeding under those authorities.

This is an issue I'm obviously familiar with in my current position, but I haven't, to tell you the truth, really wrestled with how one would advise the U.S. military on the precise parameters of that concept and the precise concept of attribution in the military context. This is an area that I would expect to focus on early and intensely, if I have the privilege of being confirmed.

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Mr. Preston. What I think I'll do is review your responses, and, if necessary, submit some additional questions to you for the record.

Mr. PRESTON. Thank you.

Senator UDALL. In the remaining time I have, I want to turn to Admiral McGinn and just give him an opportunity to talk about what would be your top priority as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

As the title implies, it involves energy, installations, and environment. Not in the title, but part of the responsibilities are safety for operations afloat and ashore. I want to make sure that the Navy meets near-term warfighting readiness goals. We have a very fine group of men and women in the Navy and Marine Corps that are out there on the tip of the spear, as we say, and we have to make sure that they are well supported, and those following them are fully ready to go out there and relieve them. That's job one, that is the lens through which I want to look at all of those areas of responsibility.

We also have an obligation, I believe, to look to the future, to try to create strategic and operational options for our forces. This has been the primary focus area of Secretary Mabus in establishing his energy goals. I intend to look at that whole program intently to make sure that we are making the right investments to balance the compelling needs of near-term readiness with the compelling needs of looking over at the strategic environment of the future and making sure that we have the capability to fight the way we'll need to.

Senator UDALL. Thank you, Admiral.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Udall.

Senator Donnelly.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank all of you for your service to the Nation, and to your families, for everything you have done for our country.

Mr. Rymer, I would just like to ask you about a recent DOD IG audit of sexual assault cases, it discovered that more than 10 percent of the cases contain flawed investigations. Are you concerned about that error rate? How do you think you'd change that, moving forward?

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir, I am very concerned about it. I think the issues concerning sexual assault are certainly something the IG has to pay more attention to than perhaps the office has in the past. That particular report was completed pursuant to the IG's responsibility to provide oversight over the military criminal investigative organizations. That's the Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID), Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS), and the Air Force Office of Special Investigations (OSI).

My concern is that 10 percent is a high number. Perhaps more concerning, though, is the variations in process and procedure used among the different Services to investigate sexual assault crimes. I think the role of the IG is to encourage consistency and identification of best practices, and that's something I would try to do very strongly with those organizations.

Senator DONNELLY. Yes, I was just going to follow up with the best-practices point that you just made. Do you intend to look and say, "This is working, this is producing the best-quality information we could possibly have, the best, most accurate information," and share it with each of the different branches?

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir. I think that report—which is a lengthy report—contains a lot of statistics and a lot of information that could help identify, coach, and counsel, which of those investigative techniques may be the best. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELLY. Thank you very much.

Vice Admiral McGinn, in Indiana, our Active military base is Crane Naval Warfare Center. One of the things that we do at Crane is, it is shared with the Army ammunition activity, and it is shared in order to maintain the infrastructure, reduce costs by sharing costs, such as roads, power, distribution, security, et cetera. I was wondering what your thoughts are on joint basing as a means to mitigate costs for the Navy.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir. I think, where it makes sense, Senator, we need to look at joint basing. I have visited Crane several times during my time on Active Duty, and even since then, and it is a national asset. The work that goes on there—in addition to being a weapons storage and processing area, they are what I would describe as a world-class battery forensics facility, there's direct support for our Navy SEALs and their technology needs. I would view any future organization of Crane with the criteria of the ability to not detract from the key missions that are being undertaken on a daily basis by the folks at Crane.

Senator DONNELLY. We look forward to your confirmation. Once you are confirmed, we would like to invite you back. A time that might be ideal is—Indiana University is playing Navy in football, in Bloomington just about 15 miles away, on September 7.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELLY. The Friday before, I assume everyone will be busy at work at Crane——

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir. My only response would be, "Go Navy". [Laughter.]

Senator DONNELLY. I thought it would be.

Mr. Rymer, again, one of the things that this whole panel has been working on, but that I have passionately tried to dig into, has been suicide prevention for our military. We have programs in place. I was wondering what oversight you intend to provide on the suicide prevention programs we have in place.

Mr. RYMER. Sir, that is certainly something that I have added to the list of priorities, if confirmed. It's a very important issue for me. Having experience with that in the military, I'm very familiar with the programs, at least that the Army has in place, for suicide prevention. I think the role of the IG, perhaps, could be to do an evaluation of the effectiveness of the programs, and the money spent in each of the Services, to compare those. There is some oversight role, in terms of program effectiveness.

Senator DONNELLY. I know you know this statistic, but we lost more servicemembers to suicide last year than we did in combat.

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir. It's a national tragedy. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELLY. Mr. Preston, in regards to looking forward and what we're dealing with in Syria at the present time, and we see the al Nusra Front, which certainly has not gotten weaker, may be picking up strength. I was wondering your views in regards to the AUMF and its application to al Nusra, do they directly affect the United States, or do you think that the AUMF applies to al Nusra Front in Syria?

Mr. PRESTON. Senator, let me refrain from revealing any current discussions on that score.

Senator DONNELLY. Understood.

Mr. PRESTON. I think the question would be whether al Nusra is al Qaeda or is an associated force within the confines of how that term has been applied. That is a judgment that DOD would make internally. I haven't previously participated in that judgment, so I'm ill-equipped to provide a personal view. But, again, I expect this is an area that I would be focusing on, early and intensely.

Senator DONNELLY. I appreciate that. The committee itself is very focused on the Syrian issue and the challenges we face there, and we look forward to your participation.

To all of you, thank you very much for your service to the country. We look forward to continuing to work with you in the years ahead.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Senator Blumenthal.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to begin by joining my colleague, Senator Donnelly, in thanking you for your service. A number of you have records of military service, and appreciate the sacrifices that you've made, all of you, in the course of your public service.

You will have positions that may not make you household names. We frequently confirm people here, who are in the headlines, but your jobs are as important as any to our national security and national defense, and you know and we know that we couldn't do the job that we do in the farflung places of the world without the support that you give them, day-in and day-out. That goes for the many hardworking people who will be under you, under your command, as well as your colleagues in the Pentagon and throughout this country in our national defense. In thanking you, I thank them, and I think my views are shared widely.

Mr. Preston, to begin with an area that I think is very important to all of our men and women in uniform, the issue of sexual assault in the military, you were asked, in the questions that were submitted to you about this subject, and particularly about taking the decisionmaking authority in beginning prosecutions—the charging authority or convening authority—out of the chain of command and having it go to a specially-trained and independent prosecutor. Can you give me your view, as an attorney and as one who may not have been a prosecutor, but certainly is familiar with the skills and training and expertise that's required—wouldn't it make sense to have these decisions made by an individual who has a wealth of experience, who's tried cases, who knows what the evidence is going to be and has to be, and knows what the evidentiary issues are? Doesn't that make sense to you, as an attorney?

Mr. PRESTON. Let me say that I appreciate the salutary intent behind the idea. I have to say that I'm not sufficiently informed on the various legislative proposals to have formed a fixed personal view on it. I think the concern that has been expressed about that relates to the role of the military justice system as an integral part of the command structure. There's a reason for that, because the military justice system is one of the instruments by which command maintains military discipline——

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I understand that point where you know a lot about the Uniformed Code of Military Justice, I am certain, and I know that you don't have a fixed personal view.

Mr. PRESTON. Yes.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Maybe you have a flexible personal view. But, I'm really asking about a more abstract question. I know that one of the arguments against taking it out of the chain of command is the good order and discipline of the military unit, and the cohesion of the military unit. I respect that argument. But, simply as an attorney, as the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, wouldn't you value the experience of a trained prosecutor in making these decisions?

Mr. PRESTON. I think that experience would be valuable, either in the decisionmaker or in someone who is advising the decisionmaker. I think you're right that that experience base would have value.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I'd like you to examine these issues, and perhaps supplement your response that you've given, which is, "I am not now in a position to express a personal view," much as you've just said right now, and perhaps articulate, in a little bit more detail, what your views would be on the proposals that are pending before Congress and that are likely to be considered when the National Defense Authorization Bill reaches the floor. I would appreciate that.

Mr. PRESTON. I'd be happy to take a crack at that. I know this is a complex issue, and an incredibly important one. What I hesitate to do is to express, as an informed, fixed view, something that I haven't had, really, an opportunity to formulate. But, I would be happy to try to be as responsive as possible.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Thank you.

[The information referred to follows:]

As the Secretary of Defense has stated, eliminating sexual assault from our Armed Forces is one of the Department's top priorities and, if confirmed, I look forward to helping achieve that goal in my capacity as the chief legal officer for the Department.

It is my personal view that there is great merit to many of the proposals currently pending before Congress. In particular, I support efforts to ensure that individuals convicted of sexual assault do not serve in the military, to supplement the breadth and availability of support services for victims, and to enhance and standardize the oversight and investigation of sexual assault allegations. These proposals represent concrete steps that should strengthen the Department's overall sexual assault prevention and response programs and efforts.

With regard to eliminating the authority of commanders to refer charges or convene court-martials, I think special care should be taken before removing commanders from the administration of military justice, which would represent a fundamental change to the military justice system that is likely to have second- and third-order effects. As I understand it, significant questions have been raised about how such a proposal could be implemented in practice and its potential effect on the expeditious and efficient administration of military justice.

Secretary Hagel recently expanded the role of lawyers in the sexual assault offense disposition process by requiring the Secretaries of the Military Departments to mandate no later than December 1, 2013, that judge advocates serve as investigating officers for all Article 32 hearings on such charges. As this illustrates, the role of lawyers in the military justice system is not immutable, and no potential solution to achieve the eradication of sexual assault in the military is off the table, including increasing the role of lawyers and decreasing the role of the commander.

Indeed, the panel established by Congress to review and assess the systems used to investigate, prosecute, and adjudicate crimes involving sexual assault has been tasked specifically to assess the strengths and weaknesses of the current role of commanders in the administration of military justice. (National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013, Pub. L. No. 112–239, § 576(d)(1)(G), 126 Stat. 1632, 1760 (2013)). If confirmed, I will study the panel's conclusions in advising the Secretary on this issue.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Turning to Mr. Rymer, if I may, are you familiar with the Special Inspector General report on the MI–17 helicopter sale by the Russian export agency, Rosoboronexport, to the Afghan Government, paid for by American taxpayer dollars?

Mr. RYMER. Sir, I'm sorry, I'm not, other than what I've read in the press. If I am correct, I believe that report was done by the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction, an office separate and independent from the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General. I'm not, sir, other than just what I've read in the press.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. I would appreciate your reviewing that report. My view is that there is absolutely no justification for the purchase of Russian helicopters, when there are no Afghan pilots trained to fly them, no mechanics trained to repair them. The United States will spend, eventually, more than a billion dollars. We've already spent half a billion, and we've just contracted for another half billion. If there are any helicopters to be purchased and there is sufficient justification, my view is, they ought to be American helicopters. But, the first question is whether that sale of helicopters to the Afghans makes any sense at all, in terms of the national defense issues that are raised by the sale, and particularly no justification for purchase of helicopters from a Russian-controlled export agency that is also selling arms to Syria, used for the slaughter of its own people by a dictator whom we have vowed to overthrow. We are, in effect, supporting Bashar Assad.

I would appreciate your reviewing that report and giving us your views of it, in writing.

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir.

[The information referred to follows:]

The Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR) assessed the extent to which the Afghan military has the capacity to operate and maintain its current and planned fleet of Mi-17 helicopters and the effectiveness of U.S. Government oversight of two task orders to provide maintenance, logistics, and supply support to the Afghan military (Afghan Special Mission Wing: DOD Moving Forward with $771.8 Million Purchase of Aircraft that the Afghans Cannot Operate and Maintain, SIGAR Audit 13–13, June 2013). It would not be appropriate for me to comment on the SIGAR report while my nomination is pending; however, if confirmed, I will assess to what extent further audit or inspection work by the Department of Defense (DOD) Inspector General (IG) regarding the purchase of Mi-17 helicopters would be appropriate.

I am aware that the DOD IG has issued several reports that have examined aspects of the Mi-17 helicopter program. On September 28, 2012, the DOD IG issued an assessment report, "Assessment of U.S. Government and Coalition Efforts to Train, Equip, and Field the Afghan Air Force," (DODIG–2012–141), which, in part, addresses challenges presented in training and equipping Mi-17 flight and maintenance personnel. In an audit report, "Mi-17 Overhauls Had Significant Cost Overruns and Schedule Delays," September 24, 2012, (DODIG–2012–135), the DOD IG recommended the U.S. Army consider whether suspension and debarment is warranted for a Russian firm subcontracted to overhaul Mi-17 aircraft.

Subsequent to this hearing, the DOD IG issued audit report DODIG–2013–123, "Army Needs To Improve Mi-17 Overhaul Management and Contract Administration." The report recommended that the Army review the contracting officer's performance for inappropriate actions, recoup $6.2 million in advance payments to the contractor for services never provided, and review the Program Office actions which established an inappropriate $8.1 million parts inventory.

Senator BLUMENTHAL. Since my time is expired, I want to simply thank you again, every one of you, for your service to our Nation. I look forward to working with you.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator Blumenthal.

We're going to have a 3-minute second round. If we need more than that, we'll have a third round.

Dr. Rabern, in your responses to the committee's advance policy questions, you said that, while you recognize the importance of having the Navy's book auditable by 2017, that you're not familiar with the Navy's progress toward achieving the statutory deadline of 2014 for a statement of budgetary resources or of 2017 for auditability. Now, this committee's placed a great deal of emphasis on having the Department—indeed, all of our Departments—meet these deadlines. If confirmed, will you commit to quickly becoming more familiar with the Navy's progress towards these important deadlines? Will you come back, within 60 days of your confirmation, to report on the Navy's progress and any areas that need improvement or attention?

Dr. RABERN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to do that. If confirmed, sustained audit readiness will be one of my highest priorities. It is critical in making sound fiscal and readiness decisions. I will rely on the expertise of the military and civilian personnel who have that experience on the staff within the Department of the Navy, in addition to my own experience in other Government agencies. I look very much forward to working with you and your staff in meeting these audit readiness requirements.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

Mr. Rymer, the Office of the Inspector General receives many requests from congressional committees and from Members of Congress for audits and investigations of matters of public interest. Will you ensure that the Office of the Inspector General continues to respond to congressional requests for audits or investigations in a prompt manner and in a manner consistent with past practices?

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir, I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Under what circumstances do you believe it's appropriate for the Office of the Inspector General to redact some of the contents of any information contained in a report provided to Congress?

Mr. RYMER. Sir, I think the process that's in place now, is that information is not redacted if the request is from the chairman or the ranking member, in their capacity of acting on behalf of the committee. If it's from an individual member, I believe it's treated as a release to the public, and there are redactions.

Chairman LEVIN. But, to the ranking member and to the chairman, it is unredacted?

Mr. RYMER. It's my understanding, yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

In October 2012, the President issued a policy directive relating to the protection of whistleblowers who have access to classified information. This directive is designed to ensure that employees serving in the Intelligence Community or who are eligible for access to classified information can effectively report waste, fraud, and abuse while protecting classified national security information. Are you familiar with this directive? What do you understand will be your role, if confirmed, in implementing it within DOD?

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir, I am somewhat familiar with it. As I understand, in the DOD Inspector General if complaints are received, the role of the Inspector General in the whistleblower process is to investigate any claims or concerns about retaliation. That would be my main concern, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. All right. But, if classified information is presented to those of us that have clearance, which is all of us, do you see any problem with the whistleblower presenting to a person with clearance, including Members of Congress, that information?

Mr. RYMER. I think that the process, sir, as I understand it, is when the information comes to the IG, the IG tries to make a determination as to whether it is classified and presents an urgent need. Then I believe there's a role for the Secretary of Defense to release the information to Congress. Or, I may be confusing that with another process.

Chairman LEVIN. Well, you can clarify that for the record.

Mr. RYMER. Yes, sir, I will.

[The information referred to follows:]

Executive Order and Department of Defense (DOD) guidance that establish the requirements for access to classified information permit DOD employees, military personnel, and contractor employees to have access to classified information provided the individual possesses a valid and appropriate security clearance, have executed a nondisclosure agreement, and have a valid need-to-know the information in order to perform a lawful and authorized governmental function. Such individuals provided access to classified information have a duty to protect that information from unauthorized disclosure.

Congress has established the Intelligence Community Whistleblower Protection Act (ICWPA) as the authorized means to disclose complaints of classified wrongdoing to Congress. The ICWPA (title 5 U.S.C. Appendix § 8H) provides a secure way for employees, or contractor employees, of the four DOD intelligence agencies—the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA), National Reconnaissance Office (NRO), and the National Security Agency (NSA)—to tell Congress about classified wrongdoing. DOD IG reviews the complaint, and if it determines it to be credible and present an "urgent concern," forwards it to the Secretary of Defense (SECDEF), who forwards it to Congress.

If the complaint or information does not meet ICWPA standards, the complainant may contact Congress directly, but only after informing SECDEF, through DOD IG, of their intent to contact, and getting SECDEF guidance, through DOD IG, on the appropriate way to do so.

The ICWPA is basically a means to get complaints that involve classified information to Congress. ICWPA does not provide protections against reprisal, however, under the new protections provided by Presidential Policy Directive-19 (PPD–19), a qualifying employee who files an ICWPA complaint may not be reprised against for doing so.

Chairman LEVIN. Senator Inhofe.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let me just briefly touch on it.

Mr. Preston, I wasn't there, and I haven't talked to him, but apparently, Congressman Ruppersberger made a request for information from you, getting back to the Benghazi issue. I believe your response was, "In light of the criminal investigation, we are not to generate statements with assessments as to who did this, et cetera, even internally, not to mention for public release."

The question would be, why would you try to prevent intelligence information to go to the Vice Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee? Now, it's possible to do that in a classified way. I would question that there's an investigation going on, unless you were referring to the FBI investigation. Is that what you were referring to?

Mr. PRESTON. Yes, sir. I'm pleased to respond to that.

As I indicated in your earlier question, I had no substantive involvement with respect to the talking points—that is to say, the preparation and the interagency coordination of the talking points that the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence (HPSCI) ranking member had requested from the Agency. There is the one email that I would like to flag in that regard, which is to say, in the course of the Agency's responding to that HPSCI request, it came to my attention, and I sent an email to the folks working on it, essentially reminding them that there was a criminal investigation pending and that we had been admonished not to generate material that could complicate that investigation.

Typically, when you're in an evolving situation and there's a criminal investigation been launched, you want to avoid——

Senator INHOFE. Was there a criminal investigation launched?

Mr. PRESTON. That's my understanding.

Senator INHOFE. The only investigation that I heard—and I'm asking this, because I don't know, Mr. Preston—was the FBI investigation. Of course, they weren't even there until 15 days after this took place. Is there an investigation, other than that, going on?

Mr. PRESTON. No, it's the investigation initiated by the FBI in the immediate aftermath of the attacks. We were informed of that investigation and instructed that the FBI was investigating, other agencies were not to investigate, not to do anything that would interfere, generate material that would complicate the investigation.

This is not atypical. When you have an investigation, early on in an evolving situation, you want to avoid speculation or tentative things that may complicate a later prosecution. You want to avoid taking witness statements; let the investigators do that.

What I was doing with this email was just alerting people that we have been told there's an investigation, we've been admonished not to generate material that would complicate it, let's slow down and make sure that what we're doing is not inconsistent with the guidance we've gotten.

Senator INHOFE. Considering that this individual is the Vice Chairman of HPSCI over there, and made the request, do you see any reason that you couldn't, even in a classified form, respond to his questions, either now or if something should happen in the future?

Mr. PRESTON. I should think that we could respond in a classified form. These were public talking points, and my email was only directed to this particular item that was being prepared.

Senator INHOFE. If he were to re-ask you that question in a classified form, could you respond to it?

Mr. PRESTON. If that request came from the Ranking to the Agency, I expect they would respond.

Senator INHOFE. Okay. That's fine.

Getting back, Mr. McGinn, there was a statement that was attributed to Secretary Hagel, it appeared in Greenwire, I believe it was, one of the publications—he said, "Secretary Hagel recently asked why, in the face of the devastating cuts in civilian workers, carrier deployments, military training, and equipment maintenance, the Defense Department would still contribute $170 million to a massive Federal giveaway to private biofuels companies to aid the construction of a commercial biofuel refinery." Then it said, "He was told by the White House to stand down."

You can do this for the record, if you'd like, unless you'd like to address it now—the same $170 million could have been used by the Air Force to prevent the 16 squadrons from flying or could have saved some 60,000 civilians from being furloughed. I have a list of things that could be done with that $170 million.

I guess what I want to get from you—I know what's happened in the past. You and I have disagreed on the whole green fleet and all of that.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. But, that's an honest disagreement, and I understand that. But, we also have a Department of Energy. I remember when that was set up. It was set up just for such purposes as experimenting to see what we could have.

Now, when people use the excuse that we are not energy sufficient, I want to hasten to say, we could be, and we will be, when we can change our policies in this country. But, nonetheless, in the meantime, don't you think that those dollars, that are so scarce right now of going into defending America, should be used just for that purpose, for defense, and let the Department of Energy carry on their function? What's your thought about that?

Admiral MCGINN. Based on my prior experience in uniform, especially as Deputy Chief of Naval Operations for Warfare Requirements, I'm somewhat familiar with the process of having to make choices to recognize that there are not only direct costs for investments, but there are opportunity costs. If you spend it on one thing, you're not going to be not going to be able to spend it on other things. I look forward, if confirmed, to really looking into all of our programs, including our energy programs, to make sure that, not only the direct costs, but the opportunity costs are carefully considered in making those investments.

Senator INHOFE. In this case—and you can recall, because we've actually used this, talking about the $26 a gallon that could have been done for less. In specific instances like that, I would request, if you are confirmed, that, when you see things like that, that might be coming up, that we, on this committee, could be a part of that decision, and it not just be done in a vacuum. That would be a request that I would have.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir. Across the board, all of my portfolio, if confirmed, I look forward to working with the committee, and, indeed, the entire Congress.

Senator INHOFE. All right. Thank you very much for that answer.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you, Senator Inhofe.

I have an additional question or two.

Admiral, before the committee authorizes appropriations for a military construction project, that project has typically been reviewed by the relevant Service and the Service, when they designate that project as a priority, they then submit it to Congress as part of the budget. Now, the committee's recent review of overseas basing found that it is not the case for projects built with in-kind payments from foreign governments. This inquiry of our committee found that the in-kind payments from Germany, South Korea, and Japan have been used to fund questionable military construction projects. Are you familiar with our investigation?

Admiral MCGINN. No, sir. I am familiar that there is an investigation, but not all of the details.

Chairman LEVIN. All right. If you would, after you're confirmed, promptly read the report and make sure that in-kind payments are utilized only for identified U.S. priorities to offset costs that the Department of the Navy would otherwise pay with appropriated funds, we would appreciate it.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir. I would just like to state that, no matter what the source of precious resources, we have to make sure that they're spent wisely. It doesn't matter whether it comes from the support from some of our allies or from our own appropriated funds. We have an obligation to spend them to the best effect possible.

Chairman LEVIN. Or whether they're in-kind payments.

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Okay.

Now, the committee, or at least many members, are very concerned about the plans for the relocation of marines from Okinawa to other locations in the Pacific; specifically, not the idea of it, but more the affordability and the sustainability and the operational viability of those plans. In response to prehearing policy questions, you indicated that Guam construction issues were among the most significant challenges facing the next Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Energy, Installations, and Environment.

Now, the Marine Corps estimates its realignment plan would cost $12.1 billion, but the Government Accountability Office (GAO) recently reported that this estimate is not reliable; it's based on limited data and will not be reliable until environmental analyses and host-nation negotiations have concluded.

Admiral, are you familiar with the GAO report?

Admiral MCGINN. Not the details, but that there is a report, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you, after you're confirmed, which we hope will be prompt—will you give us a report about your level of confidence in the reliability of that $12.1 billion cost estimate put forward by the Marine Corps?

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, I will.

Chairman LEVIN. Also, will you let us know, in your report, whether or not we should be funding military construction projects to support the movement of marines to Guam before we have commitments from host nations, in terms of their participation in those costs?

Admiral MCGINN. Yes, sir.

Chairman LEVIN. Will you let us know that at the same time?

Admiral MCGINN. I will.

Senator INHOFE. Just really briefly.

Chairman LEVIN. Sure.

Senator INHOFE. Let me correct the record. I had used the wrong name. The Sergeant Major at Fort Sill that was really somewhat of an expert in this area—was named Carter. I used the wrong name. I wanted to make sure I got that correction.

One last thing. Mr. Preston, in statements that I read that were statements you had made about military commissions, have you been to GTMO and looked at the expeditionary legal complex down there?

Mr. PRESTON. I've been down there once. Yes, sir.

Senator INHOFE. Did you go through this complex that they have down there?

Mr. PRESTON. I went to some of the facilities down there.

Senator INHOFE. They had one major one. As I recall, it was about a $15-million thing that they put together down there. You're more familiar with it than I am—but I am not a lawyer, as I've pointed out—with the difference between the tribunals and the normal trials that we would have here. In terms of security of information and all of that, would you just reexamine that particular facility and then maybe visit with me about any justification for not using it? I don't know of one anywhere that is just like that, that is designed for that purpose. Would you do that, and just look at that and visit with me about it? I need to be educated a little bit more.

Mr. PRESTON. Sir, if I'm confirmed, I would be happy to do that.

Senator INHOFE. All right.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman LEVIN. Thank you.

We have indicated that there are going to be questions for the record, which we're going to need to get promptly answered, particularly to you, Mr. Preston. I don't know if there are other nominees that we had questions for, or might have questions for, but I know there are some for you, Mr. Preston. Some of those are going to be in a classified form and may require classified answers, particularly relative to that response from the CIA to the Intelligence Committee about the intelligence investigation that I referred to—the Intelligence Committee investigation.

We will try to get those questions to you, if we can, as early as tomorrow. If so, you would then be able, both, where appropriate, in a unclassified manner, but, where necessary, in a classified manner, please get us your answers within a matter of days, because that'll speed up the consideration of your nomination. That goes for any other questions for any of the other nominees, as well.

If there are no additional questions, we will stand adjourned, again with thanks to you and your families.

[Whereupon, at 11:12 a.m., the committee adjourned.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Hon. Stephen W. Preston by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and the chain of command by clearly delineating the combatant commanders' responsibilities and authorities and the role of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These reforms have also improved cooperation between the services and the combatant commanders in the strategic planning process, in the development of requirements, in joint training and education, and in the execution of military operations.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions based on your experience in the Department of Defense?

Answer. I believe that Goldwater-Nichols and other reforms have significantly improved the Department of Defense. At this time, I am not aware of any need to amend Goldwater-Nichols. If am confirmed and become aware of a need, I will recommend any changes I believe to be warranted.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. See answer above.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. What is your understanding of both the formal and informal relationship between the General Counsel of the Department of Defense and the following offices?

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. As the chief legal officer of the Department of Defense, the General Counsel is the principal legal advisor to the Secretary of Defense and, as such, advises on the full range of issues confronting the Department of Defense. If confirmed, I look forward to working very closely with the Secretary and his immediate staff on these issues.

Question. The Under Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. The General Counsel and attorneys reporting to the General Counsel are responsible for providing sound and timely legal advice to the five Under Secretaries of Defense and their respective offices.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. As with the Under Secretaries of Defense, the General Counsel and attorneys in the Office of General Counsel are responsible for providing sound and timely legal advice to the Assistant Secretaries of Defense and their staffs.

Question. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. The Chairman has his own lawyer, the Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who is a judge advocate in the grade of brigadier general or rear admiral (lower half). The Chairman relies primarily on the Legal Counsel for legal advice. If confirmed, I expect to meet regularly and work closely with the Chairman's Legal Counsel on a wide variety of matters affecting the Department of Defense and would be available to the Chairman as appropriate.

Question. The geographic combatant commanders.

Answer. The geographic combatant commanders have their own Staff Judge Advocates, on whom they rely for legal advice. If confirmed, I expect to work with the geographic combatant commanders and their Staff Judge Advocates through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Joint Staff, including the Legal Counsel to the Chairman as appropriate.

Question. The Commander of the Joint Special Operations Command.

Answer. The Commander of the Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC) has his own Staff Judge Advocate who provides legal advice to him, in conjunction with the Staff Judge Advocate of the U.S. Special Operations Command (SOCOM), as JSOC is a part of SOCOM. If confirmed, I expect to work with the Commander and the Staff Judge Advocate of JSOC, as well as the Commander and the Staff Judge Advocate of SOCOM, through the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Joint Staff, including the Legal Counsel to the Chairman as appropriate.

Question. The Judge Advocates General (TJAG).

Answer. The Judge Advocates General (TJAG) are responsible for providing legal advice, along with the General Counsels of the Military Departments, to the senior leadership of their respective Military Departments. Title 10 expressly directs that "[n]o officer or employee of the Department of Defense interfere with the ability of the Judge Advocate[s] General to give independent legal advice to" the leadership of their respective Military Departments. See title 10 U.S.C. §§ 3037, 5148, 8037. If confirmed, I expect to meet regularly and work closely with all of the Judge Advocates General, as well as the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and I aim to have the same productive and collegial relationship with the "TJAGs" and the JAG community as I enjoyed during my prior service at the Department of Defense.

Question. The Legal Advisor to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Answer. As noted above, the Legal Counsel to the Chairman is responsible for providing legal advice to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. If confirmed, I expect to have a productive and collegial relationship with the Chairman's Legal Counsel, characterized by frequent meetings and close collaboration, particularly with respect to military operations.

Question. The Staff Judge Advocates to the Commanders of Combatant Commands.

Answer. I understand that the relationship of the General Counsel to the Staff Judge Advocates of the Combatant Commands is primarily through the Chairman's Legal Counsel.

Question. The General Counsels of the Military Departments.

Answer. From my prior service as General Counsel of the Department of the Navy and as Principal Deputy General Counsel of the Department of Defense, I appreciate the close working relationships among the Military Department General Counsels and the DOD General Counsel. The General Counsels of the Army, Navy and Air Force serve as the chief legal officers of their respective departments and report to the Secretaries of their respective departments. At the same time, the DOD General Counsel is the chief legal officer of the entire Department of Defense. If confirmed, I expect to meet regularly and work closely with the Military Department General Counsels.

Question. The Counsels for the Defense Agencies.

Answer. The DOD General Counsel is also the Director of the Defense Legal Services Agency (DLSA), and the General Counsels of the defense agencies and DOD field activities are all part of DLSA. The General Counsels of the defense agencies and DOD field activities report the DOD General Counsel in his or her capacity as DLSA Director.

Question. The Counsel to the Inspector General.

Answer. Title 5 of the U.S.C. provides for a General Counsel to the Inspector General of the Department of Defense, who reports directly to and performs duties as assigned by the Inspector General. If confirmed, I expect to work closely with the General Counsel to the Inspector General.

Question. The Joint Service Committee on Military Justice.

Answer. I understand that the DOD General Counsel designates a non-voting representative to the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice, provides taskings to the committee, and receives advice from it.

Question. The Comptroller General.

Answer. It is my understanding that the General Counsel, on behalf of the Secretary of Defense, may request advisory opinions from the Comptroller General on the obligation and disbursement of public funds. If confirmed, I expect to have a productive relationship with the Comptroller General and his or her staff with respect to matters involving fiscal law within the responsibility of the Comptroller General.

Question. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Answer. By statute, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces is located, for administrative purposes only, within the Department of Defense. See title 10 U.S.C. § 941. My understanding is that the DOD General Counsel has historically served as an informal DOD liaison with the Court. If confirmed, I expect to support the work of the Court while respecting its independence.

Question. The Code Committee established under Article 146 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Answer. I understand that the Code Committee consists of the Judges of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the Judge Advocates General of the Military Departments, the Judge Advocate General and Chief Counsel of the Coast Guard, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and two recognized authorities on military justice appointed by the Secretary of Defense from public life. The General Counsel has no formal relationship to the Code Committee. However, the General Counsel may provide informal support to the Code Committee when requested and regularly communicates with the Code Committee with respect to the activities and recommendations of the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice.

Question. The Attorney General.

Answer. The Attorney General is the chief legal officer and law enforcement authority of the United States. As General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency, I have worked closely with the Attorney General and his staff on a number of matters. If confirmed, I look forward to continuing the productive relationship that I have enjoyed with the leadership of the Department of Justice.

Question. The Office of Legal Counsel at the Department of Justice.

Answer. The Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel issues legal opinions that are binding on the executive branch, including the Department of Defense, and regularly provides advice to attorneys throughout the Executive branch. As a result, the DOD General Counsel must work closely with the Office of Legal Counsel to ensure that the best possible legal advice is provided to officials of the Department of Defense. As General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency, I have had a very close and productive relationship with the Assistant Attorney General and the Office of Legal Counsel, and, if confirmed, I expect that relationship to continue.

Question. The Office of Legal Adviser at the Department of State.

Answer. Many national security matters require the Departments of State and Defense to work closely together and coordinate efforts. As a result, it is necessary for the DOD General Counsel and the Legal Adviser of the Department of State, and their respective staffs, to consult with each other on legal issues of mutual interest on a regular basis. As General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency, my relationship with the Legal Adviser and the Legal Adviser's office has been a close and productive one, and, if confirmed, I look forward to continuing that relationship.

Question. The General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Answer. My service as General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency provides me with special insight into the appropriate relationship between the incumbent of that position and the DOD General Counsel. The Central Intelligence Agency and the Department of Defense share many common interests in significant national security matters, intelligence activities and military operations, and it is therefore critically important for the General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency and the DOD General Counsel to work well together and communicate regularly. If confirmed, I am confident that I will have a very close and productive relationship with my successor at the Agency.

Question. The Interagency Legal Advisors Working Group.

Answer. Attorneys from the national security staff and departments and agencies with national security responsibilities meet as needed or directed to discuss legal issues of concern to multiple departments and agencies or about which there may be differences of opinion. As General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency, I have participated in these discussions and will continue to do so as DOD General Counsel, if confirmed.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. Section 140 of title 10, U.S.C., provides that the General Counsel is the chief legal officer of the Department of Defense and that the General Counsel shall perform such functions as the Secretary of Defense may prescribe.

Assuming you are confirmed, what duties do you expect that the Secretary of Defense will prescribe for you?

Answer. If confirmed, I anticipate that the Secretary of Defense will rely on me for legal advice on the full range of issues that he and the Department must address and will expect me, as a member of his senior leadership team, to share with him the benefit of my experience generally.

Question. What background and experience do you have that you believe qualifies you for this position?

Answer. I have spent most of my career, and the past 20 years straight, working at the juncture of law and national security, both in private practice and in government service.

I am currently General Counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate a little more than 4 years ago. Before that, as a partner at WilmerHale in Washington, I was co-chair of the firm's Defense and National Security Practice Group, as well as a member of the firm's Regulatory and Litigation Departments. During the Clinton administration, I served as Deputy General Counsel for Legal Counsel, Principal Deputy General Counsel and, for an extended period, Acting General Counsel of the Department of Defense. I then joined the Department of Justice as the Deputy Assistant Attorney General responsible for civil appellate matters. Returning to the Department of Defense, I served as General Counsel of the Department of the Navy, a Presidential appointment requiring Senate confirmation.

These experiences have given me a deep understanding of legal and policy issues relating to national defense. I have also gained valuable insight into the critical role of the General Counsel in advising the Secretary of Defense and representing the Department. For the past 4 years, I have dealt extensively with the terrorist threat and other security challenges facing the United States. Perhaps most important, my experience over a professional lifetime has instilled in me a profound appreciation for the men and women who devote their lives to defending our country.

CLIENT

Question. In your opinion, who is the client of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense?

Answer. The client of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense is the Department of Defense and, ultimately, the United States of America.

DUTIES AND CHALLENGES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges confronting the next General Counsel of the Department of Defense?

Answer. The major challenges I will face, if confirmed, relate directly to the major challenges confronting the Department as a whole. Among them are the conflict with al Qaeda and transition in Afghanistan, as well as other national security challenges, and continuing efforts to ensure full compliance with all applicable law in addressing those challenges. Other priority areas with substantial legal aspects include military detention operations and the military commissions. There are also pressures caused by diminishing budgets and the effects of sequestration, and resulting challenges in both the acquisition and personnel areas. In the acquisition area, for example, bid protests and other contract litigation may be expected to increase as more companies compete for fewer contracts or decide to file contract claims. Furloughs and anticipated reductions in personnel are also likely to raise significant legal issues.

Question. If confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges?

Answer. The Department is well served by a cadre of experienced attorneys who are experts in relevant areas of law, both in the Office of General Counsel and in the larger DOD legal community. If confirmed, my hope is to provide leadership and the support those attorneys need to provide the best possible legal advice to their component clients. For my part, I will do my utmost to assist the Secretary in meeting the various challenges confronting the Department.

Question. What do you consider to be the most serious problems in the performance of the functions of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense?

Answer. I expect that I will have a better sense of any needs relating to the performance of the DOD General Counsel's functions after spending some time in the position, if confirmed. I understand that current budget pressures, aging of the workforce, and difficulty in replacing attorneys who retire without others having similar expertise may pose significant problems.

Question. What management actions and timelines would you establish to address these problems?

Answer. If confirmed, I intend to treat my colleagues with the respect they so richly deserve, and to focus on resources, succession planning and recruitment with reference to the workforce of my office.

Question. What do you see as the greatest legal problems facing the Department in the coming year?

Answer. In addition to the challenges discussed above, one area that has received a great deal of attention recently, which I expect will draw continued attention in the coming year, would be intelligence activities conducted by the Department of Defense that potentially implicate privacy and civil liberties. DOD attorneys will, I expect, continue to assist their component clients in finding lawful paths to reach operational objectives, facilitating the national security mission while ensuring full compliance with all applicable law and, specifically, strict adherence to the standards and procedures protecting privacy and civil liberties. I also see sexual assault in the military as an urgent problem with substantial legal aspects that will require sustained attention in the coming year, as discussed in response to specific questions below.

Question. Does the Office of the General Counsel have the resources to deal with these problems and do its everyday work?

Answer. I expect that I will have a better sense of any needs relating to Office of General Counsel resources after spending some time in the position, if confirmed.

I understand that furloughs and anticipated reductions in personnel may pose significant challenges in this regard.

LEGAL OPINIONS

Question. Are legal opinions of the Office of the General Counsel binding on all lawyers within the Department of Defense?

Answer. The DOD General Counsel is the chief legal officer of the Department of Defense. Accordingly, the legal opinions of the DOD Office of General Counsel are controlling throughout the Department of Defense. There is an exception for the lawyers in the Office of the Inspector General, as the General Counsel to the Inspector General is expressly exempted from the scope of 10 U.S.C. § 140 by virtue of section 907 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009 A (title 5 U.S.C. App. Inspector General Act of 1978 § 8(h)). I note also that title 10 prohibits any officer or employee of DOD from interfering with the ability of certain senior military lawyers to give independent legal advice to their respective principals.

Question. How will you ensure that such legal opinions are available to lawyers in the various components of the Department of Defense?

Answer. Written opinions of the DOD Office of General Counsel are disseminated throughout the Department in the ordinary course of business, using normal departmental distribution processes. If confirmed, I expect to continue this practice.

Question. If confirmed, are there specific categories of General Counsel legal opinions that you expect to reconsider and possibly revise? If so, what categories?

Answer. I am not aware of any specific categories of General Counsel legal opinions that are in need of reconsideration or revision. However, if confirmed and such a need arises, I would review those opinions in consultation with the appropriate attorneys and subject matter experts within the Department.

Question. What role do you expect to play, if confirmed, in the development and consideration (or reconsideration) of legal opinions by the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) of the Department of Justice that directly affect the Department of Defense?

Answer. While the Department of Justice is ultimately responsible for the legal opinions of the Office of Legal Counsel, if confirmed, I expect to work closely with the Office of Legal Counsel in the development and consideration of legal opinions that directly affect the Department of Defense. (I am not aware of any such opinions currently in effect that are in need of reconsideration.)

Question. What actions would you take in response to an opinion issued by OLC with which you disagreed as a matter of proper interpretation of the law?

Answer. I would not hesitate to inform the Office of Legal Counsel if I disagreed with one of its legal opinions. I would raise any unresolved concerns directly with the Assistant Attorney General. If necessary and as appropriate, I would be prepared to take the matter all the way up to the Attorney General. I recognize, however, that the Attorney General is the chief legal officer of the United States and that his or her legal opinions are controlling throughout the Executive branch.

INDEPENDENT LEGAL ADVICE

Question. In response to attempts within the Department of Defense to subordinate legal functions and authorities of the Judge Advocates General to the General Counsels of the Department of Defense and the Military Services, Congress enacted legislation prohibiting any officer or employee of the Department of Defense from interfering with the ability of the Judge Advocates General of the Military Services and the legal advisor to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to provide independent legal advice to the Chairman, Service Secretaries, and Service Chiefs. Congress also required a study and review by outside experts of the relationships between the legal elements of each of the Military Departments.

What is your view of the need for the Judge Advocates General of the services, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the legal advisor to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to provide independent legal advice to Service Secretaries, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Chiefs of Staff of the Army and Air Force, and the Chief of Naval Operations?

Answer. I believe that the ability of these senior military lawyers to provide independent legal advice to their principals is critically important. During my prior service as General Counsel of the Department of the Navy and as Principal Deputy General Counsel of the Department of Defense, long before any legislation in this regard, it was my firm expectation that the senior military lawyers with whom I worked would provide independent legal advice to their principals, entirely without hindrance. As a member of the 2005 Independent Review Panel to Study the Relationships between military department General Counsels and Judge Advocates General, I had an opportunity to reflect on these issues and to reaffirm the independence of the "TJAGs" in providing legal advice to the leadership of their respective military departments. In my experience, the best legal advice is often the product of consultation and, where possible, consensus. Accordingly, in my view, the advice given by senior military lawyers should be informed by consultation with other departmental lawyers as appropriate. If confirmed, I expect to benefit from, and will insist on, the independent views of the senior military lawyers with whom I will work.

Question. What is your view of the responsibility of judge advocates within the services and joint commands to provide independent legal advice to military commanders?

Answer. Judge advocates within the Services and joint commands must provide military commanders timely legal advice that is independent of improper external influence. While exercising their best judgment, the advice given may be informed by consultation with other departmental lawyers, as circumstances permit, such as more senior judge advocates in the chain of command, and it should be governed by any relevant legal guidance from authoritative sources such as the Department of Justice or within the Department of Defense.

Question. If confirmed, would you propose any changes to the current relationships between the uniformed judge advocates and General Counsels?

Answer. As I understand the current relationships, I would not propose any changes, if confirmed.

DETAINEE ISSUES

Question. Section 1403 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2006 provides that no individual in the custody or under the physical control of the U.S. Government, regardless of nationality or physical location shall be subject to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.

In your view, is the prohibition in the best interest of the United States? Why or why not?

Answer. I believe this prohibition to be in the best interest of the United States, consistent with the national security and with fundamental American values.

Question. Do you believe that the phrase "cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment" has been adequately and appropriately defined for the purpose of this provision?

Answer. The Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 and the Military Commissions Act of 2009 define "cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment" as the cruel, unusual, and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. I think this is an adequate and appropriate definition.

Question. What role do you believe the General Counsel of the Department of Defense should play in the interpretation of this standard?

Answer. The General Counsel should play a primary role in advising the Secretary of Defense and those who fall under his command on the standards governing the treatment of persons detained by the U.S. military, including regarding any interpretation, if necessary, of the standard quoted above.

Question. What role do you believe the Judge Advocates General of the military services should play in the interpretation of this standard?

Answer. The Judge Advocates General and other military lawyers should play a prominent role in the interpretation of standards related to the treatment of detainees. I believe The Judge Advocates General and the lawyers they lead bring experience and an important perspective to these and many other matters, and they play a vital role in supporting the operating forces worldwide. Judge advocates must be depended on to provide timely day-to-day legal advice to military commanders in the field. If confirmed, and if called on to offer any guidance on this standard, I would expect to consult The Judge Advocates General and the Chairman's Legal Counsel.

Question. If confirmed, will you take steps to ensure that all relevant Department of Defense directives, regulations, policies, practices, and procedures fully comply with the requirements of section 1403 and with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you support the standards for detainee treatment specified in the revised Army Field Manual on Interrogations, FM 2–22.3, issued in September 2006, and in DOD Directive 2310.01E, the Department of Defense Detainee Program, dated September 5, 2006?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Section 2441 of title 18, U.S.C., as amended by the Military Commissions Act of 2006, defines grave breaches of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, including torture and cruel and inhuman treatment.

In your view, does section 2441 define these terms in a manner that provides appropriate protection from abusive treatment to U.S. detainees in foreign custody and to foreign detainees in U.S. custody?

Answer. I believe the standard as defined in U.S. domestic law is appropriate for purposes of protection from abusive treatment when applied to detention at home and abroad.

Question. Do you believe that the United States has the legal authority to continue holding alleged members and supporters of al Qaeda and the Taliban as enemy combatants?

Answer. Congress and the Federal courts have recognized the Executive branch's authority to detain individuals who were part of, or substantially supported, al Qaeda or Taliban forces, or associated forces that are engaged in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners, including any person who has committed a belligerent act, or has directly supported hostilities, in aid of such enemy forces.

Question. Do you believe that the Federal courts have the procedures and capabilities needed to fairly and appropriately review the detention of enemy combatants, pursuant to habeas corpus petitions?

Answer. The Federal courts have established clear procedures for a habeas petitioner to obtain extensive discovery from the government and for the petitioner to participate in his case (during unclassified proceedings). In the habeas litigation, the courts have provided detainees with a meaningful opportunity to contest the lawfulness of their detention, while protecting core national security interests, such as the protection of classified information and the continued detention of enemy belligerents who pose a threat to the United States.

Question. What role would you expect to play, if confirmed, under the Periodic Review Board procedures for reviewing the status of Guantanamo detainees and determining whether the United States should continue to hold such detainees?

Answer. If confirmed, I would expect to provide legal advice to the Secretary of Defense on the status of the Guantanamo detainees and determinations whether such detainees should continue to be held. In addition, the General Counsel appoints the legal advisor to the Periodic Review Board and is in the legal advisor's supervisory chain.

Question. The Military Commissions Act of 2009 revised the 2006 procedures for military commission trials of "alien unlawful enemy combatants".

In your view, does the Military Commissions Act of 2009 provide appropriate legal standards and processes for the trial of alien unlawful enemy combatants?

Answer. The Military Commissions Act of 2009 provides appropriate standards and processes for the trial of alien unprivileged enemy belligerents.

Question. What role would you expect to play, if confirmed, in determining whether Guantanamo detainees should be tried for war crimes, and if so, in what forum?

Answer. The Convening Authority has the responsibility for determining whether to refer charges to a military commission. The General Counsel does not have a role in the referral of charges. If confirmed, I would expect to provide legal advice, as necessary, to the Secretary of Defense on these matters.

Question. What is your understanding of the relationship between the General Counsel of the Department of Defense and the legal advisor to the convening authority, the chief prosecutor, and the chief defense counsel for the military commissions?

Answer. The Legal Advisor to the Convening Authority and Chief Prosecutor are supervised by the Deputy General Counsel (Legal Counsel). The Chief Defense Counsel is supervised by the Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy). Both the Deputy General Counsel (Legal Counsel) and the Deputy General Counsel (Personnel & Health Policy) report to the General Counsel.

COERCIVE INTERROGATION TECHNIQUES

Question. As discussed in a 2008 report of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Survival, Evasion, Resistance, and Escape (SERE) techniques used to train members of our military were never intended to be used by U.S. interrogators. Rather, the techniques—which are based on Communist Chinese interrogation techniques used during the Korean War to elicit confessions—were developed to expose U.S. soldiers to the abusive treatment they might be subjected to if captured by our enemies.

Do you believe interrogation techniques derived from SERE techniques are an effective way to acquire useful intelligence?

Answer. While I have no expertise in either SERE training or methods of interrogation, in my view, the fact that certain techniques have been used to train servicemembers in withstanding abusive treatment if captured is not indicative of the effectiveness of those techniques in obtaining information from detainees, nor does it show such techniques to be superior to conventional interrogation techniques.

Under Executive Order 13491, issued January 22, 2009, departments and agencies of the U.S. Government are prohibited from using any interrogation technique that is not authorized by and listed in the Army Field Manual. My understanding is that none of the interrogation techniques contained in the Army Field Manual—FM 2–22.3, "Human Intelligence Collector Operations," September 2006—was derived from SERE techniques.

Question. In your opinion, is there any comparability between a friendly trainer exposing our troops to SERE techniques, including waterboarding, for minutes to show what they could face if captured and using these techniques on an enemy to in an effort to extract intelligence?

Answer. While I have no expertise in either SERE training or methods of interrogation, in my view, the two activities are significantly different for purposes of meaningful comparison. They are conducted for very different purposes, and they are carried out in very different contexts/environments. Notably, the person subjected to such techniques during SERE training is aware that he or she is participating in a training exercise and not in fact undergoing interrogation by hostile forces.

Question. In your opinion, does waterboarding constitute torture?

Answer. Under current law, waterboarding constitutes torture. As waterboarding was banned by Executive order in January 2009, I have had no occasion to independently examine the question with reference to any CIA activities during my tenure as General Counsel. However, I believe the law on this is now well settled: in addition to the President, Attorney General Holder has stated that waterboarding is torture. That is the law in my view, and I fully support the President's decision to ban waterboarding and the other "enhanced interrogation techniques".

At the time the waterboard was used in connection with the former detention and interrogation program, Agency personnel relied on then-authoritative legal opinions issued by the Department of Justice. Of course, those opinions have since been disavowed and withdrawn by the Department of Justice. However, the Attorney General has repeatedly made clear that anyone who acted in good faith and within the scope of the legal guidance given by the Justice Department would not be subject to prosecution.

Question. Is waterboarding torture within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions?

Answer. See answer above. For purposes of defining torture under the Geneva Conventions, the U.S. military uses the definition of torture under U.S. domestic law. See U.S. Army Field Manual 2–22.3. So if an activity is torture under U.S. law, then it is torture for purposes of the Geneva Conventions. Inasmuch as waterboarding is torture under U.S. law, as noted above, waterboarding is torture within the meaning of the Geneva Conventions.

MILITARY COMMISSIONS ACT

Question. In your view, do military commissions constituted pursuant to the Military Commissions Act of 2009 provide an effective forum for trying violations of the law of armed conflict?

Answer. Military commissions are an appropriate forum for trying offenses against the law of war and other offenses traditionally triable by military commission. The applicability of certain offenses to conduct occurring prior to 2006 is currently the subject of pending litigation in Federal court.

Question. What do you see as the advantages and disadvantages of military commissions as a forum for trying detainees for terrorism-related offenses?

Answer. The reforms of the Military Commissions Act of 2009 ensure that military commissions provide appropriate processes for the trial of alien unprivileged enemy belligerents. In addition, the Department of Defense has made many improvements to the transparency of the process, including closed-circuit transmission of all open proceedings to the general public. Nonetheless, legal challenges remain, particularly in light of the number of unsettled legal issues.

Question. Do you see the need for any changes to the Military Commissions Act of 2009?

Answer. I am not aware of any need for changes to the 2009 Military Commissions Act.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for the U.S. military to use force, including deadly force, against U.S. citizens?

Answer. Citizenship does not confer immunity on one who takes up arms against our country. However, it is critically important to respect the Constitutional rights of American citizens, even those who may be plotting against the United States. The requirements of Due Process and the circumstances in which the U.S. Government could lawfully target an enemy belligerent/terrorist operator known to be a U.S. person were outlined in the speech by the Attorney General in March of last year and are discussed in some detail in the Department of Justice white paper that has been released. In addition, the policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year require that if the United States considers an operation against a terrorist identified as a U.S. person, the Department of Justice will conduct an additional legal analysis to ensure that such action may be conducted against the individual consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for the U.S. military to use force, including deadly force, inside the United States?

Answer. It is a mission of the U.S. military to defend the United States from attack, and the performance of this mission could involve the use of military force to repel an armed attack launched against our homeland. In the conflict with al Qaeda and its militant allies, the U.S. military does not employ deadly force in the United States. As a policy matter, moreover, the use of military force is unnecessary because well-established law enforcement authorities in this country provide the best means for incapacitating a terrorist threat. The United States has a long history of using the criminal justice system to incapacitate individuals located in our country who pose a threat to the United States and its interests.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

Question. In a speech at Columbia Law School and a similar address at Harvard Law School, you discuss a "four-box matrix" which has been used to assist in the legal review of proposed actions by the Central Intelligence Agency. The second box in this matrix is designed to evaluate the "Authority to Act with reference to International Law Principles."

If a proposed action by the Department of Defense is fully in compliance with U.S. law but there is a question of whether the proposed action is permitted under international law, customary international law or international law principles, does this ambiguity effect, and if so to what extent, or negate the ability of the Department to carry out the proposed action?

Answer. As a threshold matter, all U.S. military operations must be authorized under U.S. domestic law. This authority could be conferred by statute or, in the absence of congressional authorization, under certain circumstances, the President may rely on his constitutional authority as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive, as well as his authority to conduct foreign relations, to authorize the use of military force. There are significant constitutional and statutory limitations on the scope and duration of military operations that the President may authorize.

When the United States uses military force in a foreign country, it complies with all applicable international law.

If confirmed, I would work closely with my colleagues, including the Chairman's Legal Counsel and interagency lawyers, to ensure that U.S. military operations abroad comply with both U.S. domestic and applicable international law.

Question. In an address at Northwestern Law School in 2012, Attorney General Eric Holder stated that the administration has implemented special procedures to afford a level of due process review before lethal force is taken pursuant to the Authorization for the Use of Military Force of 2001 against a U.S. citizen.

What is your understanding of the extent to which the administration intends to provide similar procedural due process protections to potential targets outside areas of active armed conflict who are not U.S. citizens?

Answer. The policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year, which govern the United States' use of force in counterterrorism operations outside the United States and areas of active hostilities and are either already in place or will be transitioned into place, apply generally to all terrorist targets, regardless of whether they are American citizens. Particularly as relates to non-U.S. persons abroad, the standards and procedures were promulgated as a matter of policy rather than per requirements of due process.

Question. During the Vietnam war some criticized the layers of bureaucracy which obstructed the timely authorization for an attack on legitimate military targets. In the current conflict, as in the Vietnam war, targets of opportunity can come and go in a moment's notice.

Are you concerned that the procedures cited by the administration, as summarized in the Fact Sheet: U.S. Policy Standards and Procedures for the Use of Force in Counterterrorism Operations Outside the United States and Areas if Active Hostilities, for targeting terrorists outside active areas of armed conflict could similarly complicate and add to the length of time required to target an overseas, non-U.S. citizen al Qaeda member?

Answer. I agree that agility and timeliness are important attributes in a decisionmaking process for approving military targets and authorizing military action against such targets. My understanding is that the policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year were developed in close consultation with the departments and agencies with national security responsibilities, including specifically civilian and military leaders responsible for military operations abroad, and with the objective of having a decisionmaking process that would be practically workable and yield timely decisions. In addition, the policy standards and procedures include a reservation by the President permitting action to be taken in extraordinary circumstances.

Question. How do you assess the risk that the procedures could lead to targets of opportunity being missed or could unnecessarily obstruct our ability to fight the war?

Answer. As noted, the policy standards and procedures were developed with the objective of having a decisionmaking process that would be practically workable and yield timely decisions. In addition, risk in this regard should be mitigated by the reservation by the President permitting a departure from otherwise applicable standards and procedures in extraordinary circumstances.

AUTHORITY FOR USE OF MILITARY FORCE/LAW OF ARMED CONFLICT

Question. On September 18, 2001, Congress passed the Authorization for the Use of Military Force (AUMF) (Public Law 107–40), which provides that "the President is authorized to use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons." This AUMF remains in effect and provides the legal authority for certain U.S. military actions.

What is your understanding of the role of the General Counsel in interpreting the AUMF and in the application of the AUMF to military activities?

Answer. I understand that the General Counsel, as chief legal officer of the Department of Defense, is responsible for providing advice on legal matters involving the Department of Defense and for overseeing legal services provided within the Department of Defense. The interpretation and application of the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force to military activities is a legal matter on which the General Counsel would provide advice to the Secretary of Defense, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, Office of the Secretary of Defense organizations and, as appropriate, other Department of Defense components.

Question. What is your understanding of how the AUMF intersects with the international law of armed conflict?

Answer. It is my understanding that the interpretation of the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force, a domestic law of the United States, is informed by principles of international law, specifically, by the law of armed conflict.

Question. In your view, does the Department of Defense have the legal authorities it needs to conduct military operations against entities responsible for September 11 and against those who plan further attacks against the United States?

Answer. The 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force provides broad legal authority for military operations against those responsible for the September 11 attacks and those harboring them, which authority has been applied to al Qaeda, the Taliban, and associated forces. In addition, the President could order military action to stop further attacks against the United States pursuant to his constitutional authority as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive, even if the terrorist threat was unrelated to al Qaeda, the Taliban, or an associated force. My understanding is that the existing authorities are believed to be adequate and appropriate for military operations to counter the current and immediately foreseeable terrorist threat.

Question. In your view, do existing legal authorities provide the U.S. military the legal flexibility it needs to respond to new and emerging terrorism threats?

Answer. Current Department of Defense strategy calls for increasing reliance on foreign partners as opposed to large-scale deployments of U.S. forces to address new and emerging terrorism threats. If confirmed, I look forward to examining whether new or revised legal authority for the U.S. military to support the efforts of foreign partners to respond to new and emerging threats is appropriate.

Question. Without the AUMF, would the U.S. military have the legal authority to use force, including deadly force against members of al Qaeda and associated forces? If so, under what circumstances?

Answer. The United States did, in fact, use military force against members of al Qaeda before the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force was enacted. If there were no 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force, the President would have authority as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive to order military action against al Qaeda and associated forces if necessary to protect an important national interest, as with an imminent threat of violent attack. There are, however, significant constitutional and statutory limitations on the scope and duration of military operations that the President may order in the absence of congressional authorization.

Question. What is the impact of the President's Policy Guidance on Counterterrorism on legal application of the AUMF with respect to counterterrorism operations?

Answer. The policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year, which govern the United States' use of force in counterterrorism operations outside the United States and areas of active hostilities, apply to military operations undertaken pursuant to the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force, although they do not apply to ongoing military operations in Afghanistan. Beyond the bedrock requirement of a legal basis—where the use of force is authorized under the 2001 Authorization for the Use of Military Force and hence would be legally permissible—the standards and procedures set forth additional requirements for when force should be used as a matter of policy, with particular emphasis on whether the action will protect American lives.

Question. In your view, would it be appropriate for the United States to use military force against terrorist groups that have not engaged in hostilities directly against the United States, but merely shown an intent to do so? If so, under what circumstances?

Answer. The use of military force may be appropriate when necessary to stop an imminent terrorist attack on the United States, U.S. persons or interests abroad, or a U.S. ally by a group that has not previously engaged in hostilities directly against the United States.

Question. What impact will the end of combat operations in Afghanistan at the end of 2014 have on the application of the AUMF?

Answer. I understand that the U.S. and NATO roles in Afghanistan after 2014 are still being discussed within the U.S. Government and NATO and negotiated with the Government of Afghanistan. I also note that the President recently committed to engaging Congress and the American people in efforts to refine, and ultimately repeal, the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force. Thus, I do not think one can predict today whether or how the 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force might be applied in Afghanistan after 2014.

Question. What is your understanding of the current status of the DOD Law of War Manual and what steps will you take, if confirmed, to complete this important document?

Answer. I am advised that the DOD Law of War Manual is in the final revision process managed by the DOD Law of War Working Group. That group is chaired by a representative from the DOD Office of General Counsel and is composed of representatives of the Judge Advocates General and the General Counsels of the military departments, the Staff Judge Advocate to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I understand that significant progress has been made through the concerted efforts of dedicated military and civilian lawyers within DOD and with assistance from colleagues at the Departments of State and Justice. If confirmed, I will support these efforts with a view to completing this important manual as expeditiously as possible.

UNMANNED SYSTEMS

Question. What are your views on whether the Department of Defense should assume greater responsibility for the operation of unmanned aerial systems (drones)?

Answer. The U.S. military has used remotely piloted aircraft since they were first developed to conduct intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance, as well as direct action during armed conflict. I support the administration's policy as it relates to the responsibility of the Department of Defense for the operation of such aircraft.

Question. What legal benefits or risks to national security would be implicated if the Department were to take the lead role in operating unmanned systems?

Answer. The role of the Department of Defense in operating remotely piloted aircraft, and associated benefits and risks, are chiefly policy considerations. If confirmed, my focus with respect to military operations using remotely piloted aircraft will be on the legal basis for such operations and compliance with applicable law in conducting such operations.

CONTRACTORS ON THE BATTLEFIELD

Question. U.S. military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan have relied on contractor support to a greater degree than any previous U.S. military operations. The extensive involvement of contractor employees in a broad array of activities—including security functions—has raised questions about the legal accountability of contractor employees for their actions.

Do you believe that current Department of Defense regulations appropriately define and limit the scope of security functions that may be performed by contractors in an area of combat operations?

Answer. I am not familiar with the referenced Department regulations in this area, but am prepared to review them, if confirmed.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to such regulations?

Answer. See answer above.

Question. Do you believe that current Department of Defense regulations appropriately define and limit the scope of contractor participation in the interrogation of detainees?

Answer. I am not familiar with the referenced Department regulations in this area, but am prepared to review them, if confirmed.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to such regulations?

Answer. See answer above.

Question. OMB Circular A–76 defines "inherently governmental functions" to include "discretionary functions" that could "significantly affect the life, liberty, or property of private persons".

In your view, is the performance of security functions that may reasonably be expected to require the use of deadly force in highly hazardous public areas in an area of combat operations an inherently governmental function?

Answer. I have not previously had any substantial involvement with this set of issues and am not familiar with how the concept of inherently governmental function has been defined and applied in this context. I am advised that by incorporating the definition from the Federal Activities Inventory Reform Act (title 31 U.S.C. 501 note), section 2463 of title 10, U.S.C., defines inherently governmental function as a function that is so intimately related to the public interest that it must be performed by government employees. If confirmed, I intend to look at the application of this provision with considerable care.

Question. In your view, is the interrogation of enemy prisoners of war and other detainees during and in the aftermath of hostilities an inherently governmental function?

Answer. See answer above.

Question. What role do you expect to play, if confirmed, in addressing the issue of what functions may appropriately be performed by contractors on the battlefield?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to be actively involved in addressing the legal issues relating to the proper role of contractors on the battlefield.

Question. The Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act (MEJA) was enacted in 2000 to extend the criminal jurisdiction of the U.S. courts to persons employed by or accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States.

In your view, does MEJA provide appropriate jurisdiction for alleged criminal actions of contractor employees in Iraq, Afghanistan, and other areas of combat operations?

Answer. I understand the importance of appropriate accountability for all persons supporting our Armed Forces wherever located. I am generally aware of the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 (MEJA), but I am not familiar with the particular provisions and how well they have served to provide criminal jurisdiction over contractor employees in areas of combat operations.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to MEJA?

Answer. I am not now in a position to propose any changes to MEJA. If confirmed, and if after further review I perceive a need, I will recommend any changes I believe to be warranted.

Question. What role would you expect to play, if confirmed, in developing administration recommendations for changes to MEJA?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to be actively involved in any effort to develop administration recommendations for changes to MEJA.

Question. Section 552 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2007 extended criminal jurisdiction of the military courts under the Uniform Code of Military Justice to persons serving with or accompanying an armed force in the field during time of declared war or a contingency operation, such as our current operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In your view, does the UCMJ provide appropriate jurisdiction for alleged criminal actions of contractor employees in Iraq, Afghanistan, and other areas of combat operations?

Answer. I support the position that civilians serving with or accompanying our Armed Forces overseas who commit crimes should be held appropriately accountable. I do not now have an informed view as to whether the UCMJ currently provides the appropriate criminal jurisdiction over contractor employees in areas of combat operations.

Question. What is your view of the procedures agreed upon by the Department of Defense and the Department of Justice to reconcile jurisdictional responsibilities under MEJA and the UCMJ?

Answer. I am aware generally that there are procedures to reconcile these responsibilities reflected in a Secretary of Defense memorandum of March 10, 2008. If confirmed, I am prepared to examine this memorandum and give thought to whether it reflects the appropriate balance.

Question. What changes, if any, would you recommend to the UCMJ to ensure appropriate jurisdiction for alleged criminal actions of contractor employees?

Answer. I have no recommendations for any such changes to the UCMJ at this time. If confirmed, and if after further review I perceive a need, I will recommend any changes I believe to be warranted.

MILITARY JUSTICE MATTERS

Question. Article 6 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice gives primary responsibility for legal advice concerning military justice to the Judge Advocates General.

What is your understanding of the General Counsel's functions with regard to military justice and the Judge Advocates General?

Answer. I understand that the General Counsel has a limited role in military justice, and no direct role in any particular military justice cases. The Secretary of Defense may become involved in military justice in limited circumstances. In those situations, the General Counsel provides legal advice to the Secretary.

The General Counsel is also responsible for designating a non-voting representative to the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice and may serve as an informal DOD liaison with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Question. In your view, how should the General Counsel approach military justice matters—both in terms of specific cases and general policy issues to provide useful advice without generating problems of unlawful command influence?

Answer. As with other senior civilian and military leaders within the Department, the General Counsel must avoid any action that may constitute, or may appear to constitute, unlawful command influence.

Question. The May 30, 2013 Defense Legal Policy Board (DLPB) report on military justice in combat zones recommended a change in joint doctrine to specify that discipline is the responsibility of Joint Force Commanders at all levels. The report recommended that this proposal should be presented to the DOD General Counsel and Secretary of Defense to be integrated into DOD and joint policy, and when appropriate, reviewed by the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice to be uniformly implemented by the Services.

In your view, is it essential to preserve the role of the military commander, including the Joint Force Commander in deployed situations, for disposition of military justice matters?

Answer. I understand that the May 30, 2013 report of the Subcommittee on Military Justice in Combat Zones and the Defense Legal Policy Board's June 14, 2013 memorandum transmitting that report to the Secretary of Defense endorsed the preservation of the role of the military commander, including the Joint Force Commander in deployed situations, in the disposition of military justice matters. As a general matter, I appreciate the central importance of the commander's role in the military justice system historically, but I am not sufficiently familiar with the subcommittee's report and the Board's memorandum to express a view on any recommendations in this regard. I look forward to reviewing them, if confirmed.

Question. What are your views on whether it would be appropriate to preserve the role of the commander as disposition authority, for the entire spectrum of military operations, from deployment to redeployment, in combat areas as well as in garrison?

Answer. I am not now prepared to offer specific assessments of the optimal command role in the disposition of allegations of crimes and other misconduct committed by servicemembers. If confirmed, I intend to look at this issue with considerable care.

Question. If confirmed, what action will you take to ensure that the recommendations of the DLPB with respect to military justice in combat zones are implemented by DOD and the services?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to review the recommendations of the Subcommittee and the Board, advise the Secretary of Defense with reference to those recommendations, and assist in seeking appropriate changes in policy, regulations or statutes to implement such recommendations as the Secretary adopts.

PREVENTION OF AND RESPONSE TO SEXUAL ASSAULTS

Question. In 2012, for the fourth year in a row, there were more than 3,000 reported cases of sexual assault in the military, including 2,558 unrestricted reports, and an additional 816 restricted reports (restricted, meaning that, in accordance with the victim's request, they were handled in a confidential manner and not investigated). Moreover, a recent survey conducted by the DOD indicates that the actual number of sexual offenses could be considerably higher, as 6.1 percent of Active Duty women and 1.2 percent of Active Duty men surveyed reported having experienced an incident of unwanted sexual contact in the previous 12 months.

What is your understanding of the role of the DOD General Counsel in addressing the problem of sexual assault in the military?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect to play an active role, as the Department's chief legal officer and as a member of the Secretary's senior leadership team, in the ongoing effort to eradicate this scourge from the military. I will oversee the attorneys currently advising the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness and the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office, assisting in the implementation of the 2013 DOD Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Strategic Plan, and supporting the important work of the Response Systems Panel. Beyond that, I hope to work with the Secretary and other Department leaders—and with this committee—to make sure that solving this problem remains a top priority, that no effort is spared to get a demonstrably effective system in place, and that any legal impediments are promptly addressed.

Question. Do you believe the DOD General Counsel's role in addressing the problem of sexual assault in the military is appropriate, and, if not, how should it be modified?

Answer. If confirmed, I will look at the role of the DOD General Counsel in addressing the problem of sexual assault in the military to assess whether I or my office can do any more to assist.

Question. What is your assessment of the DOD sexual assault prevention and response program?

Answer. As I understand it, sexual assault against servicemembers is a gravely serious problem and has been a longstanding one. The problem goes beyond the incidence of crimes involving sexual assault and includes concern about possible impediments to coming forward such as fear of retaliation and lack of confidence that action will be taken. The fact that the problem has persisted despite previous efforts directed at both prevention and response is disturbing and I expect deeply frustrating to those who have been working to end it. I am not sufficiently informed to express a personal view on the current DOD sexual assault prevention and response program. I understand that the program has undergone numerous changes, that several provisions from the past two authorization acts are being implemented, and that additional legislative proposals are under active consideration. If confirmed, I will do my level best working with DOD lawyers, Department leadership and Congress to rid the military of sexual assault.

Question. What is your view of the provision for restricted and unrestricted reporting of sexual assaults?

Answer. While I am not now in a position to express a personal view, I am advised that an unrestricted report of sexual assault allows law enforcement involvement and investigation, while restricted reporting allows a victim to disclose the details of the assault to specific individuals and receive medical treatment and counseling without involving law enforcement or triggering an automatic investigation. The goal of restricted reporting is to give the victim the support and confidence eventually to come forward with an unrestricted report so the offender can be held accountable and to strike an appropriate balance between the need for the prosecution of sexual offenders on the one hand and the privacy and physical and mental well-being of the victim on the other.

Question. What is your understanding of the adequacy of DOD oversight of military service implementation of the DOD and Service policies for the prevention of and response to sexual assaults?

Answer. While I am not now in a position to express a personal view, it is my understanding that there is robust oversight of the Department policies for the prevention of and response to sexual assaults. I am advised that the Secretary of Defense has a weekly accountability and assessment meeting with senior Department leaders and that DOD participates in the White House Health of the Force Group meetings to discuss DOD actions to combat sexual assault. I am also aware that the Secretary issued a Strategic Plan directing the Services to align their programs with the Strategic Plan, and that the Director, Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office hosts quarterly integrated product teams attended by senior leaders from the Services, National Guard Bureau, Office of Secretary of Defense, and Office of the DOD Inspector General. I also understand that the Joint Chiefs of Staff established a quarterly executive council to assess the effectiveness of sexual assault prevention and response across the joint force.

Question. What is your assessment of current DOD policy as it pertains to the legal issues surrounding the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault cases?

Answer. I am not now prepared to offer assessments with reference to the legal issues surrounding the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault cases. If confirmed, I will engage with the Judge Advocates General and other civilian and military leaders and subject matter experts to determine what issues, if any, need to be addressed.

Question. What is your view about the role of the chain of command in changing the military culture in which these sexual assaults have occurred?

Answer. I think the chain of command is instrumental in changing the military culture. Commanders are responsible for the good order and discipline of their units and are indispensable to creating a zero tolerance climate for sexual assaults. However, eradicating sexual assault cannot be limited to the chain of command—everyone has a role in changing military culture to ensure that servicemembers can serve without fear of sexual assault.

Question. In your view, what would be the impact of requiring judge advocates outside the chain of command, rather than commanders, to determine whether allegations of sexual assault should be prosecuted by the military?

Answer. I am not now in a position to express a personal view concerning the optimal roles of commanders and judge advocates in the disposition of sexual assault allegations. I understand that this is the subject of intense debate. If confirmed, I will examine the issue and hope to play a constructive role in the debate.

Question. Article 60 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice requires the convening authority to take action on the sentence issued by a court-martial and authorizes a convening authority, in his sole discretion, to take action of the findings of a court-martial, including setting aside a finding of guilty or changing a finding of guilty to a finding of guilty of a lessor included offense.

What is your view about the authority of a convening authority to set aside or modify findings of guilt and authority to reduce a sentence imposed by court-martial?

Answer. I understand that the Department has proposed legislation that would modify Article 60 by allowing convening authorities to amend findings of guilt only in those cases where the servicemember was acquitted of a more serious offense and the offense of which he was found guilty is a minor offense, not normally disposed of by court-martial. The Department's proposal would also require the convening authority to explain in writing any modifications made to the court-martial findings and sentence. I support this proposal. As to limiting the authority of the convening authority to modify a court-martial sentence, one would have to consider the consequences such a limitation would have on the ability to reach plea bargains in appropriate cases, such as where the victim wishes to avoid being called as a witness in a contested trial.

RELIGIOUS ACTIVITY IN THE ARMED FORCES

Question. What is your understanding of current policies and programs of the Department of Defense and the military services regarding religious practices in the military?

Answer. I understand that the Department of Defense has a long history of supporting, to the extent possible, the free exercise of religion by those servicemembers who choose to do so, while respecting the rights of those who do not.

Question. In your view, do policies concerning religious accommodation in the military appropriately accommodate the free exercise of religion and other beliefs, including individual expressions of belief, without impinging on those who have different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. I have not had the opportunity to study the Department's current policies in sufficient detail to allow me to make a judgment on the appropriateness of those policies. I understand that the current Department policy on religious accommodation is being revised. If confirmed, I intend to become involved in that revision process.

Question. Under current law and policy, are individual expressions of belief accommodated so long as they do not impact unit cohesion and good order and discipline?

Answer. Again, I am unable to make a judgment regarding the Department's current policies. However, I believe this question correctly highlights the considerations that must be balanced when considering religious accommodation: the individual servicemember's free exercise of religion or no religion, and the Department's requirement to maintain unit cohesion, good order and discipline, and the other elements that comprise military readiness.

Question. In your opinion, do existing policies and practices regarding public prayers offered by military chaplains in a variety of formal and informal settings strike the proper balance between a chaplain's ability to pray in accordance with his or her religious beliefs and the rights of other servicemembers with different beliefs, including no religious belief?

Answer. I believe that military chaplains perform a vital service not only for servicemembers and their families, but also for commanders as advisors. I also believe that military chaplains should be allowed to perform religious services in accordance with the tenets of their religions and without interference from the chain of command. While I am not in a position to opine on the existing policies and practices, I understand that the DOD policy governing the military chaplains' program is being revised, and, if confirmed, I intend to become involved in that revision process.

LEGAL ETHICS

Question. What is your understanding of the action a Department of Defense attorney should take if the attorney becomes aware of improper activities by a Department of Defense official who has sought the attorney's legal advice and the official is unwilling to follow the attorney's advice?

Answer. All Department attorneys are under an obligation to faithfully comply with all applicable laws and regulations, including regulatory reporting requirements. DOD Directive 5505.06, "Investigations of Allegations Against Senior Officials of the Department of Defense," requires referral to the DOD Inspector General of suspected misconduct by senior DOD officials, while DOD regulation, DOD 5500.07–R (Joint Ethics Regulation), requires DOD personnel to report suspected violations of the criminal and administrative rules on ethics and conflicts of interest to appropriate DOD authorities, e.g., the Defense Criminal Investigative Service.

Generally, if a DOD attorney learns of improper activities by an official who has sought his or her legal advice but is unwilling to follow it, the attorney should immediately notify appropriate authorities, usually his or her legal supervisor (or the senior attorney in the next higher level of his or her organization), for review and appropriate action by that higher level official. This is an appropriate way to escalate concerns to ensure that suitable corrective action is promptly taken.

Question. Do you believe that the present limits on pro bono activities of government attorneys are generally correct as a matter of policy or does the policy need to be reviewed?

Answer. In my judgment, participation in pro bono activities and professional legal associations contributes in a meaningful way to the continued professional development of the Federal legal workforce, and, if confirmed, I would encourage DOD attorneys to participate in pro bono activities consistent with the law. To my knowledge, the present limits on pro bono activities are appropriate. I understand that my predecessor issued a pro bono policy. If confirmed, I am prepared to review that policy to ensure it meets the current needs of DOD and the attorneys who wish to contribute their services.

As you may know, two Federal statutes prohibit (with only minor exceptions) Federal personnel from representing clients before the Federal Government, including the Federal courts. That said, I am aware that there are a number of opportunities for DOD attorneys to participate in a variety of pro bono activities, including drafting wills and representing clients in domestic violence cases, landlord/tenant disputes, and personal injury cases, when those matters are before state rather than Federal courts.

Question. In your view, do the laws, regulations and guidelines that establish the rules of professional responsibility for attorneys in the Department of Defense provide adequate guidance?

Answer. To my knowledge, the laws, regulations, and guidelines that establish rules of professional responsibility for DOD attorneys are appropriate. If confirmed, I am prepared to examine the adequacy of the professional responsibility rules for attorneys in the DOD Office of General Counsel and the Defense Legal Services Agency, and make appropriate modifications or issue supplemental guidance if warranted.

LAW OF THE SEA

Question. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) is currently pending in the Senate.

What are your views whether or not the United States should accede to UNCLOS?

Answer. I support U.S. accession to the Law of the Sea Convention, and I know that the administration including Secretary Hagel strongly supports accession. Although we have succeeded to date in preserving and protecting our navigational freedoms through reliance on customary international law, joining the Convention would place our national security on a firmer legal footing. Customary international law changes over time, subject to state practice. Treaty law remains the firmest legal foundation upon which to base our global presence.

Question. From a national security standpoint, what do you see as the legal advantages and disadvantages of the United States being a party to UNCLOS?

Answer. I agree with Secretary Hagel that becoming a party to the Law of the Sea Convention would enhance the U.S. security posture around the globe in several significant ways. First, accession would enable the United States to reinforce all of the rights, freedoms, and uses of the sea and airspace codified in the Convention, including the navigational and over-flight rights that are critical to the global mobility of U.S. forces, as well as the right to submit extended continental shelf claims that would help us preserve the rights to potential resources. Additionally, accession would help the United States promote a common rules-based approach in the resolution of territorial and maritime disputes, particularly in East Asia, thereby reducing international tension. Further, accession would add to the Department's credibility in a large number of multilateral venues where Law of the Sea matters are often discussed. Lastly, accession would reassure some nations that have expressed concerns over the legality of cooperative security efforts promoted by the United States, such as the Proliferation Security Initiative. The United States has longstanding interests in freedom of the seas and respect for international law, and our accession to the Convention would further demonstrate our commitment to those national interests.

I do not see national security disadvantages of being a party to the Convention. Although some have suggested that the treaty could subject our maritime forces to the jurisdiction of international tribunals, the Convention expressly permits a party to exclude from international dispute settlement those matters that concern "military activities." Thus, the United States could assert the exclusive right to determine what constitutes a military activity.

Question. In your view, is customary international law alone sufficient to safeguard U.S. navigational and overflight rights and freedoms worldwide?

Answer. As noted above, accession would enable the United States to reinforce all of the rights, freedoms, and uses of the sea and airspace codified in the Convention, including the navigational and over-flight rights that are critical to the global mobility of U.S. forces. Although we have succeeded to date in preserving and protecting our navigational freedoms through reliance on customary international law, joining the Convention would place our national security on a firmer legal footing. Customary international law changes over time, subject to state practice. Treaty law remains the firmest legal foundation upon which to base our global presence.

PROCESSING THE ANNUAL DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE LEGISLATIVE REQUEST

Question. One of the current responsibilities of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense is to coordinate the Department's legislative program and to provide the Department's views on legislative proposals initiated from outside the Department.

If confirmed, what actions will you take to ensure that the Department's legislative proposals are submitted in a timely manner to ensure ample opportunity for consideration by Congress before markup of the annual National Defense Authorization Act?

Answer. I understand that the Office of General Counsel and the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs have worked, and continue to work, closely together on improvements to the Department's Legislative Program—in consultation with the Office of Management and Budget—to transmit the Department's legislative proposals to Congress in a timely manner. If confirmed, I will monitor these efforts and look for any ways in which the process can be improved.

Question. What actions would you take, if confirmed, to ensure Congress receives the Department's views on other proposed legislation in a timely manner?

Answer. I understand that the Office of General Counsel has worked closely with the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs and the Office of Management and Budget to respond to request for views on congressional bills expeditiously. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the Department provides Congress with timely views on proposed legislation.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Question. What is your understanding of the appropriate role of the Article III courts in the review of military activities?

Answer. Judicial review of ongoing military operations would pose difficult constitutional and practical difficulties. Many of the military's other activities are appropriately subject to judicial review, though the courts often exercise "a healthy deference to legislative and executive judgments in the area of military affairs." Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 66 (1981).

ROLE IN THE OFFICER PROMOTION AND CONFIRMATION PROCESS

Question. In your view, what is the role of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense in ensuring the integrity and proper functioning of the officer promotion process?

Answer. It is essential that the integrity and independence of the promotion selection process be maintained. Based on my prior service at the Department of Defense, I know that the Secretary of each military department, in consultation with his or her General Counsel and Judge Advocate General, has the initial responsibility to ensure that the promotion selection process for both Regular and Reserve officers is in compliance with law and DOD policy. However, I am also aware that all reports of promotion selection boards are reviewed by the DOD Office of General Counsel prior to final action on the report by the Secretary of Defense or the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

If confirmed and I were to determine that a promotion selection board failed to conform to law or policy, it would be my duty to inform the Secretary of Defense or Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness of the irregularities and to recommend appropriate corrective action. Further, in providing advice to the Secretary of Defense and the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, I would ensure that officer promotion policies promulgated in DOD regulations fairly and accurately reflect the law.

Question. What is the role of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, if any, in reviewing and providing potentially adverse information pertaining to a nomination to the Senate Armed Services Committee?

Answer. It is my understanding that the DOD Office of General Counsel reviews all nomination packages pertaining to officers with attributed adverse information before the package is forwarded to the Secretary of Defense for approval. The General Counsel ensures that any adverse information attributed to such officers is supported by evidence in the associated reports of investigation. I am informed that the General Counsel frequently provides specific advice to the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness and the Secretary of Defense concerning difficult or unusual cases.

LITIGATION INVOLVING THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Question. In your opinion, what is the relationship between the Department of Defense and the Department of Justice with respect to litigation involving the Department of Defense?

Answer. Although the Department of Justice has statutory responsibility to represent the United States, its agencies, and its officers, including the Department of Defense, in all litigation matters, Department of Defense attorneys often work directly with counsel at the Department of Justice in cases in which DOD, or one or more of its components or officials, is a party or has an interest.

Question. In your view, does the Department need more independence and resources to conduct its own litigation or to improve upon its current supporting role?

Answer. At this time, I am not aware that any changes are needed. My understanding is that the Department's lawyers have exceptionally strong relationships with their counterparts at the Department of Justice, and that the current arrangement serves the Department well.

COURT OF APPEALS DECISION

Question. On January 4, 2000, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit decided the case of National Center for Manufacturing Sciences v. Department of Defense, 199 F. 3d 507 (D.C. Cir. 2000). The court concluded that "Because of the existence of title 10 U.S.C. section 114, it is clear that any monies appropriated for NCMS by Congress for research must be authorized before they can be appropriated and distributed"; and "Because title 10 U.S.C. section 114(a)(2) requires authorization of these funds before they become available, appropriation alone is insufficient."

What is your view of the court's decision in this case and its implications regarding the obligation of funds that are appropriated, but not authorized?

Answer. I am aware of the concerns about whether funds can be utilized that are appropriated but not authorized. In this regard, situations where funds have been appropriated but not authorized are often complex and may involve unique statutory language. The Department has always been sensitive to the concerns that exist whenever the amounts appropriated may exceed the amounts authorized and, even before the 2000 decision cited in the question, has worked closely with the authorizing and appropriating committees when such situations arise. If confirmed, I hope and expect that the Department, and the DOD General Counsel, will continue its practice of working closely with our oversight committees whenever this situation appears to be presented.

ROLE IN MILITARY PERSONNEL POLICY MATTERS

Question. What role, if any, should the General Counsel play in military personnel policy and individual cases, including cases before the service boards for the correction of military records?

Answer. The potential range of issues that might require legal advice from the Office of General Counsel is very broad. The Office of General Counsel provides legal advice on policy issues pertaining to military personnel, working closely with the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, which has responsibility for Department policy for the correction boards of the military departments. The Office of General Counsel performs a pre-publication legal sufficiency review of every DOD policy issuance pertaining to military personnel.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed for this high position, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the General Counsel of the Department of Defense?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN

NEW LAW OF WAR MANUAL

1. Senator LEVIN. Mr. Preston, is there a consensus among the senior military lawyers of the four Services that the new Law of War manual, as it has been rewritten, accurately and adequately reflects the law governing U.S. Armed Forces?

Mr. PRESTON. I have been informed that the draft DOD Law of War manual is still in the final revision process. My understanding is that senior military lawyers of the four Services are helping to revise it and are integral to the review process, and that they will continue to be actively involved until the manual is completed and ready for publication. If confirmed, I intend to consult with the senior military lawyers in this regard.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATORS CARL LEVIN AND MARK UDALL

DETENTION AND INTERROGATION ISSUES

2. Senator LEVIN and Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, on June 27, 2013, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) submitted its formal response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence's (SSCI) Study of the CIA's Detention and Interrogation Program. What was your role in the review and approval of the CIA response to the SSCI's study?

Mr. PRESTON. My role with respect to the Agency's response to the SSCI's study is perhaps best understood in the context of my broader role as General Counsel of the CIA. For the past 4-plus years, my highest priority as General Counsel has been working to ensure that the Agency is and remains in full compliance with all applicable law in the conduct of intelligence activities, with particular attention to ongoing counterterrorism programs. With respect to the former detention and interrogation program, which was ended by Executive Order prior to my arrival, the primary focus of the Office of General Counsel during my tenure has been on supporting the work of the Department of Justice and the SSCI in their respective reviews of the former detention and interrogation program, with particular emphasis on the document production process, as well as supporting the U.S. Government's efforts to criminally prosecute terrorist detainees.

The preparation of Agency comments following receipt of the SSCI report was undertaken at the direction of the then-Acting Director and performed by a team of senior career officers. The product of their work was ultimately submitted to the Director, via the Deputy Director, for approval. My involvement in this process was limited. I did not personally participate in the team's formulation of substantive comments, nor did I independently review the factual basis for their findings and conclusions. I reviewed the comments, with particular attention to the recommendations, and made suggestions, chiefly as to presentation, in hopes of enhancing the utility of the comments, to the agency and the committee, in the discussion between them that would follow. My role was principally one of advising the Director and the Deputy Director as they considered how best to engage with the committee in light of its report and, of critical importance, how to improve the Agency's conduct and oversight of other sensitive programs going forward.

3. Senator LEVIN and Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, on November 20, 2008, the Senate Armed Services Committee issued a report titled, Inquiry into the Treatment of Detainees in U.S. Custody. Have you reviewed this report?

Mr. PRESTON. I reviewed portions of the referenced report in 2009, prior to my appointment as General Counsel of the CIA.

4. Senator LEVIN and Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, do you disagree with any of the report's conclusions? If so, which ones and why?

Mr. PRESTON. I do not recall having any disagreement with the report's conclusions. I should point out that I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts or record underlying the report to offer a personal view on factual propositions. As I recall, a central focus of the report is on the U.S. Government's reliance on Survival, Evasion, Resistance, and Escape (SERE) techniques in deriving interrogation techniques that were used on detainees. While I have no expertise in SERE training or methods of interrogation, it is my firm view that the fact that certain techniques have been used to train servicemembers in withstanding abusive treatment if captured is not indicative of the effectiveness of those techniques in obtaining information from detainees, nor does it say anything about the lawfulness or propriety of using such techniques to interrogate detainees.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

BONUSES PAID TO SENIOR EXECUTIVE SERVICE EMPLOYEES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

5. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Preston, if confirmed, will you commit to reviewing and changing, if necessary, the metrics used to determine the performance level of Senior Executive Service (SES) employees in the Office of General Counsel and provide information to this committee regarding the progress and results of your review?

Mr. PRESTON. As General Counsel of the Department of the Navy and the Principal Deputy General Counsel of the Department of Defense, I worked closely with the SES level attorneys in the DOD Office of General Counsel. I was impressed by their uniform professional excellence, selfless dedication, and commitment to the rule of law. My view of the outstanding performance of these SES level attorneys has been strengthened during my service as the CIA General Counsel. In a period of furloughs, pay freezes, and hiring freezes, it is unlikely that funds will be available to pay bonuses, increasing the challenge of keeping the Office of General Counsel staffed with superb lawyers. Nonetheless, if confirmed, I will review the criteria used to evaluate the performance of SES level attorneys in the Office of General Counsel and report the results of that review as you request. If I determine that changes are necessary, I will implement them.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MARK UDALL

LAW OF WAR MANUAL

6. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, it is my understanding that in 1995, DOD decided to prepare a single, department-wide manual on the Law of War. This was designed to be an authoritative, peer-reviewed statement of the Law of War as recognized by the United States, based on both treaty obligations and state practice. I also understand that a Law of War Working Group, consisting of experts from the Services and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) Office of the General Counsel was formed in 1996 and charged with drafting the new manual. There were experts from the State Department and law of war experts from a number of other countries that provided input and advice during the drafting process. The Department of Justice (DOJ) was invited to join the process, but declined. I also understand that in 2009, a 1000 page draft underwent international peer review by senior military law experts from Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom (U.K.) as well as experts from academic institutions in the United States and the U.K. I also understand that in 2010, when the draft manual was in the final stages, the DOJ intervened and requested an opportunity to review the draft—despite having declined to participate earlier. I also understand that despite commitments made to the DOD General Counsel that the DOJ review would be limited to substantive issues and would be conducted within a month, the DOJ review has yet to be completed. I also have received information indicating that the changes proposed by DOJ to date have been at odds with the tenets and principles of the Law of War reflected in the peer-reviewed draft of 2010, to the point that it seems unlikely that the current draft as changed would be able to gain consensus as an authoritative statement of the Law of War either within DOD or more broadly. If confirmed, will you commit to providing the committee as soon as possible information detailing the current status of the draft Manual?

Mr. PRESTON. If confirmed, I will inquire into the current status of the draft DOD Law of War manual and provide the committee information detailing its status as soon as possible. As I noted in response to an earlier question, it is my understanding that the Law of War manual is undergoing internal review, and that that senior military lawyers of the four Services are helping to revise it and are integral to the review process, and that they will continue to be actively involved until the manual is completed and ready for publication.

7. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, if confirmed, will you commit to providing the committee in written form your independent assessment of whether the background summary above is accurate, and, if you conclude that some or all of the information above is inaccurate or incomplete, to advising the committee in detail about which information is inaccurate or incomplete, and what the correct information is?

Mr. PRESTON. If confirmed, I will inquire into the current status of the draft DOD Law of War manual and provide the committee information detailing its status as soon as possible. As I noted in response to an earlier question, it is my understanding that the Law of War manual is undergoing internal review, and that that senior military lawyers of the four Services are helping to revise it and are integral to the review process, and that they will continue to be actively involved until the manual is completed and ready for publication.

8. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, if confirmed, will you commit to taking such steps as may be necessary to ensure that content and form of the draft Manual is such that it is suitable both as a peer-reviewed, authoritative statement of the Law of War as accepted by the United States, and as a practical guide, incorporating historical examples, for Law of War practitioners, especially those deployed with U.S. operational forces?

Mr. PRESTON. If confirmed, I will take such steps within my power as may be necessary to ensure that the content and form of the draft DOD Law of War manual reflects input from peer reviewers and is suitable both as an authoritative statement of the Law of War as accepted by the United States, and as a practical guide for Law of War practitioners, especially those deployed with U.S. operational forces. Historical examples should inform and illustrate the manual as appropriate.

STUDY ON DETENTION AND INTERROGATION PROGRAM

9. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, having reviewed the SSCI's study and participated in the CIA's response, do you believe that DOJ was always provided accurate information about the CIA's detention and interrogation program? If not, do you believe that any inaccurate information was material to DOJ's legal analysis?

Mr. PRESTON. My understanding is that DOJ did not always have accurate information about the detention and interrogation program in that the actual conduct of that program was not always consistent with the way the program had been described to DOJ. Of particular note, I understand that, in a number of instances, enhanced interrogation techniques, specifically waterboarding, were applied substantially more frequently than previously had been described to DOJ. I cannot say what DOJ would or would not have considered material at the time. I can tell you that, if I were in a comparable situation, I would consider information of this nature to be material.

While I have been General Counsel of the CIA, the relationship between the Agency and DOJ's Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) has been characterized by frequent and candid communication concerning the Agency's sensitive programs, with particular attention to ensuring that the OLC is provided complete and accurate information on which to base its legal advice to the Agency. In addition, the Agency is developing an internal mechanism for periodically and systematically reviewing OLC opinions regarding sensitive programs to ensure that OLC is informed of any material changes in facts or circumstances.

COVERT ACTION/SECRET MILITARY OPERATIONS

10. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, in your response to my questions about the difference between covert action and secret military operations, you noted that you had not yet "wrestled with how one would advise the U.S. military on the precise parameters of that concept, and the precise concept of attribution in the military context." I'd like to give you another opportunity to answer my set of questions, which I'll list again here: In your view, when does a secret military operation meet the statutory definition of covert action and require a finding, and when does it not?

Mr. PRESTON. While as CIA General Counsel I have not been called upon to advise with respect to the conduct of military operations, I would consider a secret military operation to meet the statutory definition of covert action: (a) if it were "an activity or activities of the U.S. Government to influence political, economic, or military conditions abroad, where it is intended that the role of the U.S. Government will not be apparent or acknowledged publicly," and (b) if such activity did not fall under one of the four statutory exceptions:

(1) activities the primary purpose of which is to acquire intelligence, traditional counterintelligence activities, traditional activities to improve or maintain the operational security of U.S. Government programs, or administrative activities;
(2) traditional diplomatic or military activities or routine support to such activities;
(3) traditional law enforcement activities conducted by U.S. Government law enforcement agencies or routine support to such activities; or

(4) activities to provide routine support to the overt activities (other than activities described in paragraph (1), (2), or (3)) of other U.S. Government agencies abroad.

It is my understanding that the Department of Defense conducts activities that fall under each of those four exceptions. Whether a particular secret military operation falls within one of the statutory exceptions to the definition of covert action or, absent attribution, would constitute covert action that must be authorized by the President under a Finding requires a fact-specific analysis, informed by historical military practice and precedent. If confirmed, I look forward to examining these matters with great care and attention.

11. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, if the military refuses to answer the public's questions about a reported operation, does it become a covert action? If not, what is the basis for that denial? As an example, why are unacknowledged 1208 assistance programs not covert action?

Mr. PRESTON. The fact that certain information regarding a military operation is not discussed publicly does not necessarily mean that the operation constitutes covert action. As defined by the statute, covert action is an activity or activities to "influence political, economic, or military conditions abroad, where it is intended that the role of the U.S. Government will not be apparent or acknowledged publicly," subject to specific exceptions. Thus, for example, military operations that are traditional intelligence, counterintelligence, or military activities and routine support to such activities are excepted from the statutory definition of covert action. Further, my understanding is that a particular secret military operation conducted in the context of broader campaigns that are publicly known is not regarded as covert action, which by definition must be neither "apparent" nor "acknowledged publicly".

While I am not familiar with programs under section 1208, I understand that certain aspects of the support provided under the authority of section 1208 are classified to protect the operation and the personnel involved. I am further advised that support provided under the authority of section 1208 to operations by U.S. Special Operations Forces to combat terrorism is not considered covert action because it is explicitly authorized by Congress and because it falls within the exception to section 503 of the National Security Act for a "traditional military activity." I also understand that the Department of Defense fully informs Congress about activities under the authority of section 1208, in accordance with the reporting requirements of that section.

If confirmed, I expect to examine these matters with great care and attention.

12. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, under what circumstances can a secret military program, as distinct from a particular technical operation, be briefed only to the chairman and ranking member?

Mr. PRESTON. It is my understanding that in the context of special access programs (SAPs) of the Department of Defense, there is a narrow set of circumstances under which the Secretary of Defense may determine that certain very sensitive information be reported only to the chairman and the ranking member of the congressional defense committees. Section 119 of title 10, U.S.C., ensures congressional oversight of DOD SAPs by requiring, inter alia, annual reports to the congressional defense committees on each SAP, as well as reports on initiation and termination of individual SAPs. In addition, section 119(e) provides that, only on a "case-by-case basis," the Secretary of Defense may waive a SAP reporting requirement, if the Secretary determines that the inclusion of the required information "would adversely affect the national security." If the Secretary exercises this authority, the Secretary must provide the omitted information and the justification for the waiver, jointly to the chairman and ranking member of each of the defense committees. The congressional defense committees that receive these reports (including those whose chairman and ranking member receive the "waived" SAP information) are the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on Appropriations, and the Defense Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on Appropriations, and the Subcommittee on Defense of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

In the event that a secret military program consisted of activities to be conducted pursuant to a Presidential Finding authorizing covert action, then the congressional reporting requirements in section 503 of the National Security Act would apply.

AUTHORITY FOR USE OF MILITARY FORCE/LAW OF ARMED CONFLICT

13. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, under what circumstances, if any, can military operations be initiated outside a declared war zone without the concurrence of the President, the Secretary of Defense, or the U.S. chief of mission in the country?

Mr. PRESTON. The President and the Secretary of Defense are at the top of the military chain of command and have full authority for direction and control of military operations. I understand that, in circumstances such as sudden attack or disaster, theater military commanders have certain delegated authority to initiate appropriate military responses as necessary to save lives and protect the forces under their command. All such operations remain subject to the direction and control of the President and the Secretary of Defense.

Chiefs of mission are not in the military chain of command. I understand that, in some circumstances, the President or the Secretary of Defense has approved military operations on the condition that, if the chief of mission expresses disagreement with an activity, the theater military commander will resolve the disagreement or seek further guidance from the Secretary of Defense before proceeding with the activity. This ensures that the views of chiefs of mission regarding potential military operations outside a war zone are fully considered while also preserving the military chain of command.

14. Senator UDALL. Mr. Preston, in your advance questions for the committee, you stated that "If there were no 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force, the President would have authority as Commander-in-Chief and Chief Executive to order military action against al Qaeda and associated forces if necessary to protect an important national interest, as with an imminent threat of violent attack."

Please elaborate on your statement regarding the President's authority to order military operations outside any Authorized for the Use of Force (AUMF) to "protect an important national interest." Do you view this authority as broader than imminent threat?

Mr. PRESTON. In my response, I noted imminent threat in particular as it would be the probable basis for ordering action against al Qaeda or in the broader counterterrorism context. I am aware of opinions of the Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice, that address the President's authority to order certain military operations without the prior, express authorization of Congress. Most recently, the April 2011 opinion regarding Authority to Use Military Force in Libya stated that the Office of Legal Counsel has identified a variety of national interests that, alone or in combination, may justify use of military force by the President. I understand that an "imminent threat" is one possible circumstance in which it might be lawful and appropriate for the President to order military operations without prior congressional authorization, but that imminent threat is not the only circumstance when this may be appropriate. I also note that there are important limitations on the scope and duration of military operations that the President may order in the absence of congressional authorization.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

SEXUAL ASSAULT IN THE MILITARY

15. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Preston, DOD is adamantly opposed to taking sexual assault cases out of the chain of command. If confirmed, your advice to the Secretary of Defense on this matter will be very important. Sexual assault is not a new challenge to the military. You are familiar with this because you served as the Navy's general counsel in the late 1990s. How has your experience with the Navy shaped your views on the role of the chain of command in sexual assault cases?

Mr. PRESTON. My prior experience as General Counsel of the Department of the Navy and as the Principal Deputy General Counsel of the Department of Defense enhances my understanding of the importance of the chain of command to a military organization and the historical integration of the military justice system into the command structure. However, I have not prejudged the optimal role of the commander in the process of adjudicating sexual assault allegations in the military. I am aware that the Response Systems Panel established under section 576 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2013 is tasked with providing the Secretary of Defense and Congress with an assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the military's systems to respond to sexual assaults. The Panel's work will include an assessment of the roles and effectiveness of commanders at all levels. If confirmed, I will consider with an open mind the appropriate role of the chain of command in sexual assault cases and provide my best advice to the Secretary.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR TIM KAINE

AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF MILITARY FORCE

16. Senator KAINE. Mr. Preston, what is your understanding of the scope, duration, and limitations of the 2001 AUMF?

Mr. PRESTON. The 2001 AUMF encompasses those who are part of, or substantially support, al Qaeda, the Taliban, or associated forces. Courts and Congress, in the context of detention, have endorsed the Executive branch view that the AUMF applies to associated forces that have joined the fight with al Qaeda and against the United States. My understanding of the concept of associated forces is that it is narrow, reaching only forces of an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda and a co-belligerent with al Qaeda in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners.

With respect to geographic limitations, the enemy in this conflict has not confined itself to any one country. The AUMF does not restrict the use military of force against al Qaeda to areas of active hostilities such as Afghanistan. Moreover, the United States can, consistent with international law, prosecute the armed conflict with al Qaeda outside such areas. U.S. military operations are conducted consistent with international law and with respect for another State's sovereignty. With reference to the use of force in counterterrorism operations outside the United States and areas of active hostilities, U.S. military operations are also subject to the policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year.

The President has said that our systematic effort to dismantle terrorist organizations must continue, but that the war against al Qaeda, like all wars, must end. The President has also invited engagement with Congress on the future of the AUMF. As for the duration of the conflict with al Qaeda and continuing authority to counter terrorist threats post conflict, I believe our system works best when there is agreement between the two political branches on how the Nation should proceed. If confirmed, I hope to play a constructive role in that process.

17. Senator KAINE. Mr. Preston, is there a need for AUMF reform now, given combat forces are being withdrawn from Afghanistan?

Mr. PRESTON. Although there will come a point when al Qaeda, the Taliban, and associated forces have been so degraded and dismantled that the United States is no longer be in an ongoing armed conflict, the end of the U.S. combat role in Afghanistan will not necessarily mark that point. However, it does draw attention to the duration of the conflict with al Qaeda and continuing authority to counter terrorist threats post conflict. The President has invited engagement with Congress on the future of the AUMF. If confirmed, I look forward to participating in that discussion.

18. Senator KAINE. Mr. Preston, does the President have the authority needed to conduct operations ongoing anywhere else in the world and, if not, should he come to Congress to get such an authority on a case-by-case basis?

Mr. PRESTON. It is the considered view of the Department of Defense that the President has adequate authority to conduct military operations against al Qaeda, the Taliban, and associated forces. Consistent with the AUMF, the authority to use military force against al Qaeda is not restricted geographically to "hot" battlefields like Afghanistan. Indeed, as outlined in the President's recent War Powers reports to Congress, such military operations have been conducted in Yemen and Somalia, in addition to Afghanistan. My understanding is that the existing authorities are believed to be adequate and appropriate for military operations to counter the current and immediately foreseeable threat. Although the President has the authority to respond as necessary to new threats, I believe the President would consult with Congress to determine if additional authority is appropriate.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

INTERNATIONAL LAW

19. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, if a proposed action by DOD is fully in compliance with U.S. law but there is a question of whether the proposed action is permitted under international law, customary international law, or international law principles, does this ambiguity affect or negate the ability of DOD to carry out the proposed action?

Mr. PRESTON. My understanding is that the United States complies with all applicable international law when it uses military force in a foreign country. Any question in this regard should be resolved if at all possible, and any remaining ambiguity should be brought to the attention of the decisionmaker. If confirmed, I would work closely with my colleagues, including the Legal Counsel to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and counsel for the other national security agencies, to ensure that U.S. military operations abroad comply with both U.S. domestic and applicable international law.

AUTHORIZED FOR THE USE OF FORCE

20. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, does the AUMF apply to groups which formed after the events of September 11, 2001?

Mr. PRESTON. The AUMF applies to "those nations, organizations or persons [the President] determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons."

A group that formed after the events of September 11, 2001, may be within the scope of the AUMF if the group is an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda and it is a co-belligerent with al Qaeda in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners. The Executive branch refers to such groups as "associated forces" of al Qaeda, and this interpretation of the AUMF to reach "associated forces" has been supported by the courts and Congress.

21. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, does the AUMF only apply to those groups which only believe in al Qaeda's ideology?

Mr. PRESTON. The AUMF applies to al Qaeda, the Taliban, and associated forces. The AUMF does not apply to groups solely because they are ideologically aligned with al Qaeda. Instead, to be an associated force, the group must be an organized, armed group that has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda and a co-belligerent with al Qaeda in hostilities against the United States and its coalition partners.

22. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, does the AUMF apply to groups which support al Qaeda's ideology and have taken violent action, but not against the United States, and the group has not received tangible support from al Qaeda?

Mr. PRESTON. The determination of whether a group is an associated force turns on whether the group has entered the fight alongside al Qaeda and is engaged in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners. Such a determination is necessarily dependent on specific facts and circumstances.

23. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, do you foresee a time in which the administration will support modifying the AUMF?

Mr. PRESTON. In his recent speech at National Defense University, the President invited engagement with Congress in efforts to refine, and ultimately repeal, the AUMF.

GUANTANAMO BAY DETAINEES

24. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, if we were to close Guantanamo Bay and transfer the detainees to the United States for trial in civilian court would we not have to provide Miranda rights advice and warnings to the detainees thereby greatly reducing our ability to collect intelligence from them?

Mr. PRESTON. While I have not focused on this issue in the performance of my current duties, my understanding is as follows. Transferring detainees to the United States for prosecution would not be expected to reduce our ability to collect valuable intelligence. Most of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay have been in U.S. custody for at least 10 years, so there has already been significant opportunity for intelligence collection. There is also no requirement to provide Miranda warnings prior to intelligence questioning if statements derived from that questioning are not used in a criminal proceeding. Furthermore, a long and growing list of terrorism suspects who have been prosecuted in our Federal courts—to include Najibullah Zazi, Faisal Shahzad, David Headley, and Umar Faruq Abdulmutallab—have provided extremely valuable intelligence while they were held by law enforcement before trial. The prospect of a long prison sentence has led many hardened terrorists to cooperate with our intelligence professionals.

NEW COUNTERTERRORISM PROCEDURES

25. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, during the Vietnam war some criticized the layers of bureaucracy which obstructed the timely authorization for an attack on legitimate military targets. In the current conflict, as in the Vietnam war, targets of opportunity can come and go in a moment's notice. Therefore, won't the new procedures articulated in the administration's Fact Sheet: U.S. Policy Standards and Procedures for the Use of Force in Counterterrorism Operations Outside the United States and Areas if Active Hostilities, complicate and add to the length of time required to target an overseas, non-U.S. citizen member of al Qaeda?

Mr. PRESTON. I agree that agility and timeliness are important attributes in a decisionmaking process for approving military targets and authorizing military action against such targets. My understanding is that the policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year were developed in close consultation with the departments and agencies with national security responsibilities, including specifically civilian and military leaders responsible for military operations abroad, and with the objective of having a decisionmaking process that would be practically workable and yield timely decisions. In addition, the policy standards and procedures include a reservation by the President permitting action to be taken in extraordinary circumstances.

26. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, will these additional layers of bureaucracy not lead to targets of opportunity being missed?

Mr. PRESTON. As noted, the policy standards and procedures were developed with the objective of having a decisionmaking process that would be practically workable and yield timely decisions. In addition, risk in this regard should be mitigated by the reservation by the President permitting a departure from otherwise applicable standards and procedures in extraordinary circumstances.

27. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, do these policies unnecessarily obstruct our ability to fight the war?

Mr. PRESTON. As noted, the policy standards and procedures were developed in close consultation with the departments and agencies with national security responsibilities, including specifically civilian and military leaders responsible for military operations abroad. I would defer to those leaders on this question, and I do not believe the policy would have been adopted if those leaders believed it would unnecessarily obstruct our ability to fight the war.

28. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Preston, it appears the administration has implemented special procedures to address its concerns that U.S. citizens who are members of al Qaeda or its affiliates should still be afforded a level of due process review before lethal force is taken pursuant to the AUMF of 2001. These procedures were outlined by Attorney General Eric Holder in his address at Northwestern Law School in 2012. Though this appears to be a sensible approach regarding U.S. citizens, it now appears, as articulated in President Obama's May 2013 speech, that the administration will use a similar review before targeting terrorists who are non-U.S. citizens and are located outside areas of active hostilities. Does this create a situation in which overseas terrorists are provided with similar constitutional protections as overseas U.S. citizens who have taken up arms against their own country?

Mr. PRESTON. In his recent speech at National Defense University, the President noted that the targeting of a U.S. citizen raises constitutional issues that are not present in other actions. The President also described a threshold for taking lethal action outside areas of active hostilities that applies regardless of whether the terrorist target is a U.S. citizen. I understand that this threshold—and the rest of the policy standards and procedures announced at the time of the President's speech—have been instituted as a matter of policy. To the best of my knowledge, neither the threshold, nor the other standards and procedures constitutes or reflects any legal judgment or intent to extend Due Process or any other rights to foreign nationals abroad.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR KELLY AYOTTE

DRONE POLICY

29. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Preston, based on your current role as General Counsel for the CIA, from a perspective of how best to protect our country and go after those who want to kill Americans, what are the advantages and disadvantages of shifting most or all drone attacks from the CIA to DOD?

Mr. PRESTON. With reference to this question and the two questions that follow, I could not comment in this setting on any intelligence activities.

I understand that attacking America's enemies in armed conflict is a traditional competency of the U.S. military and that the U.S. military has extensive experience in the use of remotely piloted aircraft to conduct attacks during armed conflict. The appropriate role of the Department of Defense in operating remotely piloted aircraft, weighing advantages and disadvantages, is essentially a policy decision for the President to make. If confirmed, my focus with respect to military operations using remotely piloted aircraft will be on the legal basis for such operations and compliance with applicable law in conducting such operations.

30. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Preston, will drone attacks operated by DOD confront more legal constraints?

Mr. PRESTON. The use of military force against the Nation's enemies, whether by remotely piloted aircraft or other means, is subject to the Constitution and U.S. laws, to the law of war, and to the direction and control of the President and the Secretary of Defense. I am aware that the U.S. military uses remotely piloted aircraft to attack terrorists consistent with all applicable law and, if confirmed, I would review such operations for compliance with all applicable law.

31. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Preston, will fewer drone attacks be conducted because of additional legal constraints?

Mr. PRESTON. The number of attacks by the U.S. military, whether using remotely piloted aircraft or by other means, depends on a variety of factors, circumstances and judgments, such that it would be difficult to isolate the impact, if any, of legal constraints on that number.

DETAINEE POLICY

32. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Preston, President Obama has sought to close Naval Station, Guantanamo Bay and has refused to put new detainees there, despite the repeated testimony of our military leaders that a designated detention facility for the long-term detention and interrogation of foreign terrorists would be very helpful. This refusal has put our military leaders in a difficult and dangerous situation. The lack of a designated long-term detention facility has forced our military to use substandard, ad-hoc workarounds as they did in the case of Abdul Kadir Warsame. If we captured Ayman al Zawahiri tonight, can you tell me where we would detain him for long-term Law of War detention and interrogation?

Mr. PRESTON. First a determination would have to be made as to whether or not he should be held in military custody for interrogation. Eventually, a determination would have to be made as to disposition, whether it be prosecution in Federal court, trial by military commission or law of war detention long term. The appropriate place of detention would depend on those determinations. At the President's direction, the Department is in the process of identifying a secure facility in the United States for holding military commissions. There is also an outstanding indictment against al Zawahiri.

33. Senator AYOTTE. Mr. Preston, in your opinion, are the detainees held at Naval Station, Guantanamo Bay being treated in a professional and humane manner, which is compliant with U.S. law?

Mr. PRESTON. In 2009, a review was conducted to ensure that the treatment of Guantanamo detainees fully complied with U.S. domestic and international law. My understanding is that that review found that the detainees were being treated in a professional and humane manner that was fully consistent with all applicable law. To the best of my knowledge, that remains the case today.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MIKE LEE

NATIONAL SECURITY AGENCY

34. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, the National Security Agency (NSA) is under the jurisdiction of DOD. As the General Counsel for DOD, you will have a large amount of influence over the programs at NSA that have recently been in the news for collecting metadata on millions of Americans in large databases. I am concerned that this information might be used for purposes not originally contemplated when the databases were created, not necessarily by this administration but in the future, which may endanger the liberties of Americans. Do you believe that at some point the collection and aggregation of metadata implicates constitutional concerns?

Mr. PRESTON. Whether or at what point the collection and aggregation of metadata regarding U.S. persons by the U.S. Government implicates constitutional concerns is a question of great importance and complexity. While the Supreme Court's decision in Smith v. Maryland is cited for the proposition that there is no protected privacy interest in business records of this sort, I understand that some may have doubts about the applicability of that decision in this context. If confirmed, I expect to play an active role in any further consideration of this issue, together with the appropriate attorneys at the Department of Justice.

35. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, what limiting practices do you believe should guide the Government in determining the types and amount of information it can collect about Americans?

Mr. PRESTON. Current law and policy strike a balance between protecting the national security of our country and protecting the constitutional rights of our citizens, and it is imperative that the intelligence activities of the U.S. Government, particularly any collection of information about U.S. persons, strictly adhere to all applicable prohibitions and limitations aimed at safeguarding privacy and civil liberties. Executive Order (EO) 12333, as amended, directs U.S. Government departments and agencies to use all means, consistent with applicable Federal law and this order, and with full consideration of the rights of U.S. persons, to obtain reliable intelligence information to protect the United States and its interests. EO 12333 provides that "[t]he U.S. Government has a solemn obligation, and shall continue in the conduct of intelligence activities under this order, to protect fully the legal rights of all U.S. persons, including freedoms, civil liberties, and privacy rights guaranteed by Federal law." Intelligence Community elements are authorized to collect, retain, or disseminate information concerning U.S. persons only in accordance with procedures established by the head of the Intelligence Community element concerned or by the head of a department containing such element and approved by the Attorney General. Intelligence Community elements are required to use the least intrusive collection techniques feasible within the United States or directed against U.S. persons abroad. Such techniques as electronic surveillance, unconsented physical searches, mail surveillance, physical surveillance, or monitoring devices may be used only in accordance with procedures established by the head of the Intelligence Community element concerned or the head of a department containing such element and approved by the Attorney General, after consultation with the Director of National Intelligence. Such procedures shall protect constitutional and other legal rights and limit use of such information to lawful governmental purposes.

The Department of Defense has implemented EO 12333 in procedures approved by the Attorney General. The purpose of these procedures is to enable the DOD intelligence components to accomplish their missions effectively while protecting the constitutional rights and privacy of U.S. persons. The DOD intelligence components may collect information that identifies a U.S. person only if it is necessary to conduct a function assigned to the collecting component and only if the information falls within a specified category (e.g., the information is obtained with the consent of the U.S. person concerned, is publicly available, or is foreign intelligence or counterintelligence).

DRONES

36. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, do you believe that the Constitution allows for the U.S. Government to target an American citizen on foreign soil with a drone if they are suspected of engaging in terrorist activity and are perceived to be an imminent threat?

Mr. PRESTON. Citizenship does not confer immunity on one who takes up arms against our country. However, it is critically important to respect the constitutional rights of American citizens, even those who may be plotting against the United States. The requirements of Due Process and the circumstances in which the U.S. Government could lawfully target an enemy belligerent/terrorist operator known to be a U.S. person—whether using a remotely piloted aircraft or by other means—were outlined in the speech by the Attorney General in March of last year and are discussed in some detail in the Department of Justice white paper that has been released. In addition, the policy standards and procedures announced in May of this year require that if the United States considers an operation against a terrorist identified as a U.S. person, the Department of Justice will conduct an additional legal analysis to ensure that such action may be conducted against the individual consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

37. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, how do you define imminent threat?

Mr. PRESTON. Imminent threat is a concept long known in the law and in practice as relates to the use of military force, but also a concept that has evolved with the emergence of non-state actors planning and executing terrorist attacks with tactics foreign to conventional warfare. This is not the adversary of old, amassing forces on the border, with troops in uniform and arms unconcealed, in advance of an invasion, nor is it an adversary that pays any heed to the law of war, instead hiding among and intentionally targeting innocent civilians.

In the current context, imminent threat would encompass those engaged in planning, approving or carrying out violent attacks against the United States. Additional considerations would include the window of opportunity to act, the chance of reducing collateral harm to civilians, and the likelihood of heading off future disastrous attacks. In any given instance, the determination whether a threat is imminent is based on an assessment of all facts and circumstances known at the time.

DETENTION

38. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, do you believe the Constitution permits the Government to apprehend a U.S. citizen on American soil and detain that individual indefinitely in a military detainment facility?

Mr. PRESTON. I understand that the law is unsettled on this question. As a matter of policy, the President has declared that the U.S. Government "will not authorize the indefinite military detention without trial of American citizens" and further stated that "doing so would break with our most important traditions and values as a Nation."

WAR POWERS

39. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, did you support the President's decision to use military force in Libya in 2011?

Mr. PRESTON. As General Counsel of the CIA, I had no role in the decision to use military force in Libya in 2011. To the best of my recollection, I did not participate in the substantive discussions concerning the use of military force preceding the President's decision. That said, I do not wish to suggest that I did not support the decision once made. If confirmed, I expect to be actively involved in the consideration of any contemplated use of military force in a foreign country in the future.

40. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, do you believe that he had the proper authority to do so, and do you believe that the President needs authorization from Congress to arm rebels in Syria?

Mr. PRESTON. With respect Libya, I had no role, as CIA General Counsel, in addressing the authority to use military force, under U.S. domestic law or international law, and I do not recall having any material involvement in those discussions. As I understand it, the President acted in Libya to protect U.S. national interests and prevent a massacre. On March 21, 2011, in his report to Congress about the use of military force in Libya consistent with the War Powers Resolution, the President explained that the use of military force in Libya served important U.S. interests in preventing instability in the Middle East and preserving the credibility and effectiveness of the United Nations Security Council. Although U.S. strikes in Libya exceeded 60 days, my understanding is that the administration concluded, given that the risk to U.S. forces was low and the mission and use of force limited, the term "hostilities" did not apply and, therefore, continuing operations were consistent with the War Powers Resolution. I understand that U.S. and NATO operations in Libya had a basis in international law by virtue of U.N. Security Council resolutions under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter.

With respect to Syria, all U.S. military operations must be authorized under U.S. domestic law. Without an authorization from Congress, the President could have authority as Commander in Chief and Chief Executive to order military action, depending on the particular facts and circumstances. There are, however, significant constitutional and statutory limitations on the scope and duration of military operations that the President may order in the absence of congressional authorization.

41. Senator LEE. Mr. Preston, do you believe that the current AUMF from 2001 needs to be updated or changed at this point? If so, how?

Mr. PRESTON. It is the considered view of the Department of Defense that the President has adequate authority to conduct military operations against al Qaeda, the Taliban, and associated forces. My understanding is that the existing authorities are believed to be adequate and appropriate for military operations to counter the current and immediately foreseeable threat. The President has invited engagement with Congress on the future of the AUMF. If confirmed, I look forward to participating in that discussion.

ADDITIONAL QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR MARK UDALL

Senate Armed Services Committee
Questions for the Record for the Honorable Stephen W. Preston, CIA General Counsel, Nominated to be the General Counsel of the Department of Defense
August 9, 2013

Senator Mark Udall

Our great nation is based on a system of checks and balances. I believe that it is essential that the Congress be able to exercise appropriate oversight of executive branch agencies and that agencies appropriately respond to congressional requests. Most executive branch agencies work hard to provide Congress with the information needed to conduct effective oversight. It is important that such best practices be replicated throughout the government. Likewise, it is essential that such practices as unacceptable responses to congressional requests and oversight do not spread to other agencies.

As you know, I have concerns regarding the CIA's recent engagement with the congressional oversight process, to include periods of time during which you have served as General Counsel of the CIA. In your testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee, you stated that you believed the CIA's response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence's Study on the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program (the Committee Study) was "appropriate," and that you accepted the conclusions of the CIA response. You also stated that you had some involvement in the CIA's response, noting, "For my part, I don't believe there's anything legally objectionable. That's the determination I need to make."

In responding to the questions below, I note the following:

I strongly agree that it is essential that the Congress be able to exercise appropriate oversight of Executive branch agencies and that agencies appropriately respond to congressional requests. Doing a better job of congressional notification and ensuring the proper provision of information concerning covert action and other intelligence activities to the Intelligence Committees has been a top priority of the Directors under which I have served, starting with Director Panetta, and one that I have fully supported. As I stated at this Committee's hearing on my nomination, if confirmed, I will be fully committed to ensuring that the Armed Services Committees are kept properly informed in furtherance of their critical oversight responsibilities vis-à-vis the Department of Defense.

My role with respect to the Agency's response to the SSCI's study is perhaps best understood in the context of my broader role as General Counsel of the CIA. For the past four-plus years, my highest priority as General Counsel has been working to ensure that the Agency is and remains in full compliance with all applicable law in the conduct of intelligence activities, with particular attention to ongoing counterterrorism programs. With respect to the former detention and interrogation program, which was ended by Executive Order prior to my arrival, the primary focus of the Office of General Counsel during my tenure has been on supporting the work of the Department of Justice and the SSCI in their respective reviews of the former program, with particular emphasis on the document production process, as well as supporting the U.S. Government's efforts to criminally prosecute terrorist detainees.

The preparation of Agency comments following receipt of the SSCI report was undertaken at the direction of the Acting Director and performed by a team of senior career officers. The product of their work was ultimately submitted to the Director, via the Deputy Director, for approval. My involvement in this process was limited. I did not personally participate in the team's formulation of substantive comments, nor did I independently review the factual basis for their findings and conclusions. I reviewed the comments, with particular attention to the recommendations, and made suggestions, chiefly as to presentation, in hopes of enhancing the utility of the comments, to the Agency and the Committee, in the discussion between them that would follow. My role was principally one of advising the Director and the Deputy Director as they considered how best to engage with the Committee in light of its report and, of critical importance, how to improve the Agency's conduct and oversight of other sensitive programs going forward.

In its response, the Agency confirmed its agreement with a number of the study's conclusions, acknowledged shortcomings, and set forth Director-approved remedial measures to address them. The response does not defend the historical policy decision to use enhanced interrogation techniques as part of the former program. In submitting the response, moreover, Director Brennan made clear his view that enhanced interrogation techniques are not an appropriate method to obtain intelligence and his agreement with the President's decision to ban their use. My views are exactly the same as Director Brennan's in both respects. Insofar as the Agency's response also identifies areas of disagreement with the SSCI's study, I see the response not as a rebuttal to the study or any kind of counter-report, but as comments on the study for the Committee's consideration as it seeks to ensure an accurate record of the former detention and interrogation program. In my view, as previously indicated, the preparation of comments by Agency officers and the Director's submission of such comments for the Committee's consideration was a lawful and appropriate step in the ongoing dialogue between CIA and its congressional overseers. There is now underway an important discussion between the Agency and the Committee – between the Director and Committee leadership, and between the respective staff members most familiar with the facts. I am prepared to abide the outcome of that process.

Views on the Responsibilities of Government Agencies to Respond to Congressional Oversight Requests—CIA Response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence

1. As you know, on December 14, 2012, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence provided a nearly 6,300-page Study on the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program to the CIA and other agencies for "review and comment." The CIA's response was requested by February 15, 2013. The Committee did not receive the CIA's response until June 27, 2013. During this more than six-month period, Committee Members repeatedly requested that CIA personnel meet with the Committee staff to discuss the Committee Study. The CIA declined all requests to meet with its oversight committee on this matter. In your previous response to questions on your role in the CIA's response to the Committee Study, you stated: "My role was principally one of advising the Director and the Deputy Director as they considered how best to engage with the Committee in light of its report and, of critical importance, how to improve the Agency's conduct and oversight of other sensitive programs going forward."

a. Please elaborate on your specific role in the CIA's decision to decline to meet or communicate with the Members and staff of the CIA's oversight committee on this matter of "critical importance" for more than six months. Did you object to the CIA's decision not to meet with the Committee or its staff? Do you believe this decision was reasonable and appropriate given the "critical importance" of the matter and the repeated requests by multiple Members of the Committee for CIA personnel to meet with Committee staff?

b. If confirmed as General Counsel of the Department of Defense, will you ensure, to the best of your ability, that the Department will communicate and meet with the Senate Armed Services Committee Members and its staff in a timely and reasonable manner?

The SSCI's study was formally adopted by the Committee and provided to the Agency for response in December 2012. At that point, the Agency undertook to review the study and prepare comments for the Committee's consideration. Agency leadership determined that it would be most productive to review the report and digest its findings and conclusions before trying to reengage with the Committee in the nature of a substantive response. As any comments on the SSCI's study would not be the Agency's considered response unless and until such comments were reviewed and adopted by the Director, Agency leadership also determined that it would be premature and potentially counterproductive to have substantive discussions at a staff level prior to that time. In my view, leadership's judgment in this regard was not unreasonable.

The process took longer than the 60 days originally allotted by the Committee for the Agency's response. This was due in part to the volume of the report, but also to the change in leadership at the Agency, with the nomination and confirmation of a new Director in the first quarter of this year. The Acting Director sought to keep Committee leadership apprised of the Agency's progress and, on at least one occasion during the process, met with the Chairman and Vice Chairman to foreshadow the Agency's preliminary views thus far developed. Following his appointment, the Director also sought to keep Committee leadership apprised of the Agency's progress, and he and the Deputy Director met with Committee leadership in June to walk through the Agency's response to the SSCI's study. As agreed at that meeting, extensive staff-level meetings ensued, and those discussions continue.

If confirmed, I will certainly do everything in my power to ensure that the Department of Defense communicates and meets with Senate Armed Services Committee Members and staff in a timely and reasonable manner. As noted above, I have fully supported efforts to ensure the proper provision of information to the Intelligence Committees, and, if confirmed, I will be fully committed to such efforts with respect to the Armed Services Committees. This would include communicating and meeting with this Committee on a timely and reasonable basis.

CIA Response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence

2. In your testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee, you stated that you believed the CIA's response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence's Study on the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program was "appropriate." The CIA response largely responds to a small summary portion of the Committee Study, not to the material in the 300-page Executive Summary, or to the larger 6,300-page document. CIA personnel have confirmed that when the CIA response makes an affirmative statement about what the CIA believes is not in the Committee Study, the CIA response is merely referencing bullet points in a short 50-page section of the Committee Study that precedes the Executive Summary, not the larger Committee Study or its full Executive Summary. CIA personnel have further relayed that no one person at the CIA has read the full 6,300-page Committee Study.

    a. Given Director Brennan's statement at his Senate confirmation hearing that he looked forward "to reading the entire 6000-page volume, because it is of such gravity and importance;" the additional four months beyond the February 15, 2013, deadline the CIA took to respond to the Committee Study; as well as Director Brennan's testimony to the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence that the CIA was taking the extra time to provide a thorough response, do you believe it was appropriate for the CIA to largely respond only to a small section of the Committee Study that precedes the Executive Summary?

The Agency undertook to review and respond to the SSCI report to the full extent believed possible given its volume and that of the underlying record material, and given very limited time constraints, imposed originally by the Committee's 60-day deadline and, once that was exceeded, by the practical imperative to respond expeditiously following the appointment of a new Director. In light of these circumstances, the Acting Director adopted a team approach, relying on a group of experienced intelligence officers, rather than a single individual, to conduct the review and prepare comments. He deemed it impractical to respond on a line-by-line basis to the 6,300-page report in any reasonable timeframe, so he directed the team to focus on the study's 20 conclusions and conduct a "deep dive" on a substantial portion of the study viewed as the basis for a number of the study's central conclusions. I understand that the members of the team divided up the substantive matters identified and, in the course of formulating their comments, sought to review those portions of the report and underlying record material relating to the subjects as assigned. Accordingly, while the response is organized in terms of and seeks to address the study's conclusions, my understanding is that the review and resulting comments were not confined to the bare statement of conclusions or even the summary volume of the report. To be sure, the Agency's response does not constitute an encyclopedic treatment of the SSCI's study. To the extent that there are matters apparently not addressed and believed to be important to an understanding of the former program, they would be entirely appropriate for discussion in the staff-level meetings currently in progress.

Views on Responsive Document Production Pursuant to Committee Oversight Requests

3. On July 19, 2013, the New York Times reported that the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence's Study of the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program "took years to complete and cost more than $40 million." In your previous response to questions on your role in the CIA's response, you stated: "My role was principally one of advising the Director and the Deputy Director as they considered how best to engage with the Committee in light of its report and, of critical importance, how to improve the Agency's conduct and oversight of other sensitive programs going forward."

a. The CIA declined to provide the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence with access to CIA records at the Committee's secure office space in the Hart Senate Office Building. Instead, the CIA insisted that the Committee review documents at a government building in Virginia. Once the CIA produced relevant documents related to the CIA detention and interrogation program, the CIA then insisted that CIA personnel—and private contractors employed by the CIA—review each document multiple times to ensure unrelated documents were not provided to a small number of fully cleared Committee staff. What role did you play in the decision to employ these unnecessary multi-layered review steps that delayed CIA document production to the Committee at significant governmental expense?

b. During the CIA's document production of more than six million pages of records, the CIA removed several thousand CIA documents that the CIA believed could be subject to executive privilege claims by the President. While the documents represent an admittedly small percentage of the total number of records produced, the documents—deemed responsive—have nonetheless not been provided to the Committee. What role did you, and other members of CIA leadership, play in the decision to withhold these responsive documents from the Committee? Do you believe it is proper for a federal agency to deny the production of responsive documents to a congressional oversight committee for significant periods of time absent an executive privilege claim by the President?

c. If confirmed as General Counsel of the Department of Defense, will you ensure, to the best of your ability, that the Department will provide responsive documents as requested by the Senate Armed Services Committee absent an executive privilege claim by the President?

During its review of the former detention and interrogation program, the Committee was provided access to highly sensitive CIA materials, including operational cable traffic, internal electronic communications and other information. All told, the Committee was provided access to more than six million pages of materials, some in a large initial production to the Committee in 2009 and the rest in follow-on tranches in response to hundreds of staff requests over the next three years. It is my understanding that the particular arrangements for access – including scope, location and associated limitations – stemmed from discussions between the Agency and the Committee, initially between Director Panetta and the Chairman and then at a staff level over time. While in most instances I was not directly involved, I believe that the judgments underlying these arrangements were made in a good faith effort to provide adequate protection for particularly sensitive national security information, to ensure access to the materials needed by the Committee to perform its oversight function and otherwise to facilitate the review, and to follow conventional document collection/review/production practices as applicable under the circumstances.

With specific reference to documents potentially subject to a claim of executive privilege, as noted in the question, a small percentage of the total number of documents produced was set aside for further review. The Agency has deferred to the White House and has not been substantively involved in subsequent discussions about the disposition of those documents.

If confirmed, I will certainly do everything in my power to ensure that the Department of Defense will provide responsive documents as requested by the Senate Armed Services Committee, and I will consult with the Committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents.

The Provision of Accurate Information by Federal Agencies to the Department of Justice

4. In your previous response to questions on your role in the CIA's response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence's Study of the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program, you stated that you had some involvement in the CIA's response, noting, "For my part, I don't believe there's anything legally objectionable. That's the determination I need to make." The CIA response states: "we found no evidence that any information was known to be false when it was provided [to the Department of Justice] or that additional or more frequent updates would have altered OLC's key judgments." You have written in response to a question on this matter:

   > "My understanding is that DOJ did not always have accurate information about the detention and interrogation program in that the actual conduct of that program was not always consistent with the way the program had been described to DOJ. Of particular note, I understand that, in a number of instances, enhanced interrogation techniques, specifically waterboarding, were applied substantially more frequently than previously had been described to DOJ. I cannot say what DOJ would or would not have considered material at the time. I can tell you that, if I were in a comparable situation, I would consider information of this nature to be material."

   The information you have referenced above regarding the discrepancies between the actual use of the waterboard and the description of its use that CIA provided to the Department of Justice—while significant and material—was known prior to the Committee Study. Volume II of the Committee Study, specifically a 128-page section entitled, CIA Representations to the Department of Justice Related to Intelligence, Effectiveness, and Operation of the Interrogation Program, details how far more inaccurate information was provided to the Department of Justice.

   a. In light of the critical nature of this subject, please review the CIA Representations section (referenced above) of the Committee Study and describe your views on whether the factual record as recounted in the Committee Study supports the CIA's legal conclusion that accurate, timely and complete information would not have "altered OLC's key judgments."

   b. As noted above, you have stated in your previous response to a Question for the Record that "I cannot say what DOJ would or would not have considered material at the time. I can tell you that, if I were in a comparable situation, I would consider information of this nature to be material." After reviewing discrepancies between the factual record and OLC key judgments, do you agree with the CIA's response that "revisiting its factual representations and updating them as necessary... would not have had a practical impact on the outcome"? Please explain whether your position differs from the CIA's conclusion that OLC key judgments would not have been altered. For reference, you might review key judgments in the following documents:

- Memorandum Regarding Interrogation of al Qaeda Operative (August 1, 2002);
- Letters from the Department of Justice related to the interrogation of individual detainees, including to the Acting Director of Central Intelligence, dated July 22, 2004; to the CIA Acting General Counsel, dated August 6, 2004; to the CIA Acting General Counsel, dated August 26, 2004; to the CIA Acting General Counsel, dated September 6, 2004; and to the CIA Acting General Counsel, dated September 20, 2004;
- Memorandum Regarding Application of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340-2340A to Certain Techniques That May be Used in the Interrogation of a High Value al Qaeda Detainee (May 10, 2005);
- Memorandum Regarding Application of 18 U.S.C. §§ 2340-2340A to the Combined Use of Certain Techniques in the Interrogation of High Value al Qaeda Detainees (May 10, 2005)
- Memorandum Regarding Application of United States Obligations Under Article 16 of the Convention Against Torture to Certain Techniques that May Be Used in the Interrogation of High Value al Qaeda Detainees (May 30, 2005)
- Memorandum Regarding Application of the Detainee Treatment Act to Conditions of Confinement at Central Intelligence Agency Detention Facilities (August 31, 2006)
- Memorandum Regarding Application of the War Crimes Act, the Detainee Treatment Act, and Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to Certain Techniques that May Be Used by the CIA in the Interrogation of High Value al Qaeda Detainees (July 20, 2007)

c. The CIA response to the Committee Study states: "while it would have been prudent to seek guidance from OLC on the complete range of techniques prior to their use, we disagree with any implication that, absent prior OLC review, the use of the 'unapproved' techniques was unlawful or otherwise violated policy." Please state whether you agree with this legal determination and explain your legal reasoning.

d. You have stated in your previous response to a Question for the Record that: "While I have been General Counsel of the CIA, the relationship between the Agency and DOJ's Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) has been characterized by frequent and candid communication concerning the Agency's sensitive programs, with particular attention to ensuring that the OLC is provided complete and accurate information on which to base its legal advice to the Agency. In addition, the Agency is developing an internal mechanism for periodically and systematically reviewing OLC opinions regarding sensitive programs to ensure that OLC is informed of any material changes in facts or circumstances." Please describe your views on the importance of federal agencies conveying and ensuring the OLC is properly informed of relevant information. How will you approach your interactions with the Office of Legal Counsel if confirmed as General Counsel of the Department of Defense?

Departments and agencies rely on OLC for authoritative legal guidance on a variety of difficult and consequential issues in an effort to ensure that their programs and operations are entirely lawful. This system works if and to the extent that OLC is properly informed of the information needed to address the legal issues presented. In my view, this is of fundamental importance. During my tenure as CIA General Counsel, I have worked to ensure that the Agency provides the full range of relevant information to OLC. If confirmed, I will do likewise at the Department of Defense, continuing to engage, in an atmosphere of transparency, with my OLC colleagues.

With reference to the factual representations concerning the former detention and interrogation program, it would be difficult to determine with certainty what information DOJ officials years ago would have regarded as outcome determinative. That notwithstanding, I have reviewed the section of the SSCI's study (and the other material) identified in the question, and I believe CIA's efforts fell well short of our current practices when it comes to providing information relevant to OLC's legal analysis. If CIA had adhered to what we regard as proper practice today, it would have ensured that its representations to OLC on matters relating to the former program were and remained complete and accurate – updated as necessary on a timely basis – as we do today. In sum, I believe timely disclosure of all relevant facts to OLC is a necessary predicate to obtaining its authoritative legal guidance. Providing such disclosure is the current practice of the Agency, and it will certainly be my practice at the Department of Defense, if I am confirmed.

On the particular point raised in (c) of the question, I also agree that CIA should have sought guidance from OLC with regard to the complete range of interrogation techniques prior to their use. I understand the Agency's response to the SSCI's study to acknowledge this point, noting only that failure to so engage with OLC did not, in and of itself, render any given technique unlawful.

Responding to Congressional Oversight

5. The CIA response to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence's Study of the CIA Detention and Interrogation Program states that "We disagree with the Study's conclusion that the Agency actively impeded Congressional oversight of the CIA detention and interrogation program."

    a. In light of the critical nature of this subject, and its direct relevance to your nomination, please review the 298-page section in Volume II of the Committee Study, entitled, CIA Representations on the CIA Interrogation Program And the Effectiveness of the CIA's Enhanced Interrogation Techniques To Congress, as well as any other appropriate sections, and state whether you concur with the CIA's response.

b. The CIA response states that the White House had the "responsibility" for determining whether the CIA would brief the full Committee or only the Chairman and Vice Chairman. The CIA response also notes that "We do not want to suggest that CIA chafed under these restrictions; on the contrary, it undoubtedly was comfortable with them." Do you believe that the limitations on briefings to the Committee Chairman and Vice Chairman for nearly four and a half years was appropriate, or adhered to the letter or spirit of the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, regardless of White House direction at the time?

c. Based on your review of the aforementioned 298-page section, and other associated sections of the Committee Study, do you believe that the briefings provided to the Committee Chairman and Vice Chairman prior to September 6, 2006, fulfilled the CIA's obligation, under the National Security Act, to keep the congressional intelligence committees "fully and currently informed of the intelligence activities of the United States, including any significant anticipated intelligence activity"? In your response, please provide your assessment of whether the record indicates that information provided to the Committee Chairman and Vice Chairman was accurate, complete, or timely.

d. Based on your review of the 298-page section, and other associated sections of the Committee Study, do you believe that the briefings provided to the full Committee beginning on September 6, 2006, fulfilled the CIA's obligation, under the National Security Act, to keep the congressional intelligence committees "fully and currently informed of the intelligence activities of the United States, including any significant anticipated intelligence activity"? In your response, please address whether information provided to the Committee was accurate, complete, or timely.

e. To what extent do you view the CIA's past engagement with the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence on the CIA's Detention and Interrogation program—as well as the CIA's most recent response and engagement with the Committee on this matter—as a model for the Department of Defense's engagement with the Senate Armed Services Committee?

I have reviewed the section of the SSCI's study identified in the question, and I believe CIA's efforts in this regard fell well short of our current practices when it comes to congressional reporting. I would not regard them as a model for the Department of Defense's engagement with this Committee. Had the Executive understood and discharged its congressional reporting obligations as we have in my experience since 2009, I do not believe that the briefings on a program of this nature, magnitude and duration would have continued on a limited, leadership-only basis. Moreover, as discussed in the Agency's response and further explored in the staff-level discussions, briefings to the Committees included inaccurate information related to aspects of the program of express interest to Members. What we regard as proper practice today is driven by faithful application of the National Security Act of 1947. It is also informed by the very high priority the Directors under which I have served have placed on doing a better job of congressional notification and ensuring the proper provision of information concerning covert action and other intelligence activities to the Intelligence Committees. To repeat, I have fully supported these efforts and, if confirmed, will be fully committed to such efforts with respect to the Armed Services Committees.

Section 331 of the Intelligence Authorization Act

6. The CIA response to the Committee Study states that "We disagree with the Study's contention that limiting access is tantamount to impeding oversight." To support this conclusion, the CIA response states that the narrative of the Committee Study "does not reflect mutually agreed upon past or current practices for handling restricted access programs." The CIA response continues: "Indeed, the Committee codified, as part of the FY12 Intelligence Authorization Act, the practice of briefing sensitive matters to just the Chairman and Ranking Member [sic], along with notice to the rest of the Committee that their leadership has received such a briefing."

    a. Is the statement above a reference to Section 331 ("Notification procedures.") of the FY10 Intelligence Authorization Act, reported out by the Committee on July 22, 2009, and again, on July 15, 2010? If not, please identify the provision in the FY12 Intelligence Authorization Act to which the CIA response is referring in this statement.

    b. Please confirm your understanding that the language and intent of that legislation was not to "codify... mutually agreed upon past or current practices," but rather, as the Committee report states, to provide for the "improvement of notification" by ensuring that, "[i]n the event the DNI or head of an Intelligence Community element does not provide [notification] to the full congressional intelligence committees," the full committee shall be provided notice of this fact. If this is not your understanding, please provide an explanation for the conflict between the sponsors' and Committee's legislative intent to improve full Committee notification and the CIA's alternative interpretation of this law as expressed in the CIA's response.

The statement quoted above from the Agency's response to the SSCI's study refers to section 331 of the FY10 Intelligence Authorization Act, but I believe the statement was inartfully drawn to the extent that it can be read to suggest that, in enacting this legislation, the Congress or the Committee intended to endorse or embrace the Executive's practice of limited notification of certain sensitive matters to Committee leadership. My understanding of the legislation is that it makes provision for situations in which the Executive determines to provide notification to fewer than all Committee Members ("If the President determines that ..., the finding may be reported to ...") and, specifically, puts into law the requirement of notice to all Committee Members of the fact of the limited notification ("In any case where ..., the President shall provide to ...") As I understand it, such notice to all Committee Members was not the pre-existing practice, but rather was an improvement put into place by the legislation. In short, the requirements of section 331 are as stated in the plain language of the provision, and the legislative intent is as stated in the legislative history of the Act, to include specifically the views expressed by Senator Rockefeller.

Previous Responses to Questions for the Record

7. You were asked in a previous Question for the Record about the CIA's past representations that information obtained from the CIA's enhanced interrogation techniques was "otherwise unavailable" to the United States Government, and the CIA's response, which states the CIA now believes these representations were "inherently speculative." The CIA response further states, "it is unknowable whether, without enhanced techniques, CIA or non-CIA interrogators could have acquired the same information from those detainees." In your response, you stated, "I understand this to be saying that information was provided by detainees following the application of enhanced interrogation techniques and that it is not possible to know whether the same information would have been obtained had other interrogation methods been used, because there is no way to turn the clock back and question these detainees all over again in a different fashion. In this sense, it is unknowable."

    a. As you know, in its cataloging of intelligence in U.S. government databases, the Committee accepted the CIA's broad definition of information obtained from CIA enhanced interrogation techniques – to include all information a detainee provided during or after CIA enhanced interrogation techniques, even if that information was provided several years after the use of enhanced interrogation techniques – as information derived from the techniques. Instead of speculating on what might have resulted if the CIA had tried to "turn the clock back and question these detainees all over again in a different fashion," the Committee sought to confirm CIA representations that information the CIA claimed was derived from enhanced interrogation techniques was, as the CIA represented, otherwise unavailable to the U.S. government through other intelligence sources.

    Referencing the same standard, in a previous response you relayed that "otherwise unavailable" meant "otherwise unavailable to the Agency through other sources." This interpretation of "otherwise unavailable" is consistent with CIA representations to the CIA Office of Inspector General, Congress, and the Department of Justice, among others. For example, see the May 30, 2005, Office of Legal Counsel Memorandum, which describes CIA representations on effectiveness and the need to obtain "otherwise unavailable intelligence" to protect the nation.

    Using the term "otherwise unavailable," as you stated, "otherwise unavailable to the Agency through other sources," which is consistent with past CIA representations, do you agree that a review of intelligence community records could determine whether information the CIA claims resulted from enhanced interrogation techniques was either "otherwise unavailable," or previously available "to the Agency through other sources"?

For purposes of this question, I understand "otherwise unavailable" to focus not on whether conventional interrogation techniques would have produced information different from that obtained following application of enhanced interrogation techniques, but on whether the information obtained was in fact available from sources other than the detainee subjected to such enhanced techniques. Understood in this way, I agree that it may be possible to make a determination as to whether information obtained following application of enhanced interrogation techniques was "otherwise unavailable," depending of course on the state and content of the record. My understanding is that differing views of the record in this regard are being discussed in the staff-level meetings currently in progress.

Attachment: Intelligence Authorization Act of Fiscal Year 2010

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF SENATOR ROCKEFELLER

The Congressional notification provisions in the bill that we are reporting out today constitute an important improvement over the status quo. They require that the congressional intelligence committees and the President establish written procedures regarding the details of notification processes and expectations; that the President provide written notice about intelligence activities and covert actions, including changes in covert action findings and the legal authority under which an intelligence activity or a covert action is or will be conducted; that the President provide written reasons for limiting access to notifications to less than the full committee; and that the President maintain records of all notifications, including names of Members briefed and dates of the briefings.

I support these provisions because I expect that they will go a long way toward correcting past deficiencies. However, I believe that additional clarity is needed regarding whether or not the full committee will be aware of three critical facts in circumstances of less-than-full-committee notifications: (1) the fact that such a limited access notification has occurred, (2) the general subject of the limited notification, and (3) the reasons for limiting access.

There are situations in which a limited notification is appropriate and even necessary, but those situations are rare. Congressional notification procedures—and practices—should reflect that rarity. Most importantly, they should prevent limited notification from impeding the committees' oversight responsibilities, because effective congressional oversight of intelligence activities is critical to the national security interests of the United States.

As Senator Snowe and I noted in our additional views to the Committee's July 22, 2009 report of an earlier version of this bill, the Committee has supported clarity on these matters in four consecutive intelligence authorization bills. I will continue to work with my colleagues in establishing written notification procedures that resolve any ambiguities in favor of full committee awareness.

The Congressional notification provisions in the bill that we are reporting out today are a good first step—but only a first step.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, IV.

[The nomination reference of Hon. Stephen W. Preston follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 11, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Stephen Woolman Preston, of the District of Columbia, to be General Counsel of theDepartment of Defense, vice Jeh Charles Johnson, resigned.

[The biographical sketch of Hon. Stephen W. Preston, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF HON. STEPHEN W. PRESTON

Education:

Yale University

- September 1975–May 1979

- Bachelor of Arts Degree awarded May 1979

Trinity College, University of Dublin

- September 1979–May 1980
- Graduate Diploma awarded May 1980

Harvard University

- September 1980–June 1983
- Juris Doctor Degree awarded June 1983

Employment record:

Central Intelligence Agency

- General Counsel
- July 2009–present

Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP

- Partner
- March 2001–June 2009

Department ofthe Navy

- General Counsel
- September 1998–November 2000

U.S. Department of Justice

- Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Civil Division
- September 1995–September 1998

Department of Defense

- Principal Deputy General Counsel
- Deputy General Counsel (Legal Counsel)
- Consultant
- August 1993–September 1995

Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering

- Partner
- Associate
- January 1986–August 1993

Center for Law in the Public Interest

- Visiting Fellow
- September 1984–December 1985

Chambers of Hon. Phyllis A Kravitch, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, Savannah, GA

- Law Clerk
- August 1983–July 1984

Honors and awards:

Central Intelligence Agency Distinguished Intelligence Medal (2012)
National Intelligence Distinguished Service Medal (2012)
Central Intelligence Agency Director's Award (2011)
Central Intelligence Agency Director's Award (2010)
Department of Defense Medal for Distinguished Public Service, bronze palm in lieu of second award (2000)
Department of the Navy Distinguished Public Service Award (2000)
Department of Defense Medal for Distinguished Public Service (1995)
Resolution, Navy–Marine Corps Court of Military Review (1988)
Honoree, Women's Legal Defense Fund (1987)
J.D., magna cum laude, Harvard University (1983)
Editor, Harvard Law Review (1982–1983)
Graduate Diploma, with First Class Honors, University of Dublin (1980)
B.A., summa cum laude, Yale University (1979)
Phi Eta Kappa (1979)

[The Committee on Armed Services requires all individuals nominated from civilian life by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial and other information of the nominee. The form executed by Hon. Stephen W. Preston in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Stephen Woolman Preston.

2. Position to which nominated:
General Counsel of the Department of Defense.

3. Date of nomination:
June 11, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
May 30, 1957; Atlanta, GA.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married.

7. Names and ages of children:
Two children.

8. Education: List secondary and higher education institutions, dates attended, degree received, and date degree granted.
1980–1983, Harvard University, J.D., June 1983
1979–1980, Trinity College, University of Dublin, Graduate Diploma, May 1980
1975–1979, Yale University, B.A., May 1979
1971–1975, The Lovett School, High School Diploma, June 1975

9. Employment record: List all jobs held since college or in the last 10 years, whichever is less, including the title or description of job, name of employer, location of work, and dates of employment.
2009–Present, General Counsel, Central Intelligence Agency
2001–2009, Partner, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLC

10. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary or other part–time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed above.
2005, Member, Independent Panel to Review Legal Services in the Department of Defense
1998–2000, General Counsel, Department of the Navy
1995–1998, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Civil Division, U.S. Department of Justice
1993–1995, Principal Deputy General Counsel Deputy General Counsel (Legal Counsel), Consultant, Department of Defense
1983–1984, Law Clerk, Chambers of Hon. Phyllis A. Kravitch, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, Savannah, GA

11. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.

Member, Bartram Ridge Development LLC
Trustee, Family Trust I
Trustee, Family Trust II

12. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.

All Souls Memorial Episcopal Church
American Bar Association
American Bar Foundation
Council on Foreign Relations District of Columbia Bar
Harvard Club of Washington, DC.
International Association for the Study of Irish Literatures
Kalorama Citizens Association
Kennedy Center Membership Program
Metropolitan Club of Washington, DC.
Naval Historical Foundation
Navy League of the United States
Phi Beta Kappa
Smithsonian Institution Resident Associate Program
Saint Anthony Hall
The Elizabethan Club of Yale University
U.S. Navy Memorial
U.S. Naval Institute
Yale Club of Washington, DC

13. Political affiliations and activities:

(a) List all offices with a political party which you have held or any public office for which you have been a candidate.

None.

(b) List all memberships and offices held in and services rendered to all political parties or election committees during the last 5 years.

Barack Obama Presidential Campaign—canvassing activity (2008).

(c) Itemize all political contributions to any individual, campaign organization, political party, political action committee, or similar entity of $100 or more for the past 5 years.

Barack Obama Presidential Campaign—contribution of $2,300 (2008)
Michael Bennet Senatorial Campaign—contribution of $500 (2009)
Michael Signer Virginia Lieutenant Governor Campaign—contribution of $250 (2009)
Deval Patrick Gubernatorial Campaign—contribution of $500 (2010)

14. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, military medals and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements.

Phi Beta Kappa (1979)
B.A., summa cum laude, Yale University (1979)
Graduate Diploma, with First Class Honors, University of Dublin (1980)
Editor, Harvard Law Review (1982–1983)
J.D., magna cum laude, Harvard University (1983) Honoree, Women's Legal Defense Fund (1987)
Resolution, Navy-Marine Corps Court of Military Review (1988)
Department of Defense Medal for Distinguished Public Service (1995)
Department of Defense Medal for Distinguished Public Service, bronze palm in lieu of second award (2000)
Department of the Navy Distinguished Public Service Award (2000)
Central Intelligence Agency Director's Award (2010)
Central Intelligence Agency Director's Award (2011)
Central Intelligence Agency Distinguished Intelligence Medal (2012)
National Intelligence Distinguished Service Medal (2012)

15. Published writings: List the titles, publishers, and dates of books, articles, reports, or other published materials which you have written.

Author, "CIA and the Rule of Law," 6 J. Nat'l Security L. & Pol'y 1 (2012)
Co-author, "CFIUS and Foreign Investment" in Homeland Security Legal and Policy Issues, ABA Publication (2009)
Co-author, "National Security Versus Business" in The European Lawyer (April 2008)

Co-author, "The CFIUS Review Process: A Regime in Flux" presented at The Foreign Investment and National Security Act of 2007: Navigating the Regulations, ABA Conference (April 4, 2008)

Co-author, "When Will Security Squelch a Foreign Investment Deal" in Executive Counsel (March/April 2008)

Co-author, "Many Transnational Deals Now Face a Security Review" in Executive Counsel (January/February 2006)

Co-author, Legal Services in the Department of Defense: Advancing Productive Relationships, DOD Report (September 15, 2005)

16. Speeches: Provide the committee with two copies of any formal speeches you have delivered during the last 5 years which you have copies of and are on topics relevant to the position for which you have been nominated.

Speaker, CIA and the Rule of Law, Harvard Law School (April 10, 2012) (drawn from informal remarks initially delivered at Columbia Law School in October 2011)

17. Commitment to testify before Senate committees: Do you agree, if confirmed, to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate?

(a) Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?

Yes.

(b) Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?

No.

(c) If confirmed, will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?

Yes.

(d) Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?

Yes.

(e) Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?

Yes.

(f) Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?

Yes.

(g) Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Yes.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–F of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–F are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

Stephen W. Preston

This 22nd day of July, 2013.

[The nomination of Hon. Stephen W. Preston was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on July 30, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on October 16, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Hon. Jon T. Rymer by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These reforms have also improved cooperation between the Services and the combatant commanders in the strategic planning process, in the development of requirements, in joint training and education, and in the execution of military operations.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

Answer. The Goldwater-Nichols Act has strengthened our Armed Forces by promoting joint operability, increasing readiness, and creating a higher standard of warfighting efficiency. I am unaware of the need for any modifications to this act at this time. If confirmed, I will notify Congress if the Office of Inspector General identifies the need for modifications to the act.

Question. If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. Please see response above.

RELATIONSHIPS

Question. If confirmed, what would your working relationship be with:

The Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Section 8(c) of the Inspector General (IG) Act of 1978, as amended (the IG Act) states that the IG shall "be the principal adviser to the Secretary of Defense for matters relating to the prevention and detection of fraud, waste, and abuse in the programs and operations of the Department . . . " If confirmed, I will seek to maintain a strong and effective relationship with the Secretary that enables me to carry out my statutory duties with the independence required under the IG Act, while enabling the Secretary to exercise his statutory supervisory authority.

Question. The Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Answer. Section 3(a) of the IG Act states that "each IG shall report to and be under the general supervision of the head of the establishment involved or, to the extent such authority is delegated, the officer next in rank below such head." DOD Directive 5106.01, dated April 10, 2012, states that "the IG of the DOD shall report to and be under the general supervision of the Secretary of Defense and the Deputy Secretary of Defense . . . " Accordingly, if confirmed, my relationship with the Deputy Secretary of Defense will be similar to my relationship with the Secretary of Defense.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller/Chief Financial Officer).

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the USD(C/CFO) to formulate the IG's portion of the annual President's budget for submission to Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) and Office of Management and Budget (OMB), as well as request required resources to conduct the IG's mission. I will work with the USD(C/CFO) on areas of concern within the financial management arena which have been a longstanding major management challenge for the Department. I will conduct and supervise audits, investigations, and inspections relating to the programs and operations of the establishment in order to promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness.

Question. The Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (AT&L).

Answer. I have been advised that the office of the DOD IG has also identified acquisition processes and contract management as a major management challenges for DOD. It is therefore essential for the IG to maintain an effective working relationship with the USD(AT&L). If confirmed, I anticipate working closely with the Under Secretary concerning the allocation of IG resources in the acquisition area, and how best to implement audit recommendations pertaining to acquisition processes. As IG, I would also recommend policies, in coordination with the USD(AT&L) and the USD(Comptroller), to ensure that audit oversight of contractor activities and financial management are coordinated and carried out in an efficient manner to prevent duplication.

Question. The Assistant Secretaries of Defense.

Answer. I will work with the various Assistant Secretaries of Defense in managing challenges faced by the Department.

Question. The General Counsel of the Department of Defense.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the General Counsel of DOD who serves as the Chief Legal Officer of DOD. I have been advised that an Office of General Counsel within the Office of Inspector General was established outside of the authority, direction and control of the General Counsel of DOD on September 23, 2008. I believe that the establishment of this independent Office of Counsel ensures that the IG receives independent legal advice and is in accordance with the provisions of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) of 2009 and the IG Reform Act of 2008.

Question. The Director of Operational Test and Evaluation (DOT&E).

Answer. I have been advised that the IG and the DOT&E have a common interest in ensuring that equipment and weapons systems provided to the warfighter perform effectively and as planned. If confirmed, I would expect to consult as appropriate with the Director concerning the initiation of oversight efforts in these areas.

Question. The Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation.

Answer. I am told that the IG and the Director of Cost Assessment and Program Evaluation will have a common interest in ensuring that acquisitions made by the Department undergo cost assessments and program evaluations. I will seek to establish a cooperative working relationship with this office.

Question. The Inspectors General of the Military Departments, Defense Agencies, and the Joint Staff.

Answer. Section 8(c)(2) of the IG Act states that the IG of DOD "shall . . . initiate, conduct, and supervise such audits and investigations in DOD (including the military departments) as the IG considers appropriate . . . " Section 8(c)(9) adds that the IG "shall . . . give particular regard to the activities of the internal audit, inspection, and investigative units of the military departments with a view toward avoiding duplication and ensuring effective coordination and cooperation . . ." If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG coordinates and avoids duplicative efforts. As I understand it, the DOD oversight community uses internal coordination mechanisms to deconflict potential duplicative efforts. In addition, DOD directives govern certain programs in which the IGs of the military departments participate.

Question. The Inspectors General of subordinate commands.

Answer. My relationship with the IGs of subordinate commands will be based on the IG role described above. If confirmed, I will work closely with the other DOD IGs to carry out applicable policies and guidance; avoid duplication, overlapping, and gaps; and work to build a strong team.

Question. The Criminal Investigative Services of the Military Departments.

Answer. Under the IG Act, the IG has the authority to initiate, conduct, and supervise criminal investigations relating to any and all programs and operations of the DOD. In addition, the IG is statutorily mandated to develop policy, monitor and evaluate program performance, and provide guidance regarding all criminal investigative programs within the Department. It is my understanding that the DOD IG works frequently in close coordination with the Military Criminal Investigative Organizations (MCIOs) on joint investigations. If confirmed, I will work closely with each of the MCIOs to ensure that investigative resources are used effectively.

Question. The Audit Agencies of the Military Departments.

Answer. Section 4(a) of the IG Act establishes broad jurisdiction for the IG to conduct audits and investigations within DOD, and section 8(c)(2) states that the IG "shall . . . initiate, conduct, and supervise such audits and investigations in the DOD (including the military departments) as the IG considers appropriate." If confirmed, I will work with the audit agencies of the military departments to ensure audit resources are used effectively within the Department.

Question. The Defense Contract Audit Agency.

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with DCAA, as prescribed in the IG Act. Although DCAA reports to the Under Secretary of Defense (Comptroller), it operates under audit policies established by the IG.

Question. The Defense Acquisition Regulatory Council.

Answer. As I understand it, the DOD IG regularly provides comments to the Defense Acquisition Regulatory Council on proposed changes to the Defense Federal Acquisition System and also recommends changes as a result of DOD IG work. If confirmed, I would expect to continue these practices.

Question. The Director of Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy.

Answer. It is my understanding that the Director of Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy is responsible for oversight of a large segment of the DOD's acquisition and contracting operations and, accordingly, is a major recipient of reports provided by the IG. If confirmed, I would expect to continue the current practice of working with the Director.

Question. The Comptroller General and the Government Accountability Office.

Answer. It is my understanding that the DOD IG works very closely with the Comptroller General and the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to coordinate planned and ongoing audits and inspections to avoid any duplication of efforts. I also understand that the DOD IG/GAO liaison office serves as the central liaison between GAO and DOD management during GAO reviews of DOD programs and activities. I have served on both the yellow book and blue book advisory committees at GAO. If confirmed, I would work to maintain these cooperative relationships with the Comptroller General and GAO.

Question. The Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction.

Answer. It is my understanding that the DOD IG scope of oversight authority encompasses all DOD funded operations and activities in Afghanistan and elsewhere, while the SIGAR focuses his oversight effort only on funds designated for Afghanistan reconstruction. If confirmed, and in keeping with the IG Act, I will ensure that the DOD IG collaborates effectively with the SIGAR to ensure that we protect the public expenditures in Afghanistan for which we have oversight.

Question. The Council of Inspectors General on Integrity and Efficiency.

Answer. On October 14, 2008, the President signed Public Law 110–409, which established the Council of Inspectors General on Integrity and Efficiency (CIGIE), replacing the PCIE. As the Inspector General of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation I serve as Chair of the Audit Committee and as a Member the CIGIE Executive Council since 2008. If confirmed, I plan to continue to be a very active participant in the CIGIE Question. The Defense Council on Integrity and Efficiency.

Answer. Sections 2 and 3 of the DCIE Charter state that, in accordance with section 2(2) of the IG Act, the DOD IG, who is the DCIE Chairman, is responsible to provide "leadership and coordination and recommend policies for activities designed (A) to promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness in the administration of, and (B) to prevent and detect fraud and abuse in such programs and operations." If confirmed, I would organize meetings with the established members of the DCIE to discuss issues of common interest and reinforce close working relationships within the DOD oversight community.

Question. The Office of Management and Budget.

Answer. As chairman of the Audit Committee of CIGIE, I have worked with OMB on numerous occasions on matters of accounting and audit policy. If confirmed, I will ensure that this office works with the Office of Management and Budget regarding budget and policy issues. In addition, the Deputy Director for Management of the OMB serves as the Executive Chairperson of the CIGIE.

QUALIFICATIONS

Question. Section 3 of the Inspector General Act of 1978 provides that Inspectors General shall be appointed on the basis of their "integrity and demonstrated ability in accounting, auditing, financial analysis, law, management analysis, public administration, or investigations."

What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform the duties of the Department of Defense Inspector General (DOD IG), particularly in the area of oversight, audit and investigation?

Answer. Since July 5 2006, I have served as the Inspector General of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC). I am a Certified Internal Auditor and a Certified Government Auditing Professional. I am currently serving as the Chair of the Audit Committee of the Council of the Inspectors General on Integrity and Efficiency and as Vice Chair of the Council of Inspectors General on Financial Oversight. I am a member of the Comptroller General's Advisory Council on Government Auditing Standards and Chair of the Green Book Advisory Council. I am also a member of the Federal Accounting Standards Advisory Board's Accounting and Auditing Policy Committee. As the IG at the FDIC, I have led the team that has ensured efficiency, effectiveness, and accountability of the policies, programs and performance at the FDIC.

I have served for over 30 years in the active and Reserve components of the U.S. Army and I am a graduate of the U.S. Army's Inspector General School. I worked for 7 years in consulting and internal auditing at a major accounting firm and I have over 15 years of experience as a senior manager in the the banking industry.

Question. Do you believe that there are any steps that you need to take to enhance your expertise to perform these duties?

Answer. If confirmed, I plan to meet with a broad cross-section of officials and personnel within the Department of Defense, including members of the Armed Forces here and overseas, to listen to their concerns and identify issues that might merit action by the Office of the Inspector General. Also, I plan to spend time listening to the concerns of the Members of Congress and their staffs. If confirmed, I also intend to continue to work closely with members of the CIGIE. I also intend to spend time with all elements of the DOD IG office to learn and benefit from their insights. I will maintain my professional certifications as an auditor and complete all continuing professional education requirement.

Question. Based on your background and experience, are there any changes that you would recommend with respect to the current organization or responsibilities of the DOD IG?

Answer. It would be premature to offer any recommendations for change in these areas until I have had an opportunity to conduct the necessary thorough evaluations of the current DOD IG organization and policies and procedures.

MAJOR CHALLENGES, PROBLEMS, AND PRIORITIES

Question. In your view, what are the major challenges and problems facing the next DOD IG?

Answer. The DOD IG identified the following seven management and performance challenges facing the Department in fiscal year 2012:

1. Financial Management
2. Acquisition Processes and Contract Management
3. Joint Warfighting and Readiness
4. Information Assurance, Security, and Privacy
5. Health Care
6. Equipping and Training Iraq and Afghan Security Forces
7. The Nuclear Enterprise

Additionally, the issue of sexual assaults and suicide prevention within the Armed Forces are serious issues that demand the attention of the DOD IG. In the context of meeting these challenges, the OIG will need to continue to provide extensive oversight in support of the Department's efforts to address these challenges. It is difficult as a nominee to identify specific problems I will confront if confirmed. However, if confirmed, it will be my top priority to learn what challenges and problems the DOD IG office needs to address and to ensure the adequacy of resources required to accomplish its mission.

Question. If you are confirmed, what plans do you have for addressing these challenges and problems?

Answer. If confirmed, I will focus audit, investigative, and inspection efforts on the above discussed management challenges. I will also work with senior DOD civilian and military officials and Congress to identify emerging issues that the Department faces.

Question. If you are confirmed, what broad priorities would you establish in terms of issues which must be addressed by the DOD IG?

Answer. It is difficult as a nominee to formulate priorities because I have not had access to the full range of information and considerations that should inform them, however, I do plan to make sure that the office stays aware that the foundations of an effective OIG are independence and professional standards. If confirmed, I look forward to consulting with senior officials of the Department of Defense, DOD IG, and with Congress, in establishing broad priorities.

Question. If you are confirmed, what changes, if any, would you expect to make in the organization, structure, and staffing of the Office of Inspector General?

Answer. It would be premature to offer any recommendations for change in these areas until I have had an adequate opportunity to observe the operation of the office and conduct the necessary evaluations.

DUTIES

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the DOD IG?

Answer. The duties and functions of the DOD IG are specified in sections 3, 4, 5, 7, and 8 of the IG Act. Additional duties and responsibilities of the IG are specified in DOD Directive 5106.01, which was signed by the Deputy Secretary of Defense on April 20, 2012.

By statute, the DOD IG conducts and supervises audits and investigations relating to the programs and operations of DOD. The DOD IG also provides leadership and coordination, and recommends policy, for activities designed to: (1) promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness in the administration of DOD programs and operations; and (2) combat fraud, waste, and abuse. In addition, the IG is responsible for keeping both the Secretary of Defense and Congress fully and currently informed about problems and deficiencies in defense programs, the need for corrective action, and the status of such action.

Question. Assuming you are confirmed, what duties and functions do you expect that the Secretary of Defense would prescribe for you?

Answer. If confirmed, I expect the Secretary of Defense will prescribe for me the full range of duties and functions set forth in two DOD publications: DOD Directive 5100.1, "Functions of the Department of Defense and Its Major Components," and DOD Directive 5106.01, "Inspector General of the Department of Defense." These publications delineate that the DOD IG provides staff assistance and advice in accordance with the responsibilities specified in the IG Act. Significantly, these publications reinforce that the IG remains an independent and objective unit within DOD. If confirmed, I will consult directly with the Secretary to identify specific areas of concern and emphasis.

Question. Section 2 of the Inspector General Act of 1978 states that its purpose is to create independent and objective units to conduct and supervise audits and investigations; to provide leadership and coordination and recommend policies designed to promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness; to prevent and detect fraud and abuse; and to provide a means for keeping Congress and agency heads fully and currently informed about problems and deficiencies relating to the administration of programs and operations and the necessity for and progress of corrective action.

Are you committed to maintaining the independence of the DOD IG, as set forth in the Inspector General statute?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, I will maintain the independence of the IG consistent with the provisions of the IG Act.

Question. Are you committed to keeping the Committee on Armed Services "fully and currently informed," and, if so, what steps will you take, if confirmed, to ensure that this responsibility is carried out?

Answer. Yes. If confirmed, in accordance with section 2(3) of the IG Act, I will keep the Committee on Armed Services "fully and currently informed about problems and deficiencies relating to the administration of such programs and operations and the necessity for and progress of corrective action." I will do so through the dissemination of IG products such as the Semiannual Report to Congress and reports on audits and inspections. In addition, I will provide briefings for Members and staff, and testimony at hearings, when requested, with the intent of maintaining a close relationship.

Section 3 of the Inspector General Act of 1978 provides that the head of an agency, shall exercise "general supervision" over an IG, but shall not "prevent or prohibit the Inspector General from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit or investigation, or from issuing any subpoena during the course of any audit or investigation."

What is your understanding of the supervisory authority of the Secretary of Defense over the DOD IG with respect to audits and investigations, in view of the independence provided by sections 2 and 3?

Answer. Section 2 of the IG Act creates independent and objective units to provide a means for keeping the head of the establishment and Congress fully and currently informed about problems and deficiencies relating to the administration of such programs and operations and the necessity for and progress of corrective action.

Section 3 states that each IG shall report to and be under the general supervision of the head of the establishment involved or, to the extent such authority is delegated, to the office next in rank below such head, but shall not report, or be subject to supervision by, any other officer of such establishment. Moreover, neither the head of the establishment nor the office next in rank shall prevent or prohibit the IG from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit or investigation, or from issuing any subpoena during the course of any audit or investigation.

Question. If confirmed, what action would you take if a senior official of the Department sought to prevent you from "initiating, carrying out, or completing" any audit or investigation within the jurisdiction of the Office of the DOD IG?

Answer. If the action was taken outside the authority of the Secretary of Defense in section 8 of the IG Act, I would notify the Secretary and request his assistance in ensuring compliance with the IG Act by the senior official involved. Failure to resolve the issue, would, in my view, constitute a "particularly serious or flagrant problem, abuse, or deficiency" under section 5(d) of the IG Act. Under this section, the IG is required to report the matter to the head of the establishment, who is then required to transmit the IG's report to Congress within 7 days.

Question. Section 8 of the Inspector General Act of 1978 states that the DOD IG shall "be under the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense with respect to certain audits or investigations which require access to information concerning sensitive operational plans, intelligence matters, counterintelligence matters, ongoing criminal investigations by other administrative units of the Department of Defense related to national security, or other matters, the disclosure of which, would constitute a serious threat to national security.

What is your understanding of the procedures in place to affect the authority and control of the Secretary of Defense over matters delineated in section 8 of the act?

Answer. To my knowledge, the procedure in place is to follow the IG Act. Under 8(b)(1) or 8(b)(2) of the IG Act, the Secretary has the "authority to stop any investigation, audit, or issuance of subpoenas, if the Secretary determines that such a prohibition is necessary to preserve the national security interests of the United States." I am informed that this provision has never been exercised. However, in the event that the Secretary exercises this authority, I would submit an appropriate statement within 30 days to this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress, as required under section 8(b)(3).

Question. What is your understanding of the extent to which the Inspector General has, as a matter of practice, initiated and conducted audits or investigations covered by section 8 differently from other audits or investigations?

Answer. It is my understanding that the practice of the DOD IG with respect to the initiation and conduct of audits and investigations covered by section 8 is the same as for other audits and investigations.

Question. What changes, if any, do you believe are needed in the practices of the DOD IG for initiating and conducting audits or investigations covered by section 8?

Answer. None to my knowledge.

Question. Sections 4 and 8 of the Inspector General Act of 1978 set forth various duties and responsibilities of Inspectors General beyond the conduct of audits and investigations.

What is your understanding of the supervisory authority exercised by the Secretary of Defense with regard to these issues?

Answer. Beyond the conduct of audits and investigations, section 4 of the IG Act directs the IG to "review existing and proposed legislation and regulations" and make related recommendations in semiannual reports; recommend policies to promote economy and efficiency in the administration of Department programs and operations, and to prevent and detect fraud and abuse; keep the Secretary of Defense and Congress fully and currently informed about fraud and other serious problems, abuses, and deficiencies; recommend corrective actions for such problems, abuses, and deficiencies; and report on the progress made in implementing such corrective actions. Section 8(c)(1) adds that the IG shall "be the principal advisor to the Secretary of Defense for matters relating to the prevention and detection of fraud, waste, and abuse in the programs and operations of the Department." The duties and responsibilities specified in sections 4 and 8 come within the general supervisory authority of the Secretary of Defense established under section 3(a).

INDEPENDENCE

Question. The DOD IG must ensure that the independence of the Office of the Inspector General is maintained, that investigations are unbiased, particularly those involving senior military and civilian officials, and promptly and thoroughly completed, and that the highest standards of ethical conduct are maintained.

Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for the DOD IG to consult with officials in the Office of the Secretary of Defense (or other DOD officials outside the Office of the Inspector General) before issuing a report, regarding the findings and recommendations in the report?

Answer. In regards to audits and inspections, I understand it is the current practice for the IG to offer officials in the OSD, or other DOD officials, an opportunity to comment before issuing a report to ensure that the information in the report is factually accurate and to resolve or acknowledge disagreements on conclusions, findings, and recommendations. This is not the practice with criminal investigations. Additionally, it is not appropriate to discuss ongoing criminal or administrative investigations.

Question. To the extent that you believe such consultation is appropriate, what steps, if any, do you believe the Inspector General should take to keep a record of the consultation and record the results in the text of the report?

Answer. I believe it is necessary to consult with all parties to gather the facts to develop findings and recommendations. The facts that are relevant should be included in the text of the report, and a written record of all interviews and consultations should be maintained in the working papers.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for senior officials to request that the DOD IG not investigate or review a particular matter?

Answer. Under section 8 of the IG Act, the Secretary of Defense has the authority to prohibit the IG from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit or investigation. That authority may be exercised when the audit or investigation requires access to information concerning: sensitive operational plans, intelligence matters, counterintelligence matters, ongoing criminal investigations by other administrative units of DOD related to national security, or other matters the disclosure of which would constitute a serious threat to national security. As noted previously, the Secretary of Defense has never exercised his authority under section 8.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for senior officials to request that the DOD IG not issue a report on a particular matter?

Answer. No one, other than the Secretary of Defense under the provisions delineated in Section 8 of the IG Act, has the authority to ask the DOD IG not to issue a report on a particular matter.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for senior officials to request that the DOD IG alter findings, recommendations, or other pertinent material in a report on a particular matter?

Answer. In the course of conducting audits and inspections, the IG practice is to offer officials in the OSD, or other DOD officials, an opportunity to comment before issuing a report to ensure that the information in the report is factually accurate and to resolve or acknowledge disagreements on conclusions, findings, and recommendations. Additionally, in cases where an administrative investigation substantiates allegations involving a senior DOD official, the senior official is given an opportunity to comment on findings and conclusions as part of fairness and due process. Those comments may require that we alter the findings and are considered before a final report is issued. However, for criminal investigations, it is not appropriate to discuss the results of ongoing investigations. The final decision on the content of reports rests with the IG.

Question. If confirmed, how would you react to a request, which you believed to be inappropriate, to not investigate a particular matter, not issue a report on a particular matter, or alter findings, recommendations, or other pertinent material in a report on a particular matter?

Answer. With respect to the initiation or completion of an audit or investigation, if the request was inappropriate and made outside the authority of the Secretary of Defense in section 8 of the IG Act, I would reject the request. If and when necessary, I would notify the Secretary and request his assistance in ensuring compliance with the IG Act by the senior official involved. Failure to resolve the issue, would, in my view, constitute a "particularly serious or flagrant problem, abuse or deficiency" under section 5(d) of the IG Act. Under this section, the IG is required to report the matter to the head of the establishment, who is then required to transmit the IG's report to Congress. (Additionally, the IG Act requires the Secretary to notify Congress if he exercises his authority under section 8(b) (1) or (2))

CONGRESSIONAL REQUESTS

Question. The Office of Inspector General frequently receives requests from congressional committees and Members of Congress for audits and investigation of matters of public interest.

What is your understanding of the manner in which the Office of Inspector General handles such requests?

Answer. The DOD IG receives many requests from congressional committees and Members of Congress for oversight reviews, but adheres to the same principles of independence in responding to those requests.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure that the Office of Inspector General continues to respond to congressional requests for audits or investigations in a manner consistent with past practice?

Answer. Recognizing Congress' oversight role and in keeping with the DOD and DOD IG policy, I would continue to make appropriate information available promptly and to cooperate fully with Members of Congress and congressional committees and their staffs.

Question. Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe it would be appropriate for the Office of the Inspector General to redact the contents of any information contained in a report it provides to Congress?

Answer. Consistent with the Freedom of Information Act and Privacy Act, it is the practice of the DOD IG to provide unredacted copies of reports to oversight committees of Congress. Additional releases, including those to the public, are redacted in accordance with applicable laws.

Question. In past years, a number of audits and investigations conducted by the DOD IG in response to congressional requests have taken excessively long periods of time to complete. In some cases, the individuals who have been the subject of such investigations have left office by the time the DOD IG has completed its work.

What is your view of the timeliness and responsiveness of the DOD IG's recent work in response to congressional requests?

Answer. I am unable to speak to the timeliness of specific DOD IG reports. In general, I strongly believe that IG findings must be provided to both management and to Congress in a timely manner while professional standards for report production are maintained.

Question. What steps, if any, would you take, if confirmed, to ensure the timeliness and responsiveness of such audits and investigations?

Answer. If confirmed, I will review the timeliness of DOD IG responses to congressional requests and require improvements if necessary.

SENIOR OFFICIAL INVESTIGATIONS

Question. The Office of the DOD IG plays a key role in the investigation of allegations of misconduct by senior officers and civilian employees of the Department of Defense. The Committee on Armed Services has a particular interest in investigations concerning senior officials who are subject to Senate confirmation, and relies upon the DOD IG, as well as the Office of the Secretary of Defense, to ensure that these investigations are accurate, complete, and accomplished in a timely manner.

If confirmed, what steps will you take to ensure that the investigations relating to senior officials are completed in a timely and thorough manner and that the results of investigations are promptly provided to this committee?

Answer. If confirmed, I will emphasize the importance of conducting timely, thorough, and accurate investigations. I will continue efforts to promote efficiencies through training and streamlining of investigative processes. I will ensure that cases with Congressional or Secretariat interest—especially flag officers pending Senate confirmation—receive additional resources and attention. I will obtain regular updates from my staff on senior official investigations and will ensure that all results of investigations are promptly provided to the Under Secretary of Defense (Personnel and Readiness) and the Services for review and consideration in the confirmation process.

Question. Do you believe that the current allocation of responsibilities between the DOD IG and the inspectors general of the military departments is appropriate to ensure fair and impartial investigations?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure that the allocation of responsibilities between the DOD IG and the Service IGs is appropriate to ensure fair and impartial investigations. The DOD IG customarily asserts investigative jurisdiction in senior official cases in which allegations cross service lines, the subject outranks the Service IG, or the Service IG encounters an impediment to independence. I will insist my office continue prompt and thorough oversight reviews of the Service IG reports of investigation. Vigilant oversight instills public confidence in the integrity and accountability of DOD Leadership.

Question. What additional steps, if any, do you think the DOD IG should take to ensure that investigations carried out by the inspectors general of the military departments are accurate and complete?

Answer. If confirmed, I will ensure my office continues the vigorous oversight reviews of the Service IG reports of investigation to ensure accuracy and completeness. The quality of the Service IG investigations is enhanced by meetings with the Service IGs, semiannual training symposiums, and daily interaction between OIG and Service IG senior official investigators. These efforts strengthen professional relationships, reinforce best practices, and improve the timeliness and quality of investigative work. I will not hesitate to highlight investigative deficiencies in Service IG reports and will offer assistance or assume investigative jurisdiction when appropriate.

Question. At what point in an investigation and under what criteria would you initiate action to ensure that a "flag," or suspension on favorable personnel action, is placed on a military officer?

Answer. If confirmed, I will promptly notify the Service IG of the initiation of a senior official investigation. If a senior official has a pending nomination or Senate confirmation, I will also notify the Under Secretary of Defense (Personnel and Readiness). The components are responsible to ensure the senior officials are "flagged" and not eligible for favorable actions. Upon receipt of an allegation against a senior official, my office will promptly determine whether the allegation is credible; that is, whether the alleged conduct violates an established standard and whether the allegation includes sufficient detail. If the allegation is determined to be credible, I will take steps to ensure an investigation is initiated and make the appropriate notifications.

RESOURCES AND AUTHORITIES OF THE DOD IG'S OFFICE AND INVESTIGATORS

Question. Do you believe that the DOD IG's office has sufficient resources (in personnel and dollars) to carry out its audit and investigative responsibilities?

Answer. If confirmed, I will assess the adequacy of the resources available to the DOD IG. I would make it a priority to ensure that the DOD IG's office has sufficient resources to carry out its audit and investigative responsibilities.

Question. If confirmed, will you communicate any concerns that you may have about the adequacy of resources available to the Office of Inspector General to Congress and this committee?

Answer. If confirmed, I will.

Question. Some Federal agencies have reacted to limited Inspector General resources by using contractors to perform some audit and investigative functions.

What is your understanding of the DOD IG's role in determining whether the use of contractor resources to perform audit or investigative functions is appropriate?

Answer. For the audit function, the IG Act, section 4(b)(1)(B) establishes the authority of each IG to establish guidelines for determining when it shall be appropriate to use non-Federal auditors. In addition, section 4(b)(1)(C) of the IG Act states that the IG shall take appropriate steps to ensure that any work performed by non-Federal auditors complies with the standards established by the Comptroller General.

Question. With regard to the criminal investigative function, it is considered inherently governmental and therefore contractors are only utilized in very limited investigative support roles.

Under what circumstances, if any, do you believe that the use of contractor resources to perform such functions would be appropriate?

Answer. It is my understanding that DOD Instruction 7600.02 establishes guidance on when it is permissible to use contractor resources to perform audit functions. It specifically permits DOD components to contract for audit services when applicable expertise is unavailable, if augmentation of the audit staff is necessary to execute the annual audit plan, or because temporary audit assistance is required to meet audit reporting requirements mandated by Public Law or DOD regulation. However, the instruction includes an approval process to ensure the appropriate use of non-Federal auditors and that they comply with the Government Auditing Standards issued by the Comptroller General of the United States.

Question. In recent years, the DOD IG has sought and obtained increased authority to issue subpoenas, carry weapons, and make arrests.

Do you believe that the authorities of the Office of Inspector General and its agents are adequate in these areas, or would you recommend further changes in the law?

Answer. In general, I believe the authorities provided by the Inspector General Act, as amended, are adequate. If confirmed, I will review those authorities as they relate to the mission of the DOD IG.

DOD FINANCIAL ACCOUNTING AND AUDITS

Question. The performance of mandatory statutory duties, such as the performance of financial audits, has consumed a growing share of the resources of the Inspector General's office, crowding out other important audit priorities.

What is your view of the relative priority of financial audits, and the resources that should be devoted to such audits?

Answer. Financial audits will continue to be a high priority consistent with the President's Initiatives, the Secretary of Defense's top priorities, the Chief Financial Officers Act of 1990, and the Federal Financial Management Improvement Act of 1994. As the Department improves audit readiness, the requirements for financial statement audits will increase, placing greater demand on DOD IG resources. If confirmed, I will work with the Department and Congress to ensure that the appropriate level of resources continues to be dedicated to financial audits. I will also seek to ensure that resources committed to financial audits do not come at the expense of other audit priorities.

Question. What is your view of the requirements of section 1008 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2002, regarding resources directed to the audit of financial statements?

Answer. Section 1008 directs the IG to significantly reduce the level of audit work when the Department has asserted that the financial statements are not reliable and do not meet accounting standards. This allows the IG flexibility to redirect audit resources to other areas within the Department. If confirmed, I will continue to work with the Department and Congress to ensure that the appropriate level of resources is dedicated to audit the Department's financial statements. While audit resources have been redirected to other high priority areas, as the level of audit readiness increases across the Department, there will be a need to focus more resources on those financial statements.

Question. Do you see any need for legislative changes to give the Inspector General greater flexibility to target audit resources?

Answer. If confirmed, I will work with the Department and Congress to assess whether legislation in this area is appropriate.

Question. What is your view of the role of the DOD IG in evaluating and contributing to improvements made in the Department's financial management processes?

Answer. The role of the DOD IG is to serve as a catalyst for improvements in the Department's financial management processes. That role should be consistent with the Department's top priorities, and statutory requirements. If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG continues this vital function.

OVERSIGHT OF ACQUISITION PROGRAMS

Question. Problems with procurement, acquisition, and the ability of the Department and the Military Departments to effectively oversee acquisition programs have called into question the capability of existing DOD oversight mechanisms.

What role, if any, do you believe the Office of the Inspector General should play in achieving acquisition reform?

Answer. The role of the DOD IG is to serve as a catalyst for improvements in the Department's acquisition processes and contract management. That role should be consistent with the President's Initiatives, the Department's top priorities, and statutory requirements. If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG continues this vital function.

Question. Over the last 15 years, the DOD IG has gone from having one auditor for every $500 million on contract by the Department of Defense to one auditor for every $2 billion on contract.

Do you believe that the DOD IG has the resources it needs to conduct effective oversight over the Department's acquisition programs?

Answer. If confirmed, ensuring that the DOD IG has the resources needed to conduct effective oversight over the Department's acquisition programs will be one of my top priorities. The men and women of our Armed Forces, and our Nation's taxpayers, have a right to expect that the funds appropriated by Congress for defense acquisitions are being utilized efficiently and effectively. I understand that Congress has supported DOD IG efforts to increase its oversight resources. It is essential that the IG, the Department, and Congress to work together in a timely way to ensure that the IG has adequate resources to conduct its essential oversight mission.

Question. The DOD IG has played an important role in advising the Department of Defense and Congress on the sufficiency of management controls in the Department's acquisition programs and the impact that legislative and regulatory proposals could have on such management controls.

How do you see the DOD IG's role in this area?

Answer. The DOD IG has an important role in helping the Department to effectively and efficiently manage acquisition resources dedicated to the support of the Department's mission, and in accounting for the management of those resources to the taxpayer. If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG continues its important advisory role.

OVERSIGHT OF DOD ACTIVITIES IN AFGHANISTAN

Question. What is your understanding of the responsibilities and activities of the Office of the DOD IG in investigating and preventing fraud, waste, and abuse in the course of Department of Defense operations in Afghanistan?

Answer. The DOD IG, in accordance with its legislatively mandated mission, conducts audits, investigations and inspections aimed at identifying and preventing fraud, waste, and abuse of funds appropriated to the DOD for its operations in Afghanistan. I am aware that conducting oversight of operations and activities associated with an overseas contingency presents unique challenges. Nevertheless, as with oversight elsewhere within the Department, the purpose of these reviews should be to ensure our men and women in uniform are receiving the right equipment and support to conduct successful operations.

I also understand that, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the law enforcement arm of the DOD IG, and its military criminal investigative counterparts, in particular the U.S. Army Criminal Investigative Command (Army CID), investigate major frauds, corruption, thefts, and other compromises of DOD assets in Afghanistan, and other countries in that theater.

If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG continues to focus oversight efforts to investigate and prevent fraud, waste, and abuse of U.S.-provided resources for reconstruction and other purposes in Southwest Asia, in keeping with the IG Act.

Question. If confirmed, what changes, if any, would you plan to make to the DOD IG's oversight activities in Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, I would ensure that DOD IG activities in Southwest Asia remain a top priority. I will also assess the current level of oversight to ensure that adequate resources are being devoted to this mission and that those resources are being allocated appropriately.

Question. If confirmed, what would be your goals with respect to the oversight, audit, and investigation of ongoing U.S. activities Afghanistan?

Answer. If confirmed, my goal would be to ensure that the oversight provided by the DOD IG of ongoing DOD activities in Afghanistan is consistent with the responsibilities in the IG Act and is sufficient to provide assurance to Congress, the Secretary of Defense, and to the American taxpayer that funds supporting DOD activities are expended appropriately and effectively.

Question. The Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR) has jurisdiction over contracts for the reconstruction of Afghanistan. However, the SIGAR does not have primary jurisdiction over contracts to support our troops in Afghanistan.

What role do you believe the DOD IG should play in the oversight, audit and investigation of such contracts?

Answer. The DOD IG office should play an active role in ensuring stewardship of taxpayers' dollars and effective contract support for our troops through diligent oversight of the contracting function. This would include audits, inspections, and investigations, as required. I understand the DOD IG chairs the Southwest Asia Joint Planning Group, which is a forum for oversight agencies to coordinate audit efforts in Southwest Asia.

Question. Do you believe that a significant on-the-ground presence is necessary to perform this role?

Answer. Yes. While many oversight activities can be conducted from the continental United States, effective oversight requires being on site to assess conditions, examine documents and talk to witnesses and sources. I am aware that the DOD IG currently maintains offices in Afghanistan and Qatar. As the draw down in U.S. troops in Afghanistan proceeds, we must continually assess personnel needs based on the nature and scope of DOD operations and adjust our on-the-ground presence as appropriate.

Question. What is the relationship of the DOD IG to the SIGAR?

Answer. See response to the previous section regarding "Relationships".

INTELLIGENCE

Question. What is the role of the DOD IG with regard to intelligence activities within DOD?

Answer. Responsibilities and functions of the Inspector General as outlined in DOD Directive 5106.1, "Inspector General of the Department of Defense (IG, DOD)," include the responsibility to audit, evaluate, monitor, and review the programs, policies, procedures, and functions of the DOD Intelligence Community to ensure that intelligence resources are properly managed. I am informed that the Inspector General, through the Deputy Inspector General for Intelligence and Special Program Assessments, has responsibility for oversight of DOD intelligence activities and components to include all DOD Components conducting intelligence activities, including the National Security Agency/Central Security Service (NSA/CSS), the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), the Military Department intelligence and counterintelligence activities, and other intelligence and counterintelligence organizations, staffs, and offices, or elements thereof, when used for foreign intelligence or counterintelligence purposes. Other organizations and components under the Inspector General's oversight include the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence (USD (I)), the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO), and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA).

The DOD IG performs an oversight and coordination role through the Joint Intelligence Coordination Working Group (JIOCG). The JIOCG is a DOD working group chaired by the Deputy Inspector General for Intelligence and Special Program Assessments and includes representatives from the Service audit agencies, military department IGs, and the IGs of the Defense Intelligence Agencies. The primary goal of the JIOCG is to avoid duplication of effort and enhance coordination and cooperation among IGs and Auditors General inside the DOD, and promote information-sharing among IGs whose functions include audits, inspections, evaluations, or investigations of their respective departments and agencies.

Question. What is the relationship of the DOD IG to the Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Intelligence Oversight?

Answer. DOD Directive 5106.01 requires that intelligence-related actions be coordinated, as appropriate, with the Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Intelligence Oversight) (ATSD(IO)) to determine respective areas of responsibility in accordance with DOD Directive 5148.11, "assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Intelligence Oversight," dated April 24, 2013. (DOD Directive 5148.11 contains similar language for the ATSD(IO) to coordinate with the IG, as appropriate.) I am advised that the ATSD(IO) is a charter member of the JIOCG, and that the IG has a long history of coordination and cooperation with the ATSD(IO).

Question. What is the relationship of the DOD IG to the Inspector General of the Office of the Director of National Intelligence?

Answer. I understand that the DOD IG's primary relationship with the Intelligence Community IG (IC IG) involves participation in the Intelligence Community (IC) IG Forum. The IC IG Forum promotes information-sharing among the IGs of the departments and agencies of the IC whose functions include audits, inspections/evaluations, or investigations of their respective departments and agencies. The IC IG Forum also strives to avoid duplication of effort and enhance effective coordination and cooperation among IC IGs. The IC IG chairs the IC IG Forum.

In addition to the IC IG Forum relationship, the DOD IG participates in various projects and initiatives undertaken by the IC IG. The IC IG also coordinates with the DOD IG on all ongoing projects relating to DOD intelligence organizations and activities. The IC IG is an Ex-Officio member of the Joint Intelligence Oversight Coordination Group (JIOCG). The JIOCG is a chartered organization which is the DOD focal point for inspectors and auditors general collaboration and deconfliction of project and planning activities.

Question. What is the role of the DOD IG with respect to detainee matters?

Answer. The DOD IG has statutory responsibility for oversight that extends to detainee and interrogation matters. It is my understanding that the DOD IG prepares a summary report every 6 months on investigations of detainee abuse conducted by the MCIOs which is provided to the office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy.

Question. What is the role of the DOD IG with respect to interrogation matters?

Answer. Please see my answer to the previous question.

WHISTLEBLOWER PROTECTION

Question. What is your understanding of the role played by the DOD IG in investigating complaints of reprisal against members of the military, DOD civilian employees, and DOD contractor employees, who "blow the whistle" on alleged fraud, waste, and abuse?

Answer. It is my understanding that the DOD IG maintains a robust whistleblower protection program that seeks to ensure that whistleblowers may report fraud, waste, and abuse within the programs and operations of the Department of Defense without fear of reprisal. The DOD IG is responsible for investigating or overseeing investigations conducted by the DOD component inspectors general, regarding allegations of whistleblower reprisal made by members of the Armed Forces, appropriated and nonappropriated fund DOD civilian employees, and DOD contractor/subcontractor employees. Disclosures brought to light by whistleblowers are critical to DOD IG's mission of providing independent, relevant, and timely oversight of the Department.

Question. What is your understanding of the relationship between the DOD IG and the Office of Special Counsel in the protection of DOD civilian employee whistleblowers?

Answer. The Office of Special Counsel is a partner with the Inspector General in the protection of DOD's civilian appropriated-fund employees. OSC receives and has primary jurisdiction to investigate a majority of the civilian whistleblower cases across the Federal Government, pursuant to the Whistleblower Protection Act (WPA), title 5, U.S.C., section 2302. Under the authority of the Inspector General Act, DOD IG provides an alternate means by which DOD civilian appropriated-fund employees may seek protection analogous to protection from reprisal provided by the WPA.

Question. What is your understanding of the legal standards for substantiating a whistleblower claim of reprisal by a member of the military, a DOD civilian employee, or a DOD contractor employee?

Answer. In general, whistleblower reprisal is proven when the evidence establishes that a protected communication or disclosure was a factor in the decision to take, threaten to take, or withhold a personnel action (or a security clearance determination), unless evidence establishes that the action would have been taken, threatened or withheld absent the protected communication or disclosure. There are statute-specific variations though, including the standard of proof for showing whether the action would have been taken, threatened or withheld absent the protected communication or disclosure. Among the statutes and programs administered by DOD IG, the appropriated-fund civilian and contractor/subcontractor investigations require clear and convincing evidence, whereas military and nonappropriated-fund investigations require a preponderance of the evidence to prove that the action would have been taken anyway.

Question. What is your understanding of the changes made by section 827 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, regarding DOD contractor employee whistleblowers?

Answer. The NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013, signed by President Obama on January 2, 2013, contained numerous enhancements to the existing law protecting Defense contractor employees from whistleblower reprisal, the most significant of which were:

- Extending coverage to employees of Defense subcontractors and, as noted in earlier answers, elevating the agency's burden of proof in rebuttal to clear and convincing evidence.
- Expanding the scope of what constitutes a protected disclosure and to whom such disclosures can be made.
- Prohibiting actions taken by the employer "even if it is undertaken at the request of a Department or administration official" (unless the request takes the form of a nondiscretionary directive and is within the authority of the Department official making the request).

Question. Do you see the need for any further legislative changes to ensure that members of the military, DOD civilian employees, and DOD contractor employees are appropriately protected from reprisal for whistleblowing?

Answer. I am aware that significant enhancements to whistleblower protection, including the Whistleblower Protection Enhancement Act of 2012 and the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2013 amendments to the statute protecting Defense contractor employee whistleblowers, have recently been enacted. Prior to recommending further legislation, if confirmed, I would assess the effectiveness of these changes and work with Congress and others to identify potential gaps in the protections afforded to whistleblowers.

Question. What level of priority will you give, if confirmed, to the DOD IG's whistleblower protection responsibilities?

Answer. Whistleblowing, and the protection of the sources for our investigators, auditors, inspectors and evaluators, will be one of my top priorities. Whistleblowers perform an important public service—often at great professional and personal risk—by exposing fraud, waste, and abuse within the programs and operations of the Department. If confirmed, I will work to ensure that the DOD IG plays a leading role in creating an environment in the Department where whistleblowers can disclose wrongdoing without fear of retribution.

GENERAL COUNSEL TO THE DOD IG

Question. What is your understanding of the history and purpose of section 907 of the NDAA for Fiscal Year 2009, regarding the General Counsel to the DOD IG?

Answer. Section 907 provided for a General Counsel to the DOD IG who would serve at the discretion of the IG, report exclusively to the IG, and be independent of the Office of General Counsel, Department of Defense. I am familiar with and fully support such an arrangement for an IG to receive independent legal advice.

Question. What is your understanding of the role played by the General Counsel to the DOD IG with regard to completed investigations?

Answer. With regard to administrative investigations, attorneys in the Office of General Counsel (OGC) to the DOD IG perform legal sufficiency reviews of senior official and reprisal reports of investigation prior to the final report being submitted to the Inspector General (IG) or Deputy Inspector General for Administrative Investigations (DIG AI), as appropriate, for final approval. In ensuring administrative investigations are legally sufficient, OGC attorneys determine whether the relevant legal or regulatory standards are identified and applied; evidence of record appears complete, credible, and supports the findings of fact by the appropriate standard of proof; findings of fact support the conclusions reached; and the report is generally understandable.

Question. If confirmed, how would you address disputes between the General Counsel to the DOD IG and a DOD IG investigative team as to findings of fact and the appropriate weight to be given to such facts in a completed investigation?

Answer. My understanding is that OGC and the Office of DIG AI have a commendable working relationship and have established procedures for resolving any disagreements related to sufficiency of investigations. Cases where disagreements cannot be resolved between OGC and DIG AI are rare and typically involve matters that impact the outcome of the investigation or supportability of findings and conclusions. Matters unresolved at the directorate level are elevated to the DIG AI, who consults further with the attorney advisor or the General Counsel to resolve the disagreement. If disputes remain unresolved on cases which require OGC coordination prior to PDIG or IG review/signature, the DIG AI notifies the PDIG or IG of the disagreement and provides additional information as requested. The parties involved continue to address the disagreement, aided by any feedback that the PDIG or IG chooses to provide. I intend to continue that resolution process and provide my advice and direction based on the evidence of the particular case.

AUDIT OVERSIGHT REVIEW AND REPORT CARDS

Question. In recent years, one congressional office has prepared an annual report entitled an "Audit Oversight Review and Report Card." These reports have been highly critical of the performance of the audit functions of the DOD IG.

Are you familiar with these reports?

Answer. Yes

Question. What is your view of the findings and conclusions of these reports?

Answer. The reports presented some valid concerns and opportunities for improvement in the audit organization at the DOD IG.

Question. Are there additional steps that you believe the DOD IG should take to address the findings and conclusions of these reports?

Answer. As an auditor by profession, audit selection and audit quality are very important to me. It is my understanding that there has been improvement over the past few years. If confirmed, I will work with the audit organization to ensure that it continues to meet the mission of producing timely, relevant, and accurate audit products.

Question. If confirmed, will you review the organizational structure of the DOD IG, with the objective of streamlining the organization, reducing duplication or redundancy, and increasing the performance of the organization?

Answer. If confirmed, I will have the goal of having a model audit organization. I will ensure we conduct audits that provide return on investment that promote economy, efficiency, and effectiveness within the Department. I will also ensure the audits are carried out in an efficient manner to prevent duplication.

SEXUAL ASSAULT INVESTIGATIONS

Question. In June, 2011, the GAO issued a report entitled "Military Justice Oversight and Better Collaboration Needed for Sexual Assault Investigations and Adjudications", GAO–11–579, finding that the Department of Defense Inspector General has not performed its designated policy development and oversight responsibilities for sexual assault investigations. The GAO recommended that the DOD Inspector General, in conjunction with the Military Services, develop and implement (1) a policy that specifies procedures for conducting sexual assault investigations and (2) clear goals, objectives, and performance data for monitoring and evaluating the Services' sexual assault investigations and related training.

What is the status of the implementation of the GAO's recommendations?

Answer. In response to GAO's first recommendation the DOD IG developed overarching guidance which establishes policy, assigns responsibilities, and provides procedures for the investigation of adult sexual assault within DOD. This guidance is captured in DODI 5505.18, "Investigation of Adult Sexual Assault in the Department of Defense" which was published on January 25, 2013.

Regarding the second recommendation in June 2011, the DOD IG established a unit dedicated to the oversight of sexual assault and other violent crime investigations. The DOD IG has developed a program of regular and recurring oversight of sexual assault investigations and training. Since its establishment, the unit has evaluated both Military Criminal Investigative Organizations' (MCIOs') sexual assault investigation training and adult sexual assault investigations completed in 2010. These reports were published in February 2013 and July 2013, respectively. The unit is currently evaluating the MCIOs' investigations of sexual assaults of children completed in 2012, and DOD's compliance with the Sexual Offender Registration and Notification Act.

Question. If confirmed, will you ensure vigorous oversight and evaluation of the Services' investigations of sexual assault and the related training of investigators?

Answer. Yes, if confirmed, I will endeavor to ensure the DOD IG continues to provide optimum oversight and investigative and policy support in this critically important area. I understand that the DOD IG will evaluate the Department's sexual assault and other violent crime investigations and investigative training on a continuing basis. In the coming year the DOD IG intends to evaluate additional closed MCIO sexual assault investigations, and evaluate MCIO sexual assault victim interview training.

CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT

Question. In order to exercise its legislative and oversight responsibilities, it is important that this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress are able to receive testimony, briefings, and other communications of information.

Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee and other appropriate committees of Congress?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree, if confirmed, to appear before this committee, or designated members of this committee, and provide information, subject to appropriate and necessary security protection, with respect to your responsibilities as the Inspector General of the Department of Defense?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to ensure that testimony, briefings and other communications of information are provided to this committee and its staff and other appropriate committees?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?

Answer. Yes.

[Questions for the record with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR BILL NELSON

OVERPAYMENTS TO CONTRACTORS

1. Senator NELSON. Mr. Rymer, there have been numerous Department of Defense (DOD) Inspector General (IG) reports citing contractor overpayments, such as Boeing overcharging for repair parts for helicopters (DODIG–2013–103). How do we hold contractors accountable to deliver products and services on time and at the agreed upon price?

Mr. RYMER. The DOD IG can assist the Department in holding contractors accountable by identifying overcharges and requesting funds be returned for goods and services not received; recommending the contracting officer take immediate actions to correct the problems through an appropriate contract remedy, and recommending, when warranted by the contractor's inadequate performance, that the Military Department's designated official start suspension or debarment actions. The DOD IG also makes recommendations to DOD Senior Leadership to hold the contracting official and contracting officer representative accountable for their actions in making sure that the contractor is delivering the products and services on time and at the price stated in the contract. To obtain the maximum benefit of the recommendations that have been made regarding spare parts, the Department should apply lessons learned and operational improvement from the individual contracts that the DOD IG has reviewed more broadly to other contracts for spare parts.

2. Senator NELSON. Mr. Rymer, are these overpayments related in any way to DOD's lack of auditability?

Mr. RYMER. While these overpayments may not be directly related to DOD's lack of auditability, the Department's lack of effective processes and controls creates an environment where overpayments are less likely to be detected and corrected in the normal course of business. If the Department were auditable, they would have systems that talk with each other and processes that ensured that property was properly valued and included in the inventory management system and the financial statements.

3. Senator NELSON. Mr. Rymer, why is this report classified For Official Use Only (FOUO)?

Mr. RYMER. It is my understanding that the report is marked FOUO because it contains proprietary data protected by the Trades Secrets Act. Proprietary information is exempt from public disclosure pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act.

QUESTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CLAIRE MCCASKILL

OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL

4. Senator MCCASKILL. Mr. Rymer, the DOD Office of the Inspector General (DOD OIG) has been critical in efforts to rein in runaway spending and waste, fraud, and abuse at DOD. It has done a tremendous job in what can be a difficult environment to succeed in. Would you let me, or my staff, know if there are any tools that you believe you need to help you do your job more effectively?

Mr. RYMER. If confirmed, I will review the audit, investigative and inspections capabilities of the DOD IG to determine if they possess the resources and authorities needed to provide effective oversight of the Department of Defense. I will promptly advise your office if additional authorities or capabilities are needed in order for the DOD IG to perform its mission independently and professionally.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JOE MANCHIN III

DOD AUDIT

5. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Rymer, today, DOD is the only Federal agency that still cannot pass an audit. Along with my friend Senator Coburn, I am working on the Audit the Pentagon Act and think it is long past time for a clean audit on DOD's books. DOD accounts for almost 20 percent of the Federal budget, but we don't know exactly where the money is spent. That makes absolutely no sense. If confirmed, what will you do from day one to root out waste and ensure DOD audits its books?

Mr. RYMER. I share your concerns regarding DOD's inability to audit its books. If confirmed, I will work with the DOD IG audit staff to ensure that the financial management work continues to provide actionable recommendations that will improve the Department's financial management controls and reduce vulnerabilities to fraud waste and abuse. If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG conducts audits focusing on identifying improper payments and that the auditors have the necessary data analysis software to analyze high risk areas such as delinquent debt, particularly related to healthcare services provided to DOD personnel, dependents, and veterans.

6. Senator MANCHIN. Mr. Rymer, the Inspector General is absolutely central to DOD's audit process. What will your approach be to ensuring that DOD not only meets the audit standards and timetables, but also that the integrity of the audit process is upheld?

Mr. RYMER. If confirmed, I will ensure that all DOD IG audit staff are fully trained and qualified to perform their duties. Highly qualified staff should have advanced degrees and/or professional certifications to include Certified Public Accountants (CPAs), Certified Internal Auditors (CIAs), Certified Fraud Examiners (CFEs), Certified Information Systems Auditors (CISAs), and Certified Defense Financial Managers (CDFMs). In addition, if confirmed, I will ensure the audit staff provide the appropriate oversight to CPA firms engaged to assist with financial statement audits. I will also ensure that the auditors are able to share knowledge about the Department as well as audit standards and best practices in performing financial statement audits.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR TIM KAINE

MILITARY WHISTLEBLOWERS

7. Senator KAINE. Mr. Rymer, do you feel that current law does enough to protect Active Duty whistleblowers who witness fraud, waste, abuse, or crime?

Mr. RYMER. Protection of whistleblowers must be a top priority for the DOD IG. At this time, I am not prepared to comment definitively on the sufficiency of current law but I do believe that continually educating our military servicemembers on their rights and responsibilities is critical to ensuring these protections are fully exercised. If confirmed, this is a matter I would want to assess more thoroughly. I believe the DOD IG should continually evaluate protections for whistleblowers and suggest improvements, if necessary, to ensure that all of our servicemembers receive the proper protections for being courageous enough to come forward and report allegations of fraud, waste, abuse, and crime.

8. Senator KAINE. Mr. Rymer, what else can be done to stamp out retaliation against those who come forward as victims or witnesses?

Mr. RYMER. Continued outreach from the DOD IG and increased top-down emphasis on whistleblower rights and protections within the Department sends the message that reporting wrongdoing—including reporting allegations of sexual assault—is the right thing to do, and that whistleblowers are protected from reprisal. I am well aware that even the perception of retaliation can reduce the trust and confidence our servicemembers and civilian employees have in the Department. If confirmed, I will continually review our outreach and education programs to ensure we are doing all we can to protect whistleblowers from reprisal. I would also work to ensure that investigations into allegations of reprisal continues to be a high priority in the Office of Inspector General and that all such investigations are conducted in a timely and thorough manner.

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE

PRIORITIES

9. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Rymer, if confirmed as the DOD Inspector General will you review DOD's use of scarce O&M funds for alternative energy programs?

Mr. RYMER. If confirmed, I will work to ensure the DOD IG continues its audit efforts of the Department's programs to become more energy efficient—including the use of various types of alternative energy. As one of the largest consumers of energy in the world, the Defense Department spends billions of dollars each year on fuel. Becoming more energy efficient makes sense.

10. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Rymer, if confirmed, will you agree to apply your financial and auditing expertise to thoroughly review plans to build a biofuel refinery in light of an April 2013 report by the International Energy Agency that forecasts the United States is on pace to become energy independent by 2030, and to report the results of your review to this committee?

Mr. RYMER. If confirmed, I will ensure that the DOD IG reviews the various initiatives underway at the Department to become more energy efficient and assesses DOD's progress toward meeting its energy efficiency goals. As part of this effort, the DOD IG should assess the use of various types of alternative energies—including biofuel. My goal is to provide the Secretary and Congress with relevant and timely information that can be used to guide policy decisions on various fuel programs.

DOD FINANCIAL ACCOUNTING AND AUDITS

11. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Rymer and Dr. Rabern, if confirmed, what is your understanding of your role in finally establishing the level of audit readiness that is required by law?

Mr. RYMER. The DOD IG must perform the audits required by the CFO Act of 1990. However, section 1008(d) of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2002 limits the DOD Inspector General to performing only those audit procedures required by generally accepted government auditing standards that are consistent with the representations made by management. In practice this significantly curtails the audit work because most of the Department has not asserted that it is audit ready. It is important that other financial management audits conducted by the DOD IG focus on identifying the necessary improvements that the Department must make to reduce vulnerabilities, improve its financial management operations and continue to progress toward auditability of all the financial statements and meeting the auditability goals for fiscal year 2014 and 2017.

SENIOR OFFICIAL INVESTIGATIONS

12. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Rymer, if confirmed, what is your understanding of your role in providing this committee with timely and accurate information concerning senior officials who are subject to Senate confirmation?

Mr. RYMER. If confirmed, I will ensure that all results of investigations are promptly provided to Senior Management Officials in the Department of Defense for review and consideration in the confirmation process. I will also respond quickly to inquiries from the committee regarding pending nominations of senior officials.

13. Senator INHOFE. Mr. Rymer, what would be your role in evaluating the processes within DOD and the Services to select for promotion and assignment to positions of responsibility, only the best and fully qualified, ethical, and accountable leaders?

Mr. RYMER. I recognize the importance of providing timely and accurate information to DOD and the Services for use in the promotion and assignment process. If confirmed, I will ensure DOD IG completes its investigations in a timely and accurate manner, and continues its vigilant oversight of senior official investigations conducted by the Service IGs. I will promptly provide any adverse information in our records regarding senior officials for the Department's consideration during the selection and nomination process.

[The nomination reference of Hon. Jon T. Rymer follows:]

NOMINATION REFERENCE AND REPORT

AS IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 24, 2013.

Ordered, That the following nomination be referred sequentially to the Committee on Armed Services; when reported by the Committee on Armed Services, pursuant to an order of January 7, 2009, to be sequentially referred to the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs for 20 calendar days:

Jon T. Rymer, of Tennessee, to be Inspector General, Department of Defense, vice Gordon S. Heddell, resigned.

[The biographical sketch of Hon. Jon T. Rymer, which was transmitted to the committee at the time the nomination was referred, follows:]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF HON. JON T. RYMER

Education:

University of Tennessee

- September 1973–June 1975
- September 1978–June 1981
- Bachelor of Arts Degree, Economics, awarded 1981

University of Arkansas at Little Rock

- September 1993–August 1996
- Master of Business Administration Degree awarded 1996

Employment record:

Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation

- Inspector General
- July 2006–Present

U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission

- Interim Inspector General
- May 2012–January 2013

Council of the Inspectors General on Integrity and Efficiency

- Audit Committee Chair
- August 2008–Present

U.S. Army

- Command Sergeant Major, U.S. Army Reserve
- Active duty, June 1975–June 1978, November 2004–October 2005

- U.S. Army Reserve June 1978–August 1992,
- U.S. Army Reserve, U.S. Army National Guard, July 1997–June 2013

KPMG LLP

- Director, Banking Advisory Services
- June 1997–November 2004

Boatman's Bank of Arkansas

- Executive Vice President
- November 1992–January 1997

First American National Bank of Tennessee

- Executive Vice President
- June 1981–November 1992

Certifications:

Certified Government Auditing Professional
Certified Internal Auditor

Honors and awards:

Meritorious Service Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster
Army Commendation Medal with two Oak Leaf Clusters
Army Achievement Medal with three Oak Leaf Clusters
Good Conduct Medal
Humanitarian Service Medal

[The Committee on Armed Services requires all individuals nominated from civilian life by the President to positions requiring the advice and consent of the Senate to complete a form that details the biographical, financial, and other information of the nominee. The form executed by Hon. Jon T. Rymer in connection with his nomination follows:]

UNITED STATES SENATE

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Room SR–228

Washington, DC 20510–6050

(202) 224–3871

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES FORM

BIOGRAPHICAL AND FINANCIAL INFORMATION REQUESTED OF NOMINEES

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Complete all requested information. If more space is needed use an additional sheet and cite the part of the form and the question number (i.e. A–9, B–4) to which the continuation of your answer applies.

PART A—BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE NOMINEE: Biographical information furnished in this part of the form will be made available in committee offices for public inspection prior to the hearings and will also be published in any hearing record as well as made available to the public.

1. Name: (Include any former names used.)
Jon Thomas Rymer.

2. Position to which nominated:
Department of Defense Inspector General.

3. Date of nomination:
June 24, 2013.

4. Address: (List current place of residence and office addresses.)
[Nominee responded and the information is contained in the committee's executive files.]

5. Date and place of birth:
April 2, 1955; Knoxville, TN.

6. Marital Status: (Include maiden name of wife or husband's name.)
Married to Debra Joanne Queen.

7. Names and ages of children:
Jon Thomson Rymer, age 17.

8. Education: List secondary and higher education institutions, dates attended, degree received, and date degree granted.
Bearden High School, Knoxville, TN, 1971–1973, diploma, 1973.
University of Tennessee, Knoxville, TN, 1973–1975, 1978–1981, Bachelor Degree, 1981.
University of Arkansas at Little Rock, 1994–1996, Master of Business Administration Degree, 1996.
University of Cincinnati, 2002–2003, no degree awarded.

9. Employment record: List all jobs held since college or in the last 10 years, whichever is less, including the title or description of job, name of employer, location of work, and dates of employment.
June 1997 to November 2004, KPMG LLP, Chicago, IL, Cincinnati, OH, Director.
June 1975 to August 1992 and July 1997 to present, U.S. Army, U.S. Army National Guard, and U.S. Army Reserve. Served in enlisted ranks from Private to Command Sergeant Major.
July 2006 to Present, Inspector General, Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Washington, DC. Served as Interim Inspector General at U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission from May 2012 to January 2013.

10. Government experience: List any advisory, consultative, honorary, or other part-time service or positions with Federal, State, or local governments, other than those listed above.
Chairman of the Audit Committee and member of the Executive Council of the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency and Council of Inspectors General for Integrity and Efficiency from 2008 to present.
Member of the GAO Advisory Committee of Government Auditing Standards from 2009 to present.
Member of the GAO Advisory Committee of Government Internal Controls Standards from March 2013 to present.

11. Business relationships: List all positions currently held as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, agent, representative, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, educational, or other institution.
None.

12. Memberships: List all memberships and offices currently held in professional, fraternal, scholarly, civic, business, charitable, and other organizations.
Member of Institute of Internal Auditors
National Rifle Association

13. Political affiliations and activities:
(a) List all offices with a political party which you have held or any public office for which you have been a candidate.
None.
(b) List all memberships and offices held in and services rendered to all political parties or election committees during the last 5 years.
None.
(c) Itemize all political contributions to any individual, campaign organization, political party, political action committee, or similar entity of $100 or more for the past 5 years.
McCain for President—three contributions totaling $750 in 2008
Connelly for Congress—$100 - 10/16/2008
National Republican Party—$50 - 04/02/2012
Romney for President—$150 - 10/17/2013

14. Honors and awards: List all scholarships, fellowships, honorary society memberships, military medals and any other special recognitions for outstanding service or achievements.
Meritorious Service Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster
Army Commendation Medal with two Oak Leaf Clusters
Army Achievement Medal, four Oak Leaf Clusters
Good Conduct Medal Army Reserve Components Achievement Medal, Three Oak Leaf Clusters
Humanitarian Service Medal

National Defense Service Medal
Ohio Commendation Medal

15. Published writings: List the titles, publishers, and dates of books, articles, reports, or other published materials which you have written.
None.

16. Speeches: Provide the committee with two copies of any formal speeches you have delivered during the last 5 years which you have copies of and are on topics relevant to the position for which you have been nominated.
A. IG Perspectives for the FBI, 9/3/2008
B. The FDIC IG–FDIC Accounting and Auditing Conference, 5/21/2008
C. Meeting the Challenges of the Crisis-Association of Government Accountants, 7/13/2010
D. FDIC OIG Update, AICPA, 9/2010
E. The FDIC IG–University of Tennessee Corporate Governance Seminar, 10/2010

17. Commitment to testify before Senate committees: Do you agree, if confirmed, to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate?
(a) Have you adhered to applicable laws and regulations governing conflicts of interest?
Yes.
(b) Have you assumed any duties or undertaken any actions which would appear to presume the outcome of the confirmation process?
No.
(c) If confirmed, will you ensure your staff complies with deadlines established for requested communications, including questions for the record in hearings?
Yes.
(d) Will you cooperate in providing witnesses and briefers in response to congressional requests?
Yes.
(e) Will those witnesses be protected from reprisal for their testimony or briefings?
Yes.
(f) Do you agree, ifconfirmed, to appear and testify upon request before this committee?
Yes.
(g) Do you agree to provide documents, including copies of electronic forms of communication, in a timely manner when requested by a duly constituted committee, or to consult with the committee regarding the basis for any good faith delay or denial in providing such documents?
Yes.

[The nominee responded to the questions in Parts B–F of the committee questionnaire. The text of the questionnaire is set forth in the Appendix to this volume. The nominee's answers to Parts B–F are contained in the committee's executive files.]

SIGNATURE AND DATE

I hereby state that I have read and signed the foregoing Statement on Biographical and Financial Information and that the information provided therein is, to the best of my knowledge, current, accurate, and complete.

JON T. RYMER.

This 19th day of July, 2013.

[The nomination of Hon. Jon T. Rymer was reported to the Senate by Chairman Levin on July 30, 2013, with the recommendation that the nomination be confirmed. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate on September 17, 2013.]

[Prepared questions submitted to Dr. Susan J. Rabern by Chairman Levin prior to the hearing with answers supplied follow:]

QUESTIONS AND RESPONSES

DEFENSE REFORMS

Question. The Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 and the Special Operations reforms have strengthened the warfighting readiness of our Armed Forces. They have enhanced civilian control and clearly delineated the operational chain of command and the responsibilities and authorities of the combatant commanders, and the role of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have also clarified the responsibility of the Military Departments to recruit, organize, train, equip, and maintain forces for assignment to the combatant commanders.

Do you see the need for modifications of any Goldwater-Nichols Act provisions?

If so, what areas do you believe might be appropriate to address in these modifications?

Answer. I do not see the need to modify any provisions of the Goldwater-Nichols Act.

DUTIES OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY (FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT AND COMPTROLLER)

Question. What is your understanding of the duties and functions of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller)?

Answer. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Financial Management and Comptroller) directs and manages the financial activities of the Department of the Navy. This means overseeing the management of the annual budget, its execution, financial reporting and subsequent audit, as well as providing independent analysis. The office provides informed recommendations to the senior leadership of the Department of the Navy regarding the efficient and effective allocation of assets, consistent with the national security priorities of the President and the Secretary of Defense. The office provides for the development of a world-class financial management work force and is committed to the American public for the proper stewardship of the resources they entrust to the Department of the Navy.

Question. What background and experience do you possess that you believe qualifies you to perform these duties?

Answer. I have significant financial management experience in multiple government agencies including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Customs Service, the U.S. Agency for International Development and while on Active Duty in the U.S. Navy.

Question. As Chief Financial Officer of the U.S. Agency for International Development, I was responsible for all financial matters related to the delivery of economic development and humanitarian assistance programs through grants, contracts, and loans to governmental and non-governmental organizations globally. I was responsible for reform and refurbishment of financial systems, implementing changes in the management of government expenditures, trust funds, and loans in over 100 appropriations.

